NBC Nightly News (9/17, lead story, Colt, 9.87M) reported, "In Iran today about one thousand theology students protested. Students in Egypt marched as well. In Palestinian areas 2 churches were vandalized this morning. They are not clear that a shooting of a nun today was directly related to the Pope statements."

NBC Nightly News (9/17, story 2, , Seigenthaler, 9.87M) interviewed Izam Demebi, the director of London's Institute of Islamic Political Thought. Izam Demebi: "His lecture had come at a time of high tension. There is a war on terrorism that the military sees as a war on Islam. Where George Bush recently associated fascism with Islam. Where all sorts of things are happening sending all sorts of images and messages."

Rise Of Islamists Said To Be Destabilizing Mideast Governments. The New York Times (9/18, Slackman, 1.21M) reports, "From Cairo, to Rabat, Morocco, to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, the order that emerged after World War II -- long accustomed to encouraging domestic anger against Israel -- has seen its influence and grip on power challenged in the wave of instability washing across the Middle East. That has roughly coincided with the rise of the insurgency in Iraq." This region "has long been defined by conflict, and leaders are unafraid to use force to crush opposition." But "the current level of instability has unnerved them. They are not about to be toppled, not as long as they retain firm control over their security operations. But they find themselves fighting to maintain stability and credibility, political analysts said." The Post also reports, "The empowerment of the Islamists has been propelled by events large and small -- the occupation of Iraq, Israel's war with Hezbollah, the United States' support for Israel in that war, Danish cartoons lampooning the Prophet Muhammad, and most recently comments about Islam made by Pope Benedict XVI."

Writer Says Islamic World Is Not Monolithic. Writer Melik Kaylan writes in the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) that in the wake of Pope Benedict XVI's recent comments citing a Byzantine-era critique of Islam, the "usual hubbub of outrage ensued. Various self-appointed and official Islamic spokesmen…responded sharply in the name of their faith." One might "intone gravely that the West continues to mishandle its relations with the umma -- the sphere of active Muslim believers -- with the implied assumption that there is such a unified entity of tens of millions, and that they all feel outrage in the same way at the same time." Kaylan adds, "As many Muslim apologists contend, though often for disingenuous purposes, the Islamic world is indeed not monolithic. It remains highly fissiparous and regional, inmixed with a myriad of localized customs, superstitions and hagiologies. … The spread of fundamentalist Islam was itself fostered by the West via the Arabian peninsula for political reasons. It has become the ultimate, invasively colonial force and aims to subjugate the entire umma to its tenets."

Abbas, Hamas Suspend Unity Government Talks. The Washington Times/AP (9/18, El Deeb) reports, "Coalition talks between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the militant group Hamas have stalled over U.S. demands that a national unity government recognize Israel, Palestinian officials said Sunday." The shutdown of coalition talks "underscores the difficulty Abbas is having in trying to get Hamas to soften its anti-Israel ideology, a move that would pave the way to ending international sanctions that are crippling the Palestinian economy." When Abbas meets President Bush on the margins of the UNGA, he will "try to win U.S. support for a coalition that doesn't fully meet international demands for a changed stance on Israel." Abbas aides "said he would warn that failure to work out a unity government could lead to a Palestinian civil war." Despite Abbas' efforts, the AP says, "some Palestinians officials wondered whether Abbas and Hamas can bridge their differences."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush Team's "Inaction." The New York Times (9/18, 1.21M) editorializes, "After six months of crippling sanctions, Hamas's leaders are trying to figure out the very minimum they need to say -- and the even less they plan to do -- to end their isolation and salvage their government. Skepticism is more than warranted." But "Hamas's admission of weakness could provide at least a chance to quell the violence and resuscitate peace talks. The Bush administration should not squander the opportunity. … Skepticism is a basic requirement for dealing in the Middle East. But that cannot be an excuse for nearly six years of White House inaction. It's time that Mr. Bush and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, try the hard work of diplomacy."

More Commentary. Jackson Diehl writes in the Washington Post (9/18, A17, 748K), "The Palestinian leadership knows that the still-evolving unity pact isn't likely to impress either Olmert or Bush, since it almost certainly won't commit Hamas or the new government to formal recognition of Israel or an unqualified renunciation of violence." But "if it goes forward it will be a fresh initiative," and "Western governments and Israel would be reduced to arguing with each other, rather than pressing for a Palestinian government that could make peace." Diehl adds, "The US-Israeli strategy to counter this maneuver amounts to a series of small tactical steps. Once an Israeli soldier still held captive in Gaza is released, Olmert will meet with Abbas and release hundreds or thousands of Palestinian prisoners. An Israeli chokehold over movement in and out of Gaza will be eased. If all goes well, Olmert might even discuss transferring security responsibility in several West Bank towns from the Israeli army to Palestinian security forces controlled by Abbas."

Administration, Business Groups Said To Stymie Darfur Divestment Bill. The Financial Times (9/18, Dinmore) reports, "Moves in Congress to put financial pressure on Sudan to stop the killings in Darfur have been stymied by a combination of big business interests and the Bush administration." The Times adds, "While giving rhetorical backing to anti-genocide protests staged around the world on Sunday, Democrats and Republicans admitted that a new watered down draft of the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act was further evidence of US unwillingness as well as inability to take decisive action." Of the bill, the Times says, "It is not clear whether [SFRC Chairman Richard] Lugar's draft will get through the committee, though there is a sense that so much time has been wasted that something is better than nothing. The sudden arrival of the draft caught many by surprise and it is still being studied." The State Department "declined to make an official comment on the issue."

As AU Ponders Withdrawal, Both Sides Press To Renew Fighting. The Washington Post (9/18, A12, Timberg, 748K) reports, "As the African Union prepares to abandon its troubled peace mission to Darfur, the region is descending ever more steeply into war." The "intensity of the combat" throughout Darfur "has forced a new flood of civilians to flee their burned and bombed-out villages for sprawling camps on the outskirts of [many] cities." The Post adds, "With its current mandate and resources, African Union officers express despair about their ability to keep peace when both the government and rebel forces are determined to return to war." When interviewed, AU officers "muttered angrily about their failure to enforce calm while expressing greater fears. They used the words 'genocide' and 'Rwanda' to describe what they expect will follow their departure." Many experts say the AU, "while ineffective at peacekeeping, is serving as vital eyes and ears for the outside world at a time when the Sudanese government is making it more difficult for aid groups and journalists to operate here. With the African Union gone, they say, the last buffer will be lost against a bloodier assault in Darfur."

Far-Right Party Wins Representation In East German State. The New York Times (9/18, Landler, 1.21M) reports, "A far-right party made further inroads in Germany's economically fragile east on Sunday, winning seats in a state election in Mecklenburg-West Pomerania, a lonely land of farms and fishing villages that is the home constituency of Chancellor Angela Merkel." The National Democratic Party, "which openly espouses xenophobic and neo-Nazi views, was projected to win slightly more than 7 percent of the vote, according to preliminary results. That was less than analysts here had feared, but enough to clear the threshold of 5 percent for seats in the state legislature." The Times adds, "Extreme-right parties will now be represented in three of Germany's six eastern states -- a trend that worries officials and underlines the divide between the country's eastern and western halves. Far-right parties have negligible support in more-prosperous western Germany." The result "is a rebuke for Mrs. Merkel and her conservative party, the Christian Democratic Union, which lost votes in Mecklenburg and fared even worse in the second of the two state legislative elections on Sunday, in Berlin."

Conservatives Win Swedish Elections. The New York Times (9/18, Lyall, Ekman, 1.21M) reports, "Sweden swept away 12 years of center-left government on Sunday, voting to reject its longtime prime minister, Goran Persson, in favor of a conservative candidate who has pledged to revise the Swedish welfare state." Fredrik Reinfeldt's Alliance for Sweden finished almost two percentage points ahead of the "left-of-center" coalition, whose key component, the Social Democrats, "received just 35.2 percent, their worst showing since universal suffrage began in Sweden in 1921. Mr. Persson, 57, who has been prime minister since 1996, said he would step down as party leader in March." The Times calls the Social Democrats "one of the world's most consistently successful political parties," and notes their defeat "reflects a feeling not only that Mr. Persson has become complacent in office, but also that Sweden's celebrated social welfare model, with its high tax rate and generous benefits, has encouraged too many people to stay out of work for too long." Reinfeldt "successfully made unemployment a major issue in the campaign. By most measures, Sweden is thriving economically," however Reinfeldt believes "it has encouraged a vast swath of people to fall out of the labor market, a particularly acute problem with an aging population."

The Financial Times (9/18, Ibison) calls Reinfeldt's election "a stunning rebuke for prime minister Göran Persson and his party that has led Sweden for 65 of the last 74 years, overseeing the creation of its world-famous welfare state." Sweden "is set for an historic change of direction as it moves away from being a welfare state towards encouraging more market-based activity." The AP (9/18, Kratovac) says Reinfeldt "once wrote a book criticizing the country's vaunted cradle-to-grave welfare state. Now he will have the chance to tweak the model." In addition, he "is decidedly more pro-American than" Persson.

López Obrador Proclaims Himself President-Elect, Will Lead "Parallel" Government. The Financial Times (9/18, Thomson) reports, "Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential election last July, proclaimed himself president-elect at the weekend and vowed to set about transforming the country's institutions to establish 'a new republic.'" Speaking "before tens of thousands of cheering supporters, he said he would not recognise the government of Felipe Calderón, the official winner, and promised to continue his 'civil resistance' movement."

The Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) reports "hundreds of thousands of supporters of…López Obrador elected him the leader Saturday of a 'parallel government' opposed." The "symbolic 'vote' -- a show of hands in the packed Zocalo plaza -- was the latest development in Mexico's nearly three-month electoral dispute."

The AP (9/18, Adams) reports Lopez Obrador said "the parallel government will work on proposals to rewrite Mexico's constitution to guarantee the right to food, work, health care, education and housing while overhauling 'corrupt' public institutions."

IAEA Concerned About Terrorists' Access To Serbian Nuclear Site. The UN's nuclear watchdog says that more than two tons of radioactive material stored in a research facility in Serbia are an easy target for terrorists seeking to build a "dirty bomb." The Washington Times (9/18, 88K) reprints a London Daily Telegraph (Pancevski) story which reported that nuclear inspectors have dubbed the rundown, lightly guarded storage facility at the Institute of Nuclear Sciences in Vinca "the world's most dangerous disused nuclear site" because of "the potency of the material and the risk of leakage." Michael Durst, the special program manager at the IAEA "said the Vinca site topped the global priority list of unsecured uranium sources because it combined the threats of nuclear proliferation and environmental disaster." The IAEA fears that the nuclear material "could be packaged with conventional explosives to spread radioactive material over a large area -- a so-called dirty bomb."

US Officials Said To Have Bungled Chinese Spy Ring Case. The Washington Times (9/18, Gertz, 88K) reports on a yearlong investigation into "one of the most damaging losses of defense technology in American history." US intelligence knew that Chinese Center for Asia Pacific Studies at Zhongshan University, known to US intelligence officials as CAPS, "received funding from the People's Liberation Army and conducted operational research for the Chinese military. … The fact that the spy ring went undetected for two decades was a major counterintelligence failure. Worse, the US government would go on to bungle the case." Investigators believe Chi Mak "gave China schematics and design information on the latest generation of Aegis weapons systems, which L-3 helped to develop. Aegis -- meaning shield -- is being upgraded to become America's most advanced and mobile anti-missile system for use on guided-missile cruisers, guided-missile destroyers, Sea Wolf-class submarines and aircraft carriers."

US, Europe Seek To Push Up Exchange Values Of Asian Currencies. Amid concerns that their nations companies are being undercut by their Asian competitors, the US and its European allies are pressing to push up the exchange values of Asian currencies. The Wall Street Journal (9/18, Phillips, 2.03M) reports, "In statements at top-level financial meetings during the weekend, European officials suggested they expect the yen to rise, in an apparent effort to jawbone financial markets to drive the Japanese currency up against the euro. At the same time, finance officials from the Group of Seven major industrial powers, including the US, renewed their long campaign to persuade China to allow the yuan to appreciate against the dollar and euro." At the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund's steering committee yesterday, Treasury Secretary hank Paulson "called for 'greater exchange-rate flexibility in Asian emerging economies.' He also called on finance ministers to clamp down on Iran's finances. He said Tehran uses front companies to finance its nuclear ambitions and to fund terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas."

China Competes With West To Aid Asian Neighbors. China has been making loans to countries that were once the "sole preserve of the World Bank, the Asian Development, the United States and Japan," the New York Times (9/18, Perlez, 1.21M) reports. According to the Times, "For poor countries like Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar, and somewhat better-off countries like the Philippines, China's loans are often more attractive than the complicated loans from the West. The Chinese money usually comes unencumbered with conditions for environmental standards or community resettlement that can hold up major projects. The aid does not carry penalties for corruption that are being increasingly used by the World Bank president, Paul D. Wolfowitz. … For its part, China benefits from the added infrastructure -- roads, ports and bridges -- in the underdeveloped but growing region around it, to help increase trade and to move natural resources from China's periphery to its heartland."

Afghan Finance Minister Expected To Enter Race To Replace Annan. Former Afghan Finance Minister Ashraf Ghani is expected to join the race to succeed Kofi Annan as UN Secretary General. The Financial Times (9/18, Johnson) reports that Ghani "will declare his candidacy this afternoon in a meeting with Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, who is visiting the US." Observers say Ghani "had a strong track record as an administrator but suffered from his reputation for impatience." The Times adds, "In a second round of straw polls in the Security Council last week, Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, consolidated his lead. It also emerged that Vaira Vike-Freiberga, the Latvian president, would run."

Foreign Service Officers Say DSS Abuses Security Clearance Process. Dozens of Foreign Service officers say their careers have been ruined because the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service suspended their security clearances based on suspicious or unsubstantiated accusations. The Washington Times (9/18, Kralev, 88K) reports several officers accused the DSS of "abusing the security clearance process" by punishing "whistleblowing, dissenting viewpoints or minor acts of possible misfeasance unrelated to national security." DSS "declined to comment for this article, saying only that it does everything according to the law and administrative regulations. A spokeswoman said there are up to 30 suspensions every year from among the up to 40,000 State Department employees and contractors who hold security clearances at any given time."

IMF Expected To Approve Overhaul Today. The IMF today is expected to approve an overhaul that would give four fast-growing countries more of a say in the IMF's operations. USA Today (9/18, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that while the US is backing the overhaul, key economic powers including Brazil and India oppose it and "intense skirmishing" is expected "about the new formula the IMF eventually will adopt to complete its internal realignment. Poor countries, in particular, fear their already weak representation could ebb further. … Nations enjoying a greater say than their economic punch warrants, such as Belgium and the Netherlands, worry that any new approach will cost them. (The U.S., which has 17% of the IMF votes but accounts for 30% of the global economy, says it won't seek a larger say.)" USA adds, "First to benefit: China, Turkey, South Korea and Mexico, the countries suffering the biggest gap between their share of IMF votes and the size of their economies. The measure, expected to be approved today, will trigger only modest changes immediately. China, for example, will see its share of IMF votes rise to 3.7% from 2.98%."

Colombian "Peace Communities" Disavow Any Contact With Armed Groups. The Los Angeles Times (9/18, Kraul, 918K) reports on the Colombian "peace community" of San Jose de Apartado, where "a group of 1,200 peasant pacifists is taking a brave stand against the country's civil conflict. The community of three villages…was formed in 1997 after a Catholic archbishop named Isaias Duarte -- who would be assassinated five years later -- encouraged the farmers to say no to war. It is one of 10 such peace communities, or 'humanitarian zones,' in Colombia, according to Justice and Peace, a human rights advocacy organization in Bogota, the capital." Members of the community "disavow any contact or collaboration with armed groups, and agree to work as a collective on crops, livestock and community projects and to share what they produce. … But the community's profession of neutrality has not shielded it from horrendous violence. Of San Jose's nearly 1,400 original members, 178 have been killed since 1997 by armed groups looking to clear the zone of suspected collaborators, appropriate valuable land for themselves or claim transit routes for arms and drugs traffic in and out of nearby Pacific and Caribbean ports."

US' Human Rights Efforts In Equatorial Guinea Called "Low Key." U.S. News and World Report (9/25, Cue, 2.03M) that in April Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised President Teodoro Obiang Nguema of Equatorial Guinea as a "good friend" of the United States. Obiang "may head a corrupt and repressive regime, according to the State Department's own human-rights reports, but Equatorial Guinea is a growing oil producer -- now No. 3 in sub-Saharan Africa after Nigeria and Angola -- and an oil-needy America can't afford to be too picky about choosing its petro pals." The Bush Administration "says it is pressing Obiang and his government for progress on issues such as political reform, anticorruption measures, and human-rights protections. … The Bush administration has kept its human-rights efforts low key, and has somewhat successfully exercised its influence on Obiang to release political prisoners and improve jail conditions."

NATO Official Praises Unified Missile Defense. In the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M), NATO assistant secretary general Marshall Billingslea writes, "Today NATO crosses a major milestone in its theater missile defense efforts. The Alliance is announcing, in London, the selection of a trans-Atlantic consortium of companies with whom we will begin working on the first of our major missile defense contracts." Given the "growing threats" from sources like North Korea and Iran, Billingslea recommends, "We can choose to address the whole range of threats together, and develop a common defense for the entire Alliance."

WSJournal Says WHO Has "Come To Its Senses" On DDT. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (9/18, 2.03M) says that WHO has announced that it will begin promoting the use of DDT to combat malaria in developing nations. It has "long been known that DDT is the cheapest and most effective way to contain the disease, which is spread by infected mosquitoes. But United Nations health agencies and others have for decades resisted employing DDT under pressure from anti-pesticide environmentalists. After tens of millions of preventable malarial deaths in these poor countries, it's nice to see WHO finally come to its senses." The Journal adds, "One insecticide won't end malaria, and DDT's proponents don't claim it will. But by keeping more people alive and healthy, DDT can help create the conditions for the only lasting solution, which is economic growth and development. It's encouraging that even a UN health agency seems to have figured that out."

WPost Praises Rockefeller, Gates Foundation Efforts In Africa. An editorial in the Washington Post (9/18, A16, 748K) praises the Rockefeller Foundation and the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation for their pledge of $150 million over five years to combat hunger in Africa. The Post notes that despite many problems, "the two charities are right to be trying. … The Rockefeller Foundation already has a presence in East Africa, and its grants have resulted in some progress: 20 new seed varieties and a fix for the broken licensing program that had prevented the dissemination of seeds in Kenya. The partnership with the Gates Foundation will add money and ambition to these efforts."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Compromise Called Possible On Interrogations (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — President Bush's national security adviser signaled on Sunday that he was seeking a compromise with the Republican senators who are rebelling against the administration's proposal to explicitly permit certain severe interrogation practices against terrorism suspects.

The adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, is negotiating with Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and other Senate leaders over the administration's proposal, which would give the C.I.A. permission to use "alternative" techniques when interrogating terrorism suspects.

Appearing on the ABC News program "This Week," just two days after Mr. Bush declared he would end all interrogation of terrorism suspects unless Congress defined the techniques the way the administration believes necessary, Mr. Hadley struck a more moderate tone.

Asked if he believed compromise was possible, Mr. Hadley said, "I do." He said it was essential that "we continue to have this terribly important program for protecting the country, as the president requires, that gives the men and women who carry out this program clear guidance and clear Congressional support, and also achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3," referring to the Geneva Conventions.

"We need to find a way through that obstacle course," he added. "And I think we can."

Mr. McCain has said that redefining the practices allowed under Common Article 3, which outlaws "outrages upon personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment," would ultimately harm captured American soldiers and further undercut the United States image abroad. Mr. Hadley repeated on Sunday the administration's position that the White House wanted to clarify how the provision applied to Qaeda prisoners and others termed "unlawful combatants."

Other administration officials said it became clear over the weekend that the administration was going to have to give ground. "I don't think anyone anticipated the avalanche of opinion that would be assembled on the other side of what seemed like a pretty abstruse legal issue," one official said, speaking on condition of anonymity as he was not authorized to discuss the issue with a reporter.

In New Hampshire, where he was appearing at a Nascar race and a reception for supporters, Mr. McCain said he had seen Mr. Hadley briefly on Sunday morning before they appeared, separately, on the ABC program, but he said they had not discussed a compromise. "He said all of us realize that it is in the country's interest that we try to reach an agreement," Mr. McCain said. "And I said we've had many conversations, and I look forward to continuing our conversations.

Asked what he thought Mr. Hadley was signaling with his comments on the show, Mr. McCain said: "I don't know. It can't be anything but good."

Then, adding to the administration's pain on the issue, he said: "By the way, I forgot to mention this: George Schultz said I could say that he strongly favors our position." Mr. Schultz was President Ronald Reagan's secretary of state, and his endorsement would add another powerful Republican voice in opposition to Mr. Bush, along with that of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

At his Rose Garden news conference on Friday, Mr. Bush said Congress must provide "clarity" to C.I.A. interrogators seeking to extract information about future attacks from "enemy combatants."

But Mr. Bush and Mr. Hadley have declined to say what kind of "alternative interrogation practices" they want to make explicitly legal, so interrogators do not have to fear prosecution under the War Crimes Act for violating the Geneva Conventions. Common Article 3 does not define exactly what constitutes violations of personal dignity or degrading treatment.

In June, the Supreme Court ruled that the article applied to all interrogations of terror suspects. That has led to concerns within the Central Intelligence Agency and among military officers that techniques used since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks could be viewed as illegal. Mr. Bush's amendment would legalize all but "serious violations" and give retroactive immunity to interrogators charged with going over the line.

In a second television appearance, on "Late Edition" on CNN, Mr. Hadley gave no ground on another point of dispute: whether to share with terrorism suspects classified information that is used against them.

Mr. McCain and Senators Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John W. Warner of Virginia, both Republicans, have proposed letting a judge make determinations about the evidence and, if need be, dismiss the charges if there is no way for the defendant to respond.

Mr. Hadley said, "The challenge is to be able to continue to prosecute and bring to justice terrorists where a lot of the evidence is classified evidence." He said the administration had addressed the issue by making sure the evidence was provided to the suspect's lawyer and, where possible, by giving the accused a declassified summary of information.

Compromise On CIA Interrogations Possible (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration signaled Sunday that it is willing to compromise with Republican lawmakers to save a CIA interrogation program President Bush says is vital to defeating terrorists.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley, making the rounds of Sunday talk shows, said the administration believes it can clarify interrogation rules without amending the Geneva Conventions. The comments appeared aimed at closing a rift between Bush and Republicans in the Senate that Bush said threatened to halt CIA interrogation of terrorism suspects.

Key Republican lawmakers, including Sen. John Warner of Virginia and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a former prisoner of war, argue that changing the conventions would invite other countries to do the same and expose future American POWs to mistreatment.

Asked on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos whether he thought a deal could be worked out, Hadley replied, "I do."

Hadley said legislation should enable the CIA to resume interrogations that use unspecified techniques but under clear rules that comply with the conventions. Lawmakers and the White House could craft a compromise that "achieves Sen. McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3," the provision of the conventions that the Supreme Court ruled in June applies to terrorism detainees, he said.

Specifically, Hadley said, interrogators need clarification about the provision in Common Article 3 that bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

Appearing on CNN's Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer, Hadley said: "Nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean?"

McCain, who spent 5½ years in North Vietnamese prison camps, said tough CIA interrogations can continue within the bounds of the conventions. The ultimate issue is the United States' position as a moral leader, he said. "We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do," McCain said on This Week.

On Labor Day, the CIA transferred 14 high-level detainees, including alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, to U.S. military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, effectively halting the CIA interrogation program.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said on Fox News Sunday that CIA interrogations could resume if another high-level terror suspect was captured, but under more restrictive rules. "That person may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques, that the president was referring to the other day may be problematic," he said.

Hadley wouldn't discuss the specifics of the CIA's interrogations. To do so, he said on ABC, would give terrorists the ability to train against the techniques "and neutralize their effect." He repeatedly denied that the techniques constitute torture.

Other Republicans expressed optimism that a deal could be reached with the White House. "I'm willing to compromise," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who has opposed Bush's plan for interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects.

GOP Expresses Confidence On CIA Bill (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

The Bush administration and holdout GOP senators expressed confidence on Sunday they could reach a compromise on rules for CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists.

Neither the president's national security aides nor some of the lawmakers who are resisting White House pressure would say how they can reconcile their deep differences after a week of public sparring.

As a result, it is unclear if Congress quickly can pass legislation authorizing aggressive methods against terrorist detainees, as President Bush wants. Congress is likely to adjourn in two weeks for the fall elections.

Bush says CIA personnel should be able to resume tough interrogation techniques to extract information from detainees. Several senators from his own party are standing in the way, seeking changes. They say the United States must adhere strictly to international standards in the Geneva Conventions and that setting harsher ones could put U.S. troops at risk if they are captured.

"We have to hold the moral high ground," said Sen. John McCain of Arizona, one of the Republicans not satisfied with the White House proposal. "We don't think al-Qaida will ever observe those conventions, but we're going to be in other wars."

McCain elaborated later Sunday at a reception in Concord, N.H., warning against breaking with provisions of the Geneva Conventions that protect wartime prisoners. "That's what we do not want, because Americans would be setting the precedent for changing a treaty that has been untouched by any nation for 57 years," he said.

A Supreme Court ruling in June essentially said the Geneva Conventions should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and eventually led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bush's national intelligence director, John Negroponte, said the interrogation program has had "precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now" because of questions about its legality. But, he said, it is important that the program continue.

"It's provided invaluable information that has saved lives of Americans, and significant plots against our homeland have been disrupted as a result. And, surely, there is a way of finding a way forward that would permit this program to continue and, at the same time, do it in a way that is both respectful of our law and Constitution and our international obligations," Negroponte said.

But, he added, "I think we're going to have to wait and see" if a compromise can be reached with McCain and others.

McCain said he is committed to a deal. "I still believe that we'll be able to work this out to the satisfaction of everybody concerned," the senator said.

The White House says the existing ban on "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" satisfies U.S. treaty obligations. The senators' bill is silent on the issue.

Bush's proposal allows evidence to be held from a defendant if it is classified and allows coerced testimony if deemed reliable. The Senate bill requires a judge to dismiss charges if evidence cannot be shared. It also excludes any testimony obtained by cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

"If it's seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of the CIA, why can't every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police?" said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., another opponent of Bush's plan. "It would be a disaster."

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, declined to say what specific techniques, such as waterboarding or prolonged sleep deprivation, would be illegal if Congress did not pass Bush's proposal.

But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions.

"We need to find a way through that obstacle course, and I think we can," Hadley said.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he was not certain a compromise was possible.

"I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva," Levin said.

Also Sunday, 34 relatives of Sept. 11 victims released the text of a letter they had sent to senators asking them to fight Bush's proposal. The family members said they do not believe "that it is in the interest of the United States to create a system of military courts that violate basic notions of due process and lack truly independent judicial oversight.

"Not only does this violate our most cherished values and send the wrong message to the world, it also runs the risk that the system will again be struck down, resulting in even more delay" in prosecuting terrorists, the relatives wrote.

Hadley appeared on ABC's "This Week," CBS' "Face the Nation" and CNN's "Late Edition." Negroponte was on "Fox News Sunday," McCain on ABC and Graham and Levin on CBS.

Republicans See Compromise On Terror Detainees (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Administration officials and Senate Republicans said a compromise can be reached over the treatment of detained terror suspects.

Divisions remain on a proposed modification of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which regulates the interrogation standards of terror suspects. The administration says it wants only to interpret the laws so that CIA officers can conduct tough interrogations without fear of prosecution in international courts.

Critics, including several Republican senators and U.S. military officials, say that changing the accepted standards of the Geneva Conventions would hurt U.S. prestige and endanger American troops captured abroad.

"We have to hold the moral high ground. We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do," Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, said yesterday during an appearance on ABC's "This Week."

President Bush told reporters that Mr. McCain's position would weaken the administration's ability to collect vital information from terrorist suspects.

Nonetheless, Mr. McCain and other officials said a compromise can be reached.

"Absolutely, the talks are continuing," Mr. McCain said. "I've supported this president in the war on terror. I've supported him on the war in Iraq. I think he's a friend. I hope he considers me a friend. I believe we can sit down, we can work this out, preserve our Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions."

However, it is not clear how far each side is willing to compromise.

"I think the way ahead here is to all come together behind the proposition that the president has made, that we need this CIA program," National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

During his interview with ABC, Mr. McCain emphasized that he is not opposed to the CIA program.

"I am not saying we should shut down the program," he said.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, agrees with Mr. McCain on the issue and said the administration and Congress are closer than some observers think.

"I think we can get there from here," Mr. Graham said.

"Fox News Sunday" moderator Chris Wallace noted that many of those opposed to the administration's plan, including Mr. Graham, Mr. McCain and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, all have military combat experience. In contrast, many of the plan's supporters, including Mr. Bush, do not.

"If anybody knows about Geneva up close and personal, it's Senator McCain," who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, said on "Face the Nation."

The ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee said he isn't convinced that a compromise can be reached.

"I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva."

Why GOP Trio Is Bucking The White House (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

For the Bush White House, this week's showdown with the Senate over US treatment of detainees sets up a rematch with a triumvirate of GOP senators who have been the president's strongest supporters in the war in Iraq - and his most effective critics.

Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina led the first push-back in the Senate over the war when they opposed the White House over its torture policy last year.

Now the trio is on a new collision course with the White House over how to bring suspected terrorists to trial - a must-pass bill, since the US Supreme Court overturned the president's plan for military tribunals in June.

Senator McCain, a former prisoner of war in North Vietnam, knows torture firsthand and brings moral authority to the issue. Torture is wrong, he says. Anything that weakens international protections for detainees, "threatens US troops in this and future wars," he said on Friday.

Senator Graham, a military lawyer with the Air Force Reserve for 22 years, said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation" that President Bush's detainee bill, including its "clarification" of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, would "redefine America in a way that we can't win this war."

Senator Warner, a former secretary of the Navy and now chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, says he aims to pass legislation that will withstand further review by US courts.

"It would be a very serious blow to the credibility of the United States ... if legislation that was prepared by the Congress and signed [by] the president failed to meet a second Supreme Court review," he said during the committee's markup Thursday.

Senators Warner, McCain, and Graham, along with Sen. Susan Collins (R) of Maine, voted with 11 Democrats on the panel, prompting renewed bids for a compromise with the White House over the weekend.

For Mr. Bush, the issue is national security. In a fiery press conference on Friday, he charged that the rival Senate bill, sponsored by McCain, Graham, and Warner, would derail a CIA program vital to the war on terror. "It's a debate that's really going to define whether we can protect ourselves," he said.

So far, GOP senators opposed to Bush's plan are not blinking.

"Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights that they could issue their own legislative 'reinterpretations,' " responded McCain, in a statement responding to Bush on Friday. "This puts our military personnel and others directly at risk in this and future wars."

With weeks to the midterm elections, GOP strategists had hoped to go into such a debate united. Instead, at least two other senators, including Chuck Hagel of Nebraska (R) and John Sununu (R) of New Hampshire, say they will back the McCain-Warner-Graham approach.

Together, McCain, Warner, and Graham led the first rebellion in the Senate over the conduct of the war in Iraq when they challenged the White House over its torture policy last year. The McCain amendment banning the use of "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment" of terror suspects was adopted by the Senate on Oct. 5, 2005, with the support of 9 of 10 senators, and was signed into law on Jan. 6.

In a bid to rally support for new legislation on Capitol Hill, the White House is using the text of the McCain amendment to "clarify" the terms of the Geneva Conventions, especially the requirement of Common Article 3 banning "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

"I'm asking Congress to pass a clear law with clear guidelines based on the Detainee Treatment Act that was strongly supported by Senator John McCain," said Bush Friday.

But, ironically, the trio that produced the McCain amendment now sees it as a tool to weaken international protections for detainees by imposing a unilateral redefinition of the law. For now, the GOP revolt in the Armed Services Committee is giving cover to Senate Democrats, who don't want to head into another midterm election tagged with being weak in the war on terror.

On Sunday, Sen. Mitch McConnell said it would be awkward for Democrats to "go home and explain a vote ... to shut down an intelligence program that we know has helped save lives...."

"Questioning our policy in Iraq is not treason and it's not appeasement. It's our obligation under the Constitution," said Sen. Richard Durbin, the deputy Democratic leader, in a press briefing last week.

Last week, only eight Democrats voted against a detainee bill that is closely modeled on the president's version, when the House Armed Services Committee marked up its version of the 2006 Military Commissions Act on Sept 13.

At Issue: How Suspects Are Treated (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 18, 2006

Questions and answers concerning the debate over how suspected terrorists should be interrogated and prosecuted:

Q: Why is Congress having this debate now?

A: The Supreme Court, by a 5-3 decision in June, rejected the Bush administration's plan for trying some of the more than 400 terrorism suspects imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The court ruled that the detainees are covered by the Geneva Conventions, international treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war. Last week, the Bush administration submitted a plan for the interrogation and trial of terrorism suspects. Some lawmakers, led by Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner, R-Va., say the plan doesn't go far enough to satisfy the court's objections.

Q: If the United States supports the Geneva Conventions, why is there any question about how they apply to the prisoners?

DOJ_NMG_0063712

A: The United States is one of 194 signatories to the Geneva Conventions. Those rules clarify how uniformed prisoners of war and civilians should be treated. The administration says the alleged terrorists fall into a new category because they aren't part of any established army. That's why the administration initially maintained the Geneva Conventions didn't apply, but the Supreme Court held otherwise.

Q: Who is against the administration's plans?

A: The most outspoken opponents are four Republicans: Warner, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and former secretary of State Colin Powell.

Many Democrats, including Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, his party's top-ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, also oppose President Bush's plan.

Q: Why are the Republicans influential?

A: All are military veterans with special knowledge in this area: Warner is a former secretary of the Navy; Graham is a member of the Air Force Reserves and a military lawyer; Powell is the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and McCain spent 5½ years as a North Vietnamese prisoner of war. Last week, the three Republican senators joined Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and 11 Democrats to vote for a rival plan in the Armed Services Committee for trying and interrogating terrorism suspects.

Q: What are the main differences between the plans?

A: There are three main areas of contention:

•The president says some classified evidence must be withheld from suspects to prevent intelligence from leaking. The Senate panel's bill would require that defendants be informed of all the evidence against them.

•Both plans would ban the use of evidence obtained through torture. The president's proposal would permit evidence obtained by other types of coercive methods if a judge allowed it. The panel's bill would ban evidence obtained by "cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment."

•The president says his agreement to abide by the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which bans inhumane treatment, fulfills U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions. McCain and other senators say this waters down the conventions, which ban "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

Q: Doesn't the senators' plan protect the legal rights of people who may be plotting against the country?

A: The senators argue that it's important for the nation to set a strong example to ensure U.S. citizens are treated fairly if they become prisoners of war. "If a CIA paramilitary operative were captured in Iran and put on trial by the Iranian government as an unlawful enemy combatant and the Iranian prosecutor provided evidence to the judge and jury marked secret to convict the American agent that he would never see or rebut, would you object to this procedure?" Graham asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a letter Friday.

Q: Why doesn't Bush agree?

A: Bush and administration spokesmen say the committee plan would end CIA interrogations that have produced information that protects American lives. The president and his advisers say the Geneva Conventions language banning "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment" is too vague. "The director of CIA must be confident that what he has asked an agency officer to do is lawful," CIA Director Michael Hayden says.

Q: What types of interrogation are at issue here?

A: That information is classified. The administration will not discuss what methods are used in interrogations of terrorism suspects.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales hinted at some of the issues at a briefing Friday. He suggested that certain conditions of confinement, including the size of detainees' cells and the amount of light provided to prisoners, are open to interpretation.

"There is no baseline standard," Gonzales said. "We want clarity."

Q: What would happen if a top terrorism suspect, such as al-Qaeda lieutenant Ayman al-Zawahri, were captured today?

A: Gonzales said Friday that the CIA detention program, which allowed for aggressive interrogations of high-level al-Qaeda detainees at secret locations overseas, has been halted until legislation is passed that would allow the administration to resume the program. This year, prominent al-Qaeda suspects were transferred from the custody of the CIA at undisclosed detention facilities to the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said on Fox News Sunday that high-level terrorism suspects captured today could still be questioned by the CIA, but under greater restrictions. "That person may be questioned," Negroponte said, "but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques that the president was referring to the other day, may be problematic."

Q: What happens now?

A: The House of Representatives has scheduled a vote on the president's plan for this week and is likely to approve it.

The Senate is more likely to approve the competing Armed Services Committee bill. If that happens, House and Senate negotiators would have to work out the differences.

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

The media are concentrating on the politics of the intra-Republican fight over military tribunals and detainee treatment, which last week saw the Senate Armed Services Committee move a bill substantially different from what the White House wants. But the stakes here are far more serious: To wit, if Senators John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins get their way, aggressive interrogation as an antiterror intelligence tool will effectively end.

Thanks to last year's McCain Amendment, the Defense Department is already required to give detainees in its custody better treatment than American police must give common criminals. The new Army Field Manual doesn't even allow for good cop/bad cop routines against Iraqi and Afghan insurgents if threats of any kind are conveyed or implied. This restraint is not required by the Geneva Conventions, which clearly distinguish between lawful and unlawful combatants -- the latter being deemed to have fewer rights because they have violated the rules of war by fighting out of uniform or targeting civilians.

Now the four GOP Senators and most Democrats are working to put CIA interrogators under similarly restrictive rules. If they get their way, they will make it impossible for any government agency to squeeze the next al Qaeda terrorist who may have information about a ticking bomb in an American city. * * *

At issue now is something called Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which the Supreme Court ruled this summer in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld applies to our conflict with al Qaeda. This was a dreadful decision, since Article 3 is intended to be applied to an "armed conflict not of an international character" -- i.e., a civil war. But it is now the law, and the question going forward is how to interpret Article 3's ambiguous prohibition against "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

That clause can mean just about anything depending on the eye of the beholder. To pick one example, U.S. human rights groups have alleged that using women to question Islamist prisoners is "humiliating and degrading." But for the U.S. to bar women interrogators might well violate our own civil rights laws. What's more, the definition of an "outrage" is context-dependent. What's outrageous when dealing with the likes of 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, or a terrorist who might know about imminent plots, is clearly different than what's outrageous when dealing with a lawful combatant or prisoner of war.

The Bush Administration has proposed to deal with this ambiguity by laying down a clear set of rules specifying conduct it considers acceptable and unacceptable under Article 3. We think it is perfectly legitimate to interpret Article 3, as the Administration does, in a way that permits aggressive interrogation of some detainees. Some people may disagree. But it is wrong to assert that merely attempting to interpret "outrageous," "humiliating" and "degrading" is to somehow rewrite the Geneva Conventions, as the critics charge.

Paradoxically, the GOP Senators claim the Administration has all the legal authority it needs to maintain the CIA interrogation program, which deals with the worst al Qaeda captives such as KSM. Even though the War Crimes Act as amended in 1997 makes it a crime to violate Common Article 3, the Senators say the Administration can proceed based on an opinion it can seek from the Department of Justice defining what Common Article 3 means.

But this is naive, if not disingenuous. Somebody is going to have to interpret what Article 3 requires in real world situations, and we'd rather see it done by open and honest Congressional debate than by secret Justice Department memos -- or, worse, leaving that job to interrogators in the field on a case-by-case basis. In Hamdan, the Supreme Court showed little deference to the executive branch but it did invite Congress to play a role. Yet now these Members of Congress want to abdicate that role and tell the Administration it is on its own in interpreting Common Article 3.

As soon as some Justice lawyer writes an opinion on Geneva allowing "stress" interrogations (such as exposure to hot or cold, or sleep deprivation), it will be denounced by Europeans and liberal activists who have a different interpretation. A future President could also rewrite that Justice opinion, exposing CIA agents to ex post facto liability. And would the same Senators now saying that the CIA interrogation program is legal stand up and defend it under media and political pressure? Don't count on it.

Amid these vagaries, CIA Director Michael Hayden is absolutely right to say that, without clear rules from Congress, he cannot put his agents at political and legal risk. He will have to shut down an interrogation program that the President says has yielded crucial intelligence that has saved American lives. CIA agents "don't want to be tried as war criminals," Mr. Bush said in his press conference Friday. "They expect our government to give them clarity about what is right and what is wrong." We'd add that as patriots they also want to be proud of their duty and know that the Congress supports it.

You'd think the critics would at least engage on these issues, but instead they are trying to play a political trump that portrays the Administration as moral rogues. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell put it most demagogically when he claimed the Bush Administration was trying to redefine Geneva and would lead others to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism" and "put our own troops at risk."

In fact, our captured troops wearing the uniform would be lawful combatants entitled as POWs to the full protection of the Geneva Conventions, not just Common Article 3. In any case, the al Qaeda terrorists we are fighting care nothing for Geneva as they mutilate and behead the Americans they capture. The Administration is making a good faith attempt to translate vague terms of international law into domestic statutory obligations. Mr. Powell's suggestion that the effort in any way compares with the habits of our enemies must be deeply offensive to his former colleagues.

Mr. McCain also didn't do his argument any favors when he accused General Hayden of "trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation." Doesn't the Senator recognize the possibility that the CIA Director is actually concerned about protecting America? We're willing to accept Mr. McCain's own sincerity on the issue. We merely disagree with him and think that leaving Article 3 undefined will mean an end to the kind of interrogation that, against certain terrorists, could save American lives.

As a political matter, however, Mr. McCain seems to want it both ways: On the one hand, he claims the Administration has all the legal rights it needs to maintain the CIA interrogation program. So he can deny responsibility if the program is shut down. On the other hand, he won't speak up and support such interrogations, and he continues to imply that the Administration favors "torture" and illegal behavior even as he knows the CIA is demanding no such thing.

The good news is the Senate is not the last word on this debate. The House is likely to endorse the Administration's preferred language this week, and a bill that emerges from conference may be a compromise the CIA can live with. The government's ability to protect Americans using the vital tool of interrogation depends on it.

The Politics Of Torture (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

Waterboarding, which dates back to the Spanish Inquisition, is an interrogation method that involves strapping a prisoner face up onto a table and pouring water into his nose. The idea is to create the sensation of drowning so that the panicked prisoner will talk. According to The New York Times, 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed was waterboarded by the CIA. He eventually confessed what President Bush described last Friday as "information about terrorist plans we couldn't get anywhere else." Neither Bush nor any other administration official has acknowledged, on the record, the use of waterboarding or any other specific CIA method. But at a White House news conference, Bush passionately defended the once secret CIA interrogation program involving such "alternative" techniques as "vital."

The question is whether waterboarding, however effective, is torture—and whether Americans ought to be doing such things at all. Some leading Republican senators, John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, believe it should be clearly banned under new legislation. The Bush administration has proposed its own bill seeking to redefine the Geneva Conventions—which set out the rules of war—in order to preserve the CIA's right to use some harsher methods. But even Bush's former secretary of State, Colin Powell, publicly questioned last week whether the administration's stance might lead the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." And recently Bush administration officials, in private negotiations with the Senate, have agreed to drop waterboarding from a list of approved CIA interrogation techniques, according to a Senate source involved in the dispute. (He, like the other administration officials and congressional sources quoted in this story, asked not to be identified owing to the sensitivity of the negotiations over classified information.)

The Bush administration wants to maintain seven other approved CIA interrogation methods, however, for use against suspected high-level terrorists, according to one congressional source and a lawyer involved in the negotiations. A senior administration official said he could not discuss what CIA methods are still being considered. But the official added that "one should not assume all techniques used previously will be used in the future." He also noted that the new U.S. Army field manual bans waterboarding. Two other sources, one a U.S. legislator and the other a counterterrorism official, told NEWSWEEK that the total number of CIA detainees subjected to the "most rigorous" interrogation techniques was less than five. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed is the only one among them whose identity has been acknowledged by former government officials.

The GOP's intraparty dispute centers on a single provision of the Geneva Conventions. The president has criticized a Supreme Court decision last June that ruled all suspected terrorists, even those detained secretly by the CIA, are protected under Geneva's Common Article 3, which forbids "outrages upon personal dignity" and "cruel treatment."

Bush says that, under such vague rules, CIA professionals will not know if the interrogation techniques they are using are legal, and they could be vulnerable to war crimes prosecution. He's proposing a new law that will more narrowly define Common Article 3 to mean only "serious" violations. McCain and the other GOP senators have indicated they would be willing to amend domestic U.S. law, especially the War Crimes Act, to permit at least some "enhanced" CIA techniques. They are also willing to pass legislation that would deny many rights to detainees at Guantánamo Bay and allow them to be held indefinitely. But the senators, who appear to have the support of a majority of their colleagues, want to keep the Geneva restriction broadly defined in order to protect U.S. troops abroad. "What is billed [by Bush] as 'clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as 'withdrawing' from the treaty obligations," Graham said. "It will set precedent, which could come back to haunt us."

Neither administration nor congressional sources would describe the other interrogation methods in dispute. As NEWSWEEK has previously reported, various CIA techniques such as open-handed slapping were first discussed in Alberto Gonzales's office in 2002 before the then White House Counsel became attorney general. Scott Horton, a New York City Bar Association lawyer who has advised the Senate on the legislation, says Capitol Hill aides have told him that the CIA has sought to use the following techniques: (1) induced hypothermia; (2) long periods of forced standing; (3) sleep deprivation; (4) the "attention grab" (the forceful seizing of a suspect's shirt); (5) the "attention slap"; (6) the "belly slap"; and (7) sound and light manipulation. Tom Malinowski, the Washington director for the group Human Rights Watch, says that Hill sources working on the legislation have described the same list to him.

Some human-rights activists view only the first two methods, hypothermia and forced standing, as outright torture. But Malinowski said there is a reason why U.S. military interrogation manuals consistently ban physical abuse of any kind. "The Army's experience has taught them that once you allow physical contact once, even if it's mild, it's very difficult to prevent much more violent physical contact," he said.

CIA Director Gen. Michael Hayden told agency personnel last week in an e-mail that he was not asking for a "CIA carve-out"—in other words, an exception for CIA interrogators. But critics say the administration is trying to achieve just that.

A Guide To The Terrorism Bills (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, September 18, 2006

Much of Bush's war on terrorism has been waged in the shadows. But with secret surveillance and detention programs now exposed, the Administration has been forced to reckon with the lights, and the law. The President has offered two bills to put his programs on a legal footing. So far, the strongest opposition has come from his own party.

SPYING

BUSH'S BILL would allow--but not require--the President to seek approval for the National Security Agency's (NSA's) no-warrant electronic-surveillance program from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court. Bush has said he would seek the court's approval for the program, which he says targets only suspected terrorists calling or e-mailing to or from the U.S. Current law requires the government to get the FISA court's permission for each device--rather than each suspect--to be wiretapped; Bush claims his wartime powers override that law. His bill would send all legal challenges pending against the no-warrant program to the FISA court and allow for appeals up to the Supreme Court. It would add penalties for leaking information about official surveillance programs. The existence of the NSA program was revealed by the New York Times.

CONGRESSWOMAN HEATHER WILSON'S BILL would allow the targeting of individuals, not devices, but would require eavesdroppers to get a warrant within weeks of doing so. The bill would require that Congress be given written notification and justification for no-warrant wiretaps. Most Senate Republicans support Bush's plan, but leading House Republicans back Wilson, a New Mexico Republican, who chairs the subcommittee that oversees eavesdropping.

DEMOCRATIC BILLS in both chambers would strengthen the 1978 law and would try to make Bush comply with it.

QUESTIONING

BUSH'S BILL seeks to set the rules for future treatment of detainees in the war on terrorism. Arguing that some of the language of the Geneva Conventions regulating the treatment of prisoners of war is too vague--like the prohibition in Common Article 3 against "outrages upon personal dignity"--Bush would remove Geneva references from the U.S.'s 1996 War Crimes Act, which provides penalties up to death for abuse of detainees. Instead, he would identify nine violations: torture, cruel or inhuman treatment, performing biological experiments, murder, mutilation or maiming, intentionally causing great suffering or serious injury, rape, sexual assault or abuse and taking hostages. The bill states that these prohibitions "shall fully satisfy United States obligations" under Geneva. It would apply retroactively to all detentions after 9/11 to provide some legal protection to U.S. jailers and interrogators who dealt with detainees between then and the putative passage of the bill.

JOHN MCCAIN'S BILL would protect interrogators from civil suits, would punish them only for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and would increase rights of appeal to the U.S. courts. It would preserve references to the Geneva Conventions in the War Crimes Act. The Arizona Senator and his co-sponsors, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, argue that if the U.S. interprets Geneva to its liking, other countries will too, endangering American troops if they are captured.

PROSECUTING

BUSH'S BILL on questioning detainees would create military courts to try foreign detainees in the war on terrorism. The bill would expand the definition of who can be tried to include those charged with conspiracy and other lesser offenses. It would also establish the laws under which they would be tried--this in response to the Supreme Court's June ruling that the original tribunals Bush established after 9/11 did not comply with Geneva's requirement of a "regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The new courts would afford defendants the right to a civilian lawyer, an insanity defense and a copy of the proceedings, with classified information removed. But coerced statements could be accepted as evidence, and detainees could be denied access to classified intelligence presented to jurors to build the case against them. The bill would set strict limits on detainees' access to U.S. civilian courts.

MCCAIN'S BILL would prohibit the introduction of coerced statements and would allow defendants to see the evidence used against them. Its sponsors argue that statements obtained under duress are not reliable and that no one can properly defend himself without fully knowing what he is accused of. Bush has the Senate leadership and House Republicans on his side. Warner, McCain and Graham have moderate Republican supporters and most, if not all, Senate Democrats.

Leading A Rebellion (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty, Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, September 25, 2006

If you want to understand how a baby-faced freshman Republican Senator from conservative South Carolina has come to be standing against President George W. Bush on the issue of how to interrogate and try terrorism suspects, it helps to know how Lindsey Graham spent part of his summer. A month ago, when most Senators were back home campaigning and fund raising, he was in Kabul, Afghanistan, answering to "Colonel." Wearing desert fatigues, with an M9 pistol strapped to his hip, Graham was conducting a two-day tutorial on the principles of U.S. military law at the Afghan Defense Ministry. He recalls coaching Afghan military lawyers, who are modeling their system after that of the U.S.: "It's important that when the troops act badly, they are punished to keep good order and discipline, but it's equally important that people believe that the punishment and the system itself are fair." The only Senator now serving in the National Guard or reserve, and the first in decades to do military duty in a combat zone, Graham adds, "It has to be based on what the person did and not who the person is."

That's pretty much the same argument that Graham is making back in Washington, where he is helping turn what looked like a smart political strategy into an internecine battle among Republicans on Capitol Hill. White House and congressional leaders had hoped that focusing on terrorism in the final months before a tight midterm election would give their party an advantage over the Democrats. But they didn't count on a rebellion in their own ranks, made worse by the fact that it is led by Graham and two more senior members of the Armed Services Committee who also have impressive military credentials: chairman John Warner, a former Secretary of the Navy who was a Marine ground officer in the Korean War, four years before Graham was born; and John McCain, a former Navy pilot whose father and grandfather were admirals and who still suffers from what he endured during 5 1/2 years in a North Vietnamese POW camp.

Graham got his battle testing in a military courtroom, first at Shaw Air Force Base in South Carolina and then as chief prosecutor for the Air Force in Europe during the 1980s. He insists that Bush's proposal to tamper with the interpretation of the Geneva Conventions and put detainees on trial without letting them see all the evidence against them would have far-reaching consequences because it would invite future enemies to do the same, or worse, to Americans they capture. That argument has drawn strong support from such powerful voices as Colin Powell, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and ex--Secretary of State, who in a rare public criticism of Bush policy sent McCain a letter warning that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." Caught in the middle have been Graham's fellow military lawyers, many of whom share misgivings about the detainee program. At a closed session of the Armed Services Committee last week, Senator John Cornyn of Texas brandished a letter signed by top lawyers of each service saying they "do not object" to a key part of Bush's plan. But he may have overstated their level of support. "That's not the whole story," Graham said to Cornyn, according to a witness. Last week, amid bitter Republican infighting and despite a White House lobbying effort that brought both Bush and Vice President Cheney to Capitol Hill, the committee defiantly passed the trio's proposal for trying and interrogating terrorism suspects, rather than Bush's. The showdown on the Senate floor, where majority leader Bill Frist is expected to introduce the President's proposal, is not likely to be pretty.

It's not the first time Graham has put the Bush Administration on the spot. When the Abu Ghraib prison scandal broke most inconveniently in a presidential election year, he demanded accountability up the chain of command. "What are we fighting for?" the Senator asked at a hearing. "To be like Saddam Hussein?" On Bush's biggest domestic initiative, Graham supported the President's idea to add individual savings accounts to Social Security but also suggested a heretical payroll-tax increase to finance them. He infuriated the right last year by joining the bipartisan, largely moderate "Gang of 14" that blocked a change in Senate rules that would have ended Democratic filibusters of Bush's judicial nominees. Graham more recently helped ice the appeals-court nomination of Defense Department counsel William Haynes, an architect of the Administration's detainee policy.

Graham, 51, so confounds political labeling that his fellow apostate McCain, 70, has dubbed him "my illegitimate son." Like McCain, the presumed front runner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, Graham has a voting record that defies the headlines he creates. From the time he introduced his first piece of legislation in the South Carolina General Assembly, a bill barring gays and lesbians from serving in the state's National Guard, Graham has hewed to the right on social issues. He got a 96% rating from the American Conservative Union last year, and a zero from NARAL Pro-Choice America. As a House member, Graham caught the nation's attention playing corn-pone puritan as a House manager in Bill Clinton's impeachment trial. "Where I come from," Graham memorably drawled during the trial in the Senate chamber, as he described a phone call the President made to Monica Lewinsky, "you call somebody at 2:30 in the morning, you're up to no good." But in the Senate, Graham has become one of Hillary Clinton's good friends and has sponsored legislation with her to expand health benefits for reservists and members of the Guard--one of many times he has worked across the Senate aisle. Alex Sanders, the Democrat he defeated in 2002 to get the job, told TIME, "If I'd have known how Lindsey would turn out, I would have voted for him." And Dick Harpootlian, who in 2002 chaired the South Carolina Democratic Party, has gone so far as to send Graham a $1,000 campaign contribution.

As you might imagine, none of that sits particularly well with the G.O.P. establishment back home. "To say that Lindsey Graham has been a disappointment to the conservatives who were the heart and soul of his campaign would be an understatement," Republican political consultant Jeffrey Sewell wrote last week in the State, one of South Carolina's largest newspapers. "Unfortunately, our senior Senator has moved from disappointing to downright dangerous." Some Republicans are encouraging wealthy shopping-center developer Thomas Ravenel to take Graham on in the 2008 G.O.P. primary and have circulated an online petition to draft him. Ravenel--who has called Graham "the third Senator from New York"--says he has "no intention" of running against him, but that could change.

Making his own way is nothing new for Graham. He grew up in the rooms behind the Sanitary Cafe, a pool hall, bar and liquor store that his parents owned in Central, S.C. Graham's father, known as Dude, tended bar for the millworker clientele; the future Senator racked balls and answered phones. You've learned everything you really need to know about politics, Graham says, when you've had the experience of telling a wife who is on the line and looking for her husband, "He says he's not here." Graham set his sights on the military early, joining the ROTC in college, and he would have been a pilot were it not for a bad ear and dismal math scores. He had to adjust his plans again when his parents died within two years of each other while he was still in college, leaving him with a 13-year-old sister to provide for. After graduating from law school, he formally adopted her, mostly so that she would be eligible for his military benefits.

Once out of the Air Force, he returned to South Carolina and entered politics, where it seemed as if everything went his way. After two years in the legislature, he caught the Republican wave of 1994 and rode it to the House of Representatives. He supported McCain in the state's brutal 2000 G.O.P. primary and might have been punished by the new President's team, except for the fact that a Senate seat opened up with the retirement of 100-year-old Strom Thurmond two years later, and Graham had the best shot at winning it. Bush ended up coming to the state to campaign for him, in what became the most expensive Senate race in state history.

Those who don't like Graham say he is an opportunist and a grandstander. There are stories of him driving two hours for the chance to be on television for three minutes. But this month's "Best and Worst of Congress" rankings in Washingtonian magazine--the kind of popularity contest you might remember from your high school yearbook--have him pegged by a poll of 1,700 Capitol Hill insiders as one of the top choices in four categories: "Rising Star," "Straightest Shooter," "Bridge-Building Centrist" and "Funniest."

One place where Graham is not giving anyone much to laugh about these days is the White House. In an impassioned Rose Garden news conference, Bush warned that the proposal by the rebellious Republican Senators, if carried out, would give him no choice but to cancel the CIA's interrogation program of high-value terrorism suspects because it would deprive "our professionals" of the clear permission they need to continue using aggressive interrogation techniques. And the President suggested that the consequences of losing those techniques could be dire: "Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland."

Graham insists that there are still ways to work out a compromise, although both sides appear to be digging in. "I share the President's goal of pursuing a CIA program that would protect us and operate within the rule of law," he told TIME. "And I will work with him to achieve that." That's a call to duty for both Senator and Colonel Graham.

Negroponte Says Ruling Halted 'Tough' CIA Methods (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's top intelligence official acknowledged Sunday that the CIA had used "tough" and "aggressive" interrogation techniques that were discontinued when the Supreme Court ruled that terrorism suspects are entitled to the protections of the Geneva Convention.

DOJ_NMG_0063719

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said the CIA might still question terrorism suspects, but he added it was "up in the air" whether agency interrogators would be free to employ methods that had been used over the last five years and that Negroponte described as necessary and effective.

"There's been precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now, and certainly since the Supreme Court decision," Negroponte said on "Fox News Sunday," citing "legal uncertainties surrounding the entire program and which we think must be clarified."

Negroponte's appearance was part of a campaign by the Bush administration to defend a CIA program in which high-ranking Al Qaeda operatives had been held in secret prisons abroad and subjected to interrogation methods that critics contend are tantamount to torture.

Negroponte did not discuss specific interrogation techniques, but the CIA is known to have employed such methods as sleep deprivation; light and sound manipulation; and "water-boarding," in which a detainee is strapped to a board and made to fear he is drowning.

In appearances on the Sunday talk shows, Negroponte and national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley both reiterated the White House position that the CIA program would probably be shut down if Congress did not approve legislation clarifying or reinterpreting key provisions of the Geneva Convention.

But the administration faces a revolt from key Senate Republicans, including John McCain of Arizona, who have rejected the White House proposal and are siding with Democrats to advance legislation that would tighten rules regarding treatment of detainees.

Both sides signaled Sunday that they believed they could reach a compromise to let the CIA program continue, but they gave no indication that differences had been resolved.

McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, said on ABC's "This Week" that he believed the CIA program should be preserved, but that it should be in compliance with the existing language in the Geneva Convention, which sets rules for the conduct of wars and the treatment of prisoners. It has been ratified by more than 190 countries, including the United States.

"I'm not saying we should shut down the program. In fact, we should have a program," McCain said. "What I'm saying is that we should not do things which would be condemned by everyone in the world."

The White House has argued that the language is vague, leaving CIA officers vulnerable to prosecution or lawsuits. In particular, the debate has centered on the meaning of provisions in what is known as Common Article 3, which bans conduct including "outrages upon personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment." Hadley said those provisions must be clarified for the CIA program to continue.

"I'm saying that nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean?" Hadley said on CNN's "Late Edition."

"And the concern is that [interrogators] are being asked to take on very tough assignments. They want to be clear as to what is required, and they want it to be interpreted by U.S. law."

The two sides also dispute rules for prosecuting terrorist suspects in special tribunals, including whether the accused should have access to the U.S. government's classified evidence against them.

Bush announced two weeks ago that 14 terrorism suspects in CIA custody, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, had been transferred to Defense Department custody at the naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Negroponte's remarks confirmed that the questioning of those suspects had all but ceased by the time the Supreme Court issued its June ruling in the case of Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld, which essentially rejected the Bush administration argument that Al Qaeda suspects were unlawful combatants not entitled to Geneva protections.

Asked whether the CIA would interrogate any future captive in the fight against terrorism, Negroponte said, "That person may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques … may be problematic because of the uncertainty that has been introduced by the current situation."

McCain, In New Hampshire, Gets An Earful From The Right (NYT)

CONCORD, N.H., Sept. 17 — Senator John McCain, who is battling with the White House over the interrogation and trial of terrorism suspects, on Sunday flew to New Hampshire — and right into a blistering editorial from the conservative Manchester Union-Leader that assailed him for standing up to President Bush on the issue.

Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, responded with a spirited defense, invoking his experience as a prisoner of war as he vowed to block the White House effort.

"This issue is not them — this issue is about us," he said of terrorists, facing an audience sipping cocktails on a lush lawn next to a pool. "The United States has always been better than our enemies. I'll tell you right now: one of the things in prison, in North Vietnam, that kept us strong was that we knew we were not like our enemies. That we came from a better nation, with better values, with better standards."

After months of orchestrated peace, the battle with Mr. Bush over the administration's effort to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions has put Mr. McCain back into a familiar position: bucking the White House and at odds again with some conservatives, who had already been wary of his ideological views.

The dispute is shaping up as an early chapter in a shift of influence in the Republican Party away from Mr. Bush as he approaches the final two years of his administration, and toward its presidential nominee of 2008. And it is spotlighting divisions in the party as prospective presidential candidates jockey for support from the conservative wing.

One of them, Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, said in an interview that he disagreed with Mr. McCain, and offered a forceful endorsement of Mr. Bush.

"I am foursquare behind the president on this," Mr. Romney said. "I believe that we should do everything possible to support those people at the front line who are responsible for enforcing the war on terrorism."

Mr. McCain said Sunday that he was acting out of conscience, not political calculation, to reinforce an image of independence that has been questioned in recent months as he has supported Mr. Bush on issues like the war in Iraq. Still, he said his office had been deluged with critical phone calls, and that he had picked up enough buzz from conservative radio talk stations to conclude that he might have once again rattled his support among conservatives.

"I would imagine so," he said, riding in a helicopter rumbling over the New Hampshire hills as it took him to a Nascar race at the New Hampshire International Speedway. "The radio talk show hosts have already been very critical."

Mr. McCain appears to be in a strong position politically as he takes on this battle. He has methodically been signing up supporters in crucial states in preparation for a 2008 campaign, part of a strategy to create a stampede to his candidacy. Although Mr. Bush has sharply challenged Mr. McCain and the other senators supporting him in the debate on interrogation tactics, the president and his aides have taken care not to attack Mr. McCain, in clear deference to his position in the party.

"There is no acrimony with the White House," Mr. McCain said. "I certainly consider him a friend. And I hope he considers me as one. We just have a disagreement."

Dan Bartlett, the White House communications director, said, "We would agree and believe the close working relationship and constant communication has kept it strictly to a difference over substance, and nothing more."

Conservatives are another matter. Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, said conservatives would judge Mr. McCain on many issues, and that they did not expect to agree with a political leader on every issue — a reality he said Mr. McCain appreciated.

Still, many conservatives have criticized Mr. McCain for his support for campaign finance legislation, his backing of what they believe are permissive immigration laws, and now this. "The question is being asked: in the midst of the most difficult and challenging war we have ever faced, can the nation afford a President McCain?" The Union-Leader — the largest newspaper in the state, which holds the nation's first presidential primary — asked in a front-page editorial on Saturday. It was one of two editorials it published this weekend attacking Mr. McCain's views.

Mr. Romney has been making an increasingly vigorous challenge for conservative votes and is viewed by many Republicans as the strongest challenger to Mr. McCain, at least for now. He saw the interrogation debate as an opportunity to draw contrasts with Mr. McCain among conservative voters.

DOJ_NMG_0063721

Asked if this was his sharpest difference with Mr. McCain, Mr. Romney said: "No. There are a number of things. We have different views on McCain-Feingold, differing views on immigration policy, differing views on the interrogation of terrorists. There are also many other areas where we see eye to eye."

Told about Governor Romney's position on the treatment of terrorism suspects, Mr. McCain noted tartly, "He doesn't have a vote."

Mr. McCain said he was not overly concerned about the criticism. When an aide offered him a copy of the editorial as he rode in a car to the cocktail party here, he at first refused it, but a second later took it back and read it. And at the reception, he aggressively raised the issue, to decidedly light applause.

"We do not believe we should change the Geneva Conventions that we have adhered to for 57 years," he said. "I hold no brief for Al Qaeda. No."

"What is this all about?" he continued. "It's all about the United States of America and what is going to happen to Americans who are taken prisoner in future wars."

Mr. McCain's efforts have complicated one political component of the White House's strategy: trying to bait Democrats into a battle that might allow Republicans to portray them as weak on terrorism. But Mr. McCain said he had not heard any objection from the White House, on political grounds, about what he was trying to do.

"They know better than that," he said.

King Of Pain (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

A lot has been written and said about President Bush's demand that Congress "clarify" the part of the Geneva Conventions that, in effect, outlaws the use of torture under any circumstances.

We know that the world would see this action as a U.S. repudiation of the rules that bind civilized nations. We also know that an extraordinary lineup of former military and intelligence leaders, including Colin Powell, have spoken out against the Bush plan, warning that it would further damage America's faltering moral standing, and end up endangering U.S. troops.

But I haven't seen much discussion of the underlying question: why is Mr. Bush so determined to engage in torture?

Let's be clear what we're talking about here. According to an ABC News report from last fall, procedures used by C.I.A. interrogators have included forcing prisoners to "stand, handcuffed and with their feet shackled to an eye bolt in the floor for more than 40 hours"; the "cold cell," in which prisoners are forced "to stand naked in a cell kept near 50 degrees," while being doused with cold water; and, of course, water boarding, in which "the prisoner is bound to an inclined board, feet raised and head slightly below the feet," then "cellophane is wrapped over the prisoner's face and water is poured over him," inducing "a terrifying fear of drowning."

And bear in mind that the "few bad apples" excuse doesn't apply; these were officially approved tactics — and Mr. Bush wants at least some of these tactics to remain in use.

I'm ashamed that my government does this sort of thing. I'd be ashamed even if I were sure that only genuine terrorists were being tortured — and I'm not. Remember that the Bush administration has imprisoned a number of innocent men at Guantánamo, and in some cases continues to imprison them even though it knows they are innocent.

Is torture a necessary evil in a post-9/11 world? No. People with actual knowledge of intelligence work tell us that reality isn't like TV dramas, in which the good guys have to torture the bad guy to find out where he planted the ticking time bomb.

What torture produces in practice is misinformation, as its victims, desperate to end the pain, tell interrogators whatever they want to hear. Thus Ibn al-Shaykh al-Libi — who ABC News says was subjected to both the cold cell and water boarding — told his questioners that Saddam Hussein's regime had trained members of Al Qaeda in the use of biochemical weapons. This "confession" became a key part of the Bush administration's case for invading Iraq — but it was pure invention.

So why is the Bush administration so determined to torture people?

To show that it can.

The central drive of the Bush administration — more fundamental than any particular policy — has been the effort to eliminate all limits on the president's power. Torture, I believe, appeals to the president and the vice president precisely because it's a violation of both law and tradition. By making an illegal and immoral practice a key element of U.S. policy, they're asserting their right to do whatever they claim is necessary.

And many of our politicians are willing to go along. The Republican majority in the House of Representatives is poised to vote in favor of the administration's plan to, in effect, declare torture legal. Most Republican senators are equally willing to go along, although a few, to their credit, have stood with the Democrats in opposing the administration.

Mr. Bush would have us believe that the difference between him and those opposing him on this issue is that he's willing to do what's necessary to protect America, and they aren't. But the record says otherwise.

The fact is that for all his talk of being a "war president," Mr. Bush has been conspicuously unwilling to ask Americans to make sacrifices on behalf of the cause — even when, in the days after 9/11, the nation longed to be called to a higher purpose. His admirers looked at him and thought they saw Winston Churchill. But instead of offering us blood, toil, tears and sweat, he told us to go shopping and promised tax cuts.

Only now, five years after 9/11, has Mr. Bush finally found some things he wants us to sacrifice. And those things turn out to be our principles and our self-respect.

The Kafka Strategy (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

The president seemed about to lose it at times last week. He was fighting with everybody — tenacious reporters frustrated by the absence of straight answers about the treatment of terror suspects; key Republican senators who think it's crazy for a great country like the U.S. to become a champion of kangaroo courts and the degradation of defendants; even his own former secretary of state, Colin Powell, who worries that the world is coming to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

It seemed that the only people the president wasn't fighting with were the Democrats, who have gone into a coma, and the yahoos who never had much of a problem with such matters as torture and detention without trial.

As Marvin Gaye once sang, "What's going on?"

The people at the top are getting scared, that's what's going on. The fog of secrecy is lifting, and the Bush administration is frightened to death that it will eventually have to pay a heavy price for the human rights abuses it has ordered or condoned in its so-called war on terror.

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Geneva Conventions apply to the prisoners seized by the administration, which means that abusing those prisoners — as so many have said for so long — is unquestionably illegal. And there is also the possibility that the Democrats, if they ever wake up, may take control of at least one house of Congress, giving them the kind of subpoena power and oversight that makes the administration tremble.

Bush, Cheney & Co. are desperately trying to hold together a house of cards that is ready to collapse because their strategy and tactics for fighting terrorism were slapped together with no real regard for the rule of law. What we've seen over the past few years has been a nightmare version of the United States. Torture? Secret prisons? Capital trials in which key evidence is kept from the accused? That's the stuff of Kafka, not Madison and Jefferson.

The reason President Bush has been trying so frantically to get Congressional passage of his plan to interrogate and try terror suspects is that he needs its contorted interpretations of the law to keep important cases from falling apart, and to cover the collective keisters of higher-ups who may have authorized or condoned war crimes.

There's no guarantee that the administration can properly bring to justice even the worst of the bad guys, people like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and 13 other high-profile prisoners who were recently transferred from a secret C.I.A. program to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. These are men accused of the most heinous of offenses, crimes that would subject them to the death penalty.

But it's widely believed that some or all of them were tortured. In civilized countries, evidence obtained by torture is inadmissible in a court of law.

The Bush administration would also like to deny terror suspects, even those facing the death penalty, the right to see evidence against them that is classified. This is a concept that is so far beyond the pale it makes most legal scholars gasp.

"We don't charge people — particularly in capital offenses, but in minor offenses, as well — without letting them see the evidence that is being offered against them," said Scott Horton, a prominent New York attorney and Columbia law professor who has done extensive human rights work.

"Let's imagine you're a prosecutor," said Mr. Horton. "Are you going to seek the death penalty against someone and convict them and let them be sentenced to death without letting them know what the evidence is against them? No way. What prosecutor wants that?"

One of the biggest concerns of the administration is the possibility of evidence emerging that could lead to charges of war crimes against high-ranking officials. The president and others in the administration have argued that they are seeking changes in the law in order to protect soldiers and ordinary interrogators in the field against war crimes accusations.

But there are already clear guidelines — short of war crimes prosecutions — for dealing with soldiers and civilian interrogators who abuse prisoners. The Abu Ghraib prosecutions are a good example.

The people who would have to worry, if war crimes were found to have been committed, would be those at the top of the command structure who crafted policies that were illegal and ordered them carried out — or who turned a blind eye to atrocities.

"Those are the ones," said Mr. Horton, "who are vulnerable."

Call Cruelty What It Is (WP)

By Tom Malinowski

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

President Bush is urging Congress to let the CIA keep using "alternative" interrogation procedures -- which include, according to published accounts, forcing prisoners to stand for 40 hours, depriving them of sleep and use of the "cold cell," in which the prisoner is left naked in a cell kept near 50 degrees and doused with cold water.

Bush insists that these techniques are not torture -- after all, they don't involve pulling out fingernails or applying electric shocks. He even says that he "would hope" the standards he's proposing are adopted by other countries. But before he again invites America's enemies to use such "alternative" methods on captured Americans, he might benefit from knowing a bit of their historical origins and from hearing accounts of those who have experienced them. With that in mind, here are some suggestions for the president's reading list.

He might begin with Robert Conquest's classic work on Stalin, "The Great Terror." Conquest wrote: "When there was time, the basic [Soviet Secret police] method for obtaining confessions and breaking the accused man was the 'conveyor' -- continual interrogation by relays of police for hours and days on end. As with many phenomena of the Stalin period, it has the advantage that it could not easily be condemned by any simple principle. Clearly, it amounted to unfair pressure after a certain time and to actual physical torture later still, but when? . . . At any rate, after even twelve hours, it is extremely uncomfortable. After a day, it becomes very hard. And after two or three days, the victim is actually physically poisoned by fatigue. It was as painful as any torture."

Conquest stated: "Interrogation usually took place at night and with the accused just roused -- often only fifteen minutes after going to sleep. The glaring lights at the interrogation had a disorientating effect." He quoted a Czech prisoner, Evzen Loebl, who described "having to be on his feet eighteen hours a day, sixteen of which were devoted to interrogation. During the six-hour sleep period, the warder pounded on the door every ten minutes. . . . If the banging did not wake him, a kick from the warder would. After two or three weeks, his feet were swollen and every inch of his body ached at the slightest touch; even washing became a torture."

Conquest quoted a Polish prisoner, Z. Stypulkowski, from 1945: "Cold, hunger, the bright light and especially sleeplessness. The cold is not terrific. But when the victim is weakened by hunger and sleeplessness, then the six or seven degrees above the freezing point make him tremble all the time. . . . After fifty or sixty interrogations with cold and hunger and almost no sleep, a man becomes like an automaton -- his eyes are bright, his legs swollen, his hands trembling. In this state, he is often convinced he is guilty."

Next on the list: Aleksander Solzhenitsyn's "The Gulag Archipelago." Solzhenitsyn describes the experience of prisoner Anna Skripnikova in 1952: "Sivakov, Chief of the Investigative Department of the Ordzhonikidze State Security Administration, said to her: 'The prison doctor reports you have a blood pressure of 240/120. That's too low, you bitch! We're going to drive it up to 340 so you'll kick the bucket, you viper, and with no black and blue marks; no beatings; no broken bones. We'll just not let you sleep.' And if, back in her cell, after a night spent in interrogation, she closed her eyes during the day, the jailer broke in and shouted: 'Open your eyes or I'll haul you off that cot by the legs and tie you to the wall standing up."

Elsewhere, Solzhenitsyn writes: "Sleeplessness . . . befogs the reason, undermines the will, and the human being ceases to be himself, to be his own 'I.' "

Finally, the president might review the memoirs of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, who describes experiencing sleep deprivation in a Soviet prison in the 1940s: "In the head of the interrogated prisoner a haze begins to form. His spirit is wearied to death, his legs are unsteady, and he has one sole desire: to sleep, to sleep just a little, not to get up, to lie, to rest, to forget. . . . Anyone who has experienced this desire knows that not even hunger or thirst are comparable with it. . . . I came across prisoners who signed what they were ordered to sign, only to get what the interrogator promised them. He did not promise them their liberty. He promised them -- if they signed -- uninterrupted sleep!"

The Soviets understood that these methods were cruel. They were also honest with themselves about the purpose of such cruelty -- to brutalize their enemies and to extract false confessions, rather than truthful intelligence. By denying this, President Bush is not just misleading us. He appears to be deceiving himself.

U.S. War Prisons Legal Vacuum For 14,000 (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 18, 2006

In the few short years since the first shackled Afghan shuffled off to Guantanamo, the U.S. military has created a global network of overseas prisons, its islands of high security keeping 14,000 detainees beyond the reach of established law.

Disclosures of torture and long-term arbitrary detentions have won rebuke from leading voices including the U.N. secretary-general and the U.S. Supreme Court. But the bitterest words come from inside the system, the size of several major U.S. penitentiaries.

"It was hard to believe I'd get out," Baghdad shopkeeper Amjad Qassim al-Aliyawi told The Associated Press after his release — without charge — last month. "I lived with the Americans for one year and eight months as if I was living in hell."

Captured on battlefields, pulled from beds at midnight, grabbed off streets as suspected insurgents, tens of thousands now have passed through U.S. detention, the vast majority in Iraq.

Many say they were caught up in U.S. military sweeps, often interrogated around the clock, then released months or years later without apology, compensation or any word on why they were taken. Seventy to 90 percent of the Iraq detentions in 2003 were "mistakes," U.S. officers once told the international Red Cross.

Defenders of the system, which has only grown since soldiers' photos of abuse at Abu Ghraib shocked the world, say it's an unfortunate necessity in the battles to pacify Iraq and Afghanistan, and to keep suspected terrorists out of action.

Every U.S. detainee in Iraq "is detained because he poses a security threat to the government of Iraq, the people of Iraq or coalition forces," said U.S. Army Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a spokesman for U.S.-led military detainee operations in Iraq.

But dozens of ex-detainees, government ministers, lawmakers, human rights activists, lawyers and scholars in Iraq, Afghanistan and the United States said the detention system often is unjust and hurts the war on terror by inflaming anti-Americanism in Iraq and elsewhere.

Building for the Long Term

Reports of extreme physical and mental abuse, symbolized by the notorious Abu Ghraib prison photos of 2004, have abated as the Pentagon has rejected torture-like treatment of the inmates. Most recently, on Sept. 6, the Pentagon issued a new interrogation manual banning forced nakedness, hooding, stress positions and other abusive techniques.

DOJ_NMG_0063725

The same day, President Bush said the CIA's secret outposts in the prison network had been emptied, and 14 terror suspects from them sent to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to face trial in military tribunals. The U.S. Supreme Court has struck down the tribunal system, however, and the White House and Congress are now wrestling over the legal structure of such trials.

Living conditions for detainees may be improving as well. The U.S. military cites the toilets of Bagram, Afghanistan: In a cavernous old building at that air base, hundreds of detainees in their communal cages now have indoor plumbing and privacy screens, instead of exposed chamber pots.

Whatever the progress, small or significant, grim realities persist.

Human rights groups count dozens of detainee deaths for which no one has been punished or that were never explained. The secret prisons — unknown in number and location — remain available for future detainees. The new manual banning torture doesn't cover CIA interrogators. And thousands of people still languish in a limbo, deprived of one of common law's oldest rights, habeas corpus, the right to know why you are imprisoned.

"If you, God forbid, are an innocent Afghan who gets sold down the river by some warlord rival, you can end up at Bagram and you have absolutely no way of clearing your name," said John Sifton of Human Rights Watch in New York. "You can't have a lawyer present evidence, or do anything organized to get yourself out of there."

The U.S. government has contended it can hold detainees until the "war on terror" ends — as it determines.

"I don't think we've gotten to the question of how long," said retired admiral John D. Hutson, former top lawyer for the U.S. Navy. "When we get up to 'forever,' I think it will be tested" in court, he said.

The Navy is planning long-term at Guantanamo. This fall it expects to open a new, $30-million maximum-security wing at its prison complex there, a concrete-and-steel structure replacing more temporary camps.

In Iraq, Army jailers are a step ahead. Last month they opened a $60-million, state-of-the-art detention center at Camp Cropper, near Baghdad's airport. The Army oversees about 13,000 prisoners in Iraq at Cropper, Camp Bucca in the southern desert, and Fort Suse in the Kurdish north.

Neither prisoners of war nor criminal defendants, they are just "security detainees" held "for imperative reasons of security," spokesman Curry said, using language from an annex to a U.N. Security Council resolution authorizing the U.S. presence here.

Questions of Law, Sovereignty

President Bush laid out the U.S. position in a speech Sept. 6.

"These are enemy combatants who are waging war on our nation," he said. "We have a right under the laws of war, and we have an obligation to the American people, to detain these enemies and stop them from rejoining the battle."

But others say there's no need to hold these thousands outside of the rules for prisoners of war established by the Geneva Conventions.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan declared last March that the extent of arbitrary detention here is "not consistent with provisions of international law governing internment on imperative reasons of security."

Meanwhile, officials of Nouri al-Maliki's 4-month-old Iraqi government say the U.S. detention system violates Iraq's national rights.

"As long as sovereignty has transferred to Iraqi hands, the Americans have no right to detain any Iraqi person," said Fadhil al-Sharaa, an aide to the prime minister. "The detention should be conducted only with the permission of the Iraqi judiciary."

At the Justice Ministry, Deputy Minister Busho Ibrahim told AP it has been "a daily request" that the detainees be brought under Iraqi authority.

There's no guarantee the Americans' 13,000 detainees would fare better under control of the Iraqi government, which U.N. officials say holds 15,000 prisoners.

But little has changed because of these requests. When the Americans formally turned over Abu Ghraib prison to Iraqi control on Sept. 2, it was empty but its 3,000 prisoners remained in U.S. custody, shifted to Camp Cropper.

Life in Custody

The cases of U.S.-detained Iraqis are reviewed by a committee of U.S. military and Iraqi government officials. The panel recommends criminal charges against some, release for others. As of Sept. 9, the Central Criminal Court of Iraq had put 1,445 on trial, convicting 1,252. In the last week of August, for example, 38 were sentenced on charges ranging from illegal weapons possession to murder, for the shooting of a U.S. Marine.

Almost 18,700 have been released since June 2004, the U.S. command says, not including many more who were held and then freed by local military units and never shipped to major prisons.

Some who were released, no longer considered a threat, later joined or rejoined the insurgency.

The review process is too slow, say U.N. officials. Until they are released, often families don't know where their men are — the prisoners are usually men — or even whether they're in American hands.

Ex-detainee Mouayad Yasin Hassan, 31, seized in April 2004 as a suspected Sunni Muslim insurgent, said he wasn't allowed to obtain a lawyer or contact his family during 13 months at Abu Ghraib and Bucca, where he was interrogated incessantly. When he asked why he was in prison, he said, the answer was, "We keep you for security reasons."

Another released prisoner, Waleed Abdul Karim, 26, recounted how his guards would wield their absolute authority.

"Tell us about the ones who attack Americans in your neighborhood," he quoted an interrogator as saying, "or I will keep you in prison for another 50 years."

As with others, Karim's confinement may simply have strengthened support for the anti-U.S. resistance. "I will hate Americans for the rest of my life," he said.

As bleak and hidden as the Iraq lockups are, the Afghan situation is even less known. Accounts of abuse and deaths emerged in 2002-2004, but if Abu Ghraib-like photos from Bagram exist, none have leaked out. The U.S. military is believed holding about 500 detainees — most Afghans, but also apparently Arabs, Pakistanis and Central Asians.

The United States plans to cede control of its Afghan detainees by early next year, five years after invading Afghanistan to eliminate al-Qaida's base and bring down the Taliban government. Meanwhile, the prisoners of Bagram exist in a legal vacuum like that elsewhere in the U.S. detention network.

"There's been a silence about Bagram, and much less political discussion about it," said Richard Bennett, chief U.N. human rights officer in Afghanistan.

Freed detainees tell how in cages of 16 inmates they are forbidden to speak to each other. They wear the same orange jumpsuits and shaven heads as the terrorist suspects at Guantanamo, but lack even the scant legal rights granted inmates at that Cuba base. In some cases, they have been held without charge for three to four years, rights workers say.

Guantanamo received its first prisoners from Afghanistan — chained, wearing blacked-out goggles — in January 2002. A total of 770 detainees were sent there. Its population today of Afghans, Arabs and others, stands at 455.

Described as the most dangerous of America's "war on terror" prisoners, only 10 of the Guantanamo inmates have been charged with crimes. Charges are expected against 14 other al-Qaida suspects flown in to Guantanamo from secret prisons on Sept. 4.

Plans for their trials are on hold, however, because of a Supreme Court ruling in June against the Bush administration's plan for military tribunals.

The court held the tribunals were not authorized by the U.S. Congress and violated the Geneva Conventions by abrogating prisoners' rights. In a sometimes contentious debate, the White House and Congress are trying to agree on a new, acceptable trial plan.

Since the court decision, and after four years of confusing claims that terrorist suspects were so-called "unlawful combatants" unprotected by international law, the Bush administration has taken steps recognizing that the Geneva Conventions' legal and human rights do extend to imprisoned al-Qaida militants. At the same time, however, the new White House proposal on tribunals retains such controversial features as denying defendants access to some evidence against them.

In his Sept. 6 speech, Bush acknowledged for the first time the existence of the CIA's secret prisons, believed established at military bases or safehouses in such places as Egypt, Indonesia and eastern Europe. That network, uncovered by journalists, had been condemned by U.N. authorities and investigated by the Council of Europe.

The clandestine jails are now empty, Bush announced, but will remain a future option for CIA detentions and interrogation.

Louise Arbour, U.N. human rights chief, is urging Bush to abolish the CIA prisons altogether, as ripe for "abusive conduct." The CIA's techniques for extracting information from prisoners still remain secret, she noted.

Meanwhile, the U.S. government's willingness to resort to "extraordinary rendition," transferring suspects to other nations where they might be tortured, appears unchanged.

Prosecutions and Memories

The exposure of sadistic abuse, torture and death at Abu Ghraib two years ago touched off a flood of courts-martial of mostly lower-ranking U.S. soldiers. Overall, about 800 investigations of alleged detainee mistreatment in Iraq and Afghanistan have led to action against more than 250 service personnel, including 89 convicted at courts-martial, U.S. diplomats told the United Nations in May.

Critics protest that penalties have been too soft and too little has been done, particularly in tracing inhumane interrogation methods from the far-flung islands of the overseas prison system back to policies set by high-ranking officials.

In only 14 of 34 cases has anyone been punished for the confirmed or suspected killings of detainees, the New York-based Human Rights First reports. The stiffest sentence in a torture-related death has been five months in jail. The group reported last February that in almost half of 98 detainee deaths, the cause was either never announced or reported as undetermined.

Looking back, the United States overreacted in its treatment of detainees after Sept. 11, said Anne-Marie Slaughter, a noted American scholar of international law.

It was understandable, the Princeton University dean said, but now "we have to restore a balance between security and rights that is consistent with who we are and consistent with our security needs."

Otherwise, she said, "history will look back and say that we took a dangerous and deeply wrong turn."

Back here in Baghdad, at the Alawi bus station, a gritty, noisy hub far from the meeting rooms of Washington and Geneva, women gather with fading hopes whenever a new prisoner release is announced.

As she watched one recent day for a bus from distant Camp Bucca, one mother wept and told her story.

"The Americans arrested my son, my brother and his friend," said Zahraa Alyat, 42. "The Americans arrested them October 16, 2005. They left together and I don't know anything about them."

The bus pulled up. A few dozen men stepped off, some blindfolded, some bound, none with any luggage, none with familiar faces.

As the distraught women straggled away once more, one ex-prisoner, 18-year-old Bilal Kadhim Muhssin, spotted U.S. troops nearby.

"Americans," he muttered in fear. "Oh, my God, don't say that name," and he bolted for a city bus, and freedom.

Look Away! Look Away! (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

Either way you slice it, Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) argued last week that the South could have won the war between the states if the Confederates had just had better intelligence.

During Thursday's closed-door Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on trials, interrogation and detention of foreign terrorism suspects, Chambliss made an analogy between the current war on terror and the Civil War. He made the point that history would have been altered dramatically if only the South had had better intel.

Democratic sources expressed outrage that he compared the Civil War to the Bush administration's war on terror. "It's a little disgusting" to be equating the two, one Democratic source said, adding, "You can't figure out whether he didn't understand the Civil War, or the war on terror, or both."

When sources first contacted HOH, they thought they remembered Chambliss say, "We need better intelligence. If we had better intelligence in the Civil War we'd be quoting Jefferson Davis, not Lincoln."

Not quite, according to Chambliss spokeswoman Lindsay Mabry. She says what he really said was, "If Gen. JEB Stuart had had better intelligence, we'd all be meeting in Richmond right now."

No biggie, Mabry said. Her boss simply "made a historical analogy" that "intelligence is important to ultimate victory in wartime. And the side that knows better wins."

Sen. Macaca? A party's never a party until the host insults one of the guests. Such was the case Thursday at the anniversary party for "The Chris Matthews Show" on the tented rooftop of The Hay-Adams hotel.

The hyperactive TV gabber got up to thank everyone for coming out to celebrate his Sunday morning show's success. Suddenly he got that boyishly devilish grin — you know the one — and stopped mid-sentence to send a shout-out to Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

Allen had that deer-in-the-headlights look as the entire party stood at attention. Matthews continued, "I'm not going to call you Sen. Ma... ." He paused a beat, then continued his joke with, "Caucasian."

The term he didn't call Allen would have been "macaca," the one word Allen wishes he had never uttered. The Senator has been dogged by critical media coverage, including on Matthews' MSNBC show "Hardball," for weeks now, ever since he referred to a young Indian-American staffer on the campaign of his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, as "macaca," a word that can mean monkey.

Allen's spokesman wouldn't directly address what the Senator thought of Matthews' joke, saying only, "Sen. Allen was happy to go by and congratulate Chris on a successful five years."

Senator Slams Tom Cruise. Actress Brooke Shields has a friend in Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.).

Smith, chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Aging, slammed actor Tom Cruise for criticizing Shields' use of the antidepressant Paxil when she suffered from postpartum depression. The comments by Cruise — an adherent of the Church of Scientology, which frowns on the use of antidepressants — were widely criticized as unscientific and potentially harmful to women who have the condition.

During Thursday's hearing on senior suicide, Gordon posed a non sequitur question to guest David Steffens, head of geriatric psychiatry at Duke University Medical Center.

"Would you agree with me: Tom Cruise is a great actor?" Gordon, tongue-in-cheek, asked his witness.

"He is a fantastic actor," Steffens replied, kind of chuckling.

"What kind of a mental health physician do you think he is?"

"I think that ... um," Steffens wasn't really sure how to answer, though before Smith posed the question a different way, Steffens said, "I think he needs to be better informed."

"Is postpartum depression real? Is it a legitimate medical condition?"

"Yes, sir," Steffens replied.

"Bipolar condition — is that a real condition?"

"Yes, sir."

"How about schizophrenia?"

"Yes, sir," the doctor responded.

"And they're identifiable medical conditions with treatments?" the Senator asked.

"Yes, sir, very effective treatments."

"I wanted that on the record," Smith said.

OK, there you have it, Brooke. Smith is on your side, too.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bid To Stockpile Bioterror Drugs Stymied By Setbacks (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

DOJ_NMG_0063729

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — The last of the anthrax-laced letters was still making its way through the mail in late 2001 when top Bush administration officials reached an obvious conclusion: the nation desperately needed to expand its medical stockpile to prepare for another biological attack.

The result was Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion effort to exploit the country's top medical and scientific brains and fill an emergency medical cabinet with new drugs and vaccines for a host of threats. "We will rally the great promise of American science and innovation to confront the greatest danger of our time," President Bush said in starting the program.

But the project, critics say, has largely failed to deliver.

So far, only a small fraction of the anticipated remedies are available. Drug companies have waited months, if not years, for government agencies to decide which treatments they want and in what quantities. Unable to attract large pharmaceutical corporations to join the endeavor, the government is instead relying on small start-up companies that often have no proven track record.

The troubles have been most acute with the highest priority of all: a $900 million push to add a new anthrax vaccine to the stockpile. What had begun as an effort to test and manufacture a safer, faster-acting vaccine has turned into an ugly battle between two biotech businesses.

Each has hired Washington lobbyists to attack its rival's product and try to win over lawmakers and administration officials. Delivery of the new vaccine is far behind schedule, and a dispute between the Department of Health and Human Services and VaxGen, the company chosen to make the vaccine, could even end the deal. The only doses that have been added to the stockpile are of a decades-old vaccine that has generated complaints of serious side effects.

Health department officials acknowledge some problems but say they have made progress. "Medical discovery is an unpredictable process," said Bill Hall, a spokesman. "It is the nature of science."

But some companies on the sidelines say the experience with the anthrax vaccine is exactly why they do not want to do business with Washington. Once optimistic about the president's promise, many biotech companies and public health experts are now discouraged.

"The inept implementation of the program has led the best brains and the best scientists to give up, to look elsewhere or devote their resources to medical initiatives that are not focused on biodefense," said Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland.

Even some former department officials who helped create BioShield are dismayed.

"I find this all rather repugnant," said D. A. Henderson, a former top bioterrorism official. "You have people here who, in the face of a problem of serious import, are using every tactic they can to line their own pockets." Risk and Disappointment

From the start, officials in Washington knew that Project BioShield would be a risky venture — for the government, the companies involved and even ordinary Americans, who might be asked to take relatively untested treatments in an emergency.

Officials hoped $5.6 billion in federal money would entice companies to develop new drugs and vaccines for anthrax, smallpox, botulism, Ebola and other deadly diseases.

Because of the perceived urgency of the threat, the project suspends some traditional standards. It allows new vaccines or drugs to be used in emergencies before completing the lengthy Food and Drug Administration approval process. Full testing on humans is also not required because it is too dangerous, even though that means no one will know with certainty whether the vaccines will work until used in a crisis.

For their part, the companies have to take all the risks of developing and manufacturing new products; they get paid only upon delivery.

At the top of the government's threat list was anthrax, which killed five people, created panic and disrupted the mail system after letters filled with the powder were sent through the mail. No one has been charged in the attacks, which affected places including a tabloid publication in Florida, a New York television network and several lawmakers' offices on Capitol Hill.

"The top three threats, in fact, are anthrax, anthrax, anthrax," Dr. Gerald Parker, a senior health agency official, said in an interview. If properly dispersed through the air, just a few hundred pounds of anthrax powder could endanger tens of thousands of people.

After the letter attacks, the health agency bought enough antibiotics for 41 million Americans, but the recommended treatment augments those drugs with a vaccine. The government already had an anthrax vaccine to inoculate military personnel, but it involved six shots over 18 months, an unusually long course of treatment. While the F.D.A. says it is safe and effective, it can have nasty side effects. There have been reports among military personnel of six deaths and serious complications, including lymphoma and multiple sclerosis. The military stopped mandatory vaccinations in 2004 after some soldiers balked and filed lawsuits.

"It is 1950's technology," said Dr. Philip K. Russell, the former acting director of the office that started Project BioShield. "We don't drive Model T Fords anymore."

The first disappointment with the new anthrax vaccine occurred in early 2004 when bids to test and manufacture it came in. None were from big pharmaceutical companies; they considered the effort unappealing because the potential market was relatively small and profits limited. They were also concerned about liability if someone became ill or died after being inoculated. Project BioShield did not offer immunity from lawsuits.

That left a handful of companies in the running, relatively small outfits with limited experience. VaxGen, for example, had never taken a drug to market. Its first major product, an AIDS vaccine, flopped in 2003. The company also had financial troubles; it was barred from Nasdaq in 2004 after managers uncovered accounting errors.

The situation was hardly ideal, federal health officials acknowledged.

"We are going to be working consistently with these smaller firms, and it's going to require an enormous amount of government effort to get this product licensed," said Stewart Simonson, then an assistant health secretary overseeing the anthrax vaccine effort.

VaxGen argues that a company does not have to be large to successfully produce a vaccine. "We've repeatedly demonstrated that we have the capacity, expertise and infrastructure to meet the government's needs," said Lance Ignon, a vice president of the company, which is based in Brisbane, Calif.

Instead of hedging its bets by dividing the work among several vendors, Health and Human Services awarded the entire $887 million order to VaxGen. It was to produce 75 million doses, enough to inoculate 25 million Americans.

That decision fed doubts about Project BioShield in Congress and drew loud complaints that would grow into sharp opposition from Emergent BioSolutions, the maker of the old vaccine, which is based in Gaithersburg, Md.

Then known as BioPort and based in Lansing, Mich., the company did not submit a bid for the new vaccine. Instead, it had been trying for months to persuade the federal government to buy hundreds of millions of dollars of the existing vaccine, its only major product. When executives learned that one competitor was getting all the work, they knew the company's future was in peril.

Soon, though, they found an important weapon for a campaign to recapture business.

Competition Heats Up

VaxGen's vaccine was based on a modified version of the old one; Army scientists had genetically re-engineered it in hopes of making it safer and faster, with three shots instead of six. But VaxGen tests in early 2005 showed that an ingredient added to the vaccine caused it to decompose. It would not survive long in the emergency stockpile.

VaxGen officials played down the setback, which delayed delivery to 2007 from 2006. "We are being called on to develop a vaccine in roughly half the time it normally takes," Mr. Ignon said. "When you do that, you have to accept the fact that there are going to be some unexpected turns."

But Emergent officials capitalized on VaxGen's stumble. They had already gotten health agency officials to agree to buy five million doses of their vaccine to add to the stockpile. Now they began pushing for a much larger deal, possibly replacing VaxGen's vaccine altogether, company documents show.

To lead its lobbying effort, which has cost more than $1 million since 2005, Emergent turned to Jerome M. Hauer, a top official at the health department until late 2003. While at the agency, he supported the push for a new vaccine. Now he was trying to persuade Congress and his former employer to buy the old vaccine.

Explaining his shift, Mr. Hauer said VaxGen's problems convinced him that Emergent's vaccine was the best choice. In retrospect, he said, "The advice we were given was wrong."

Emergent hired nearly a dozen other lobbyists, some of whom had similarly useful connections. They included John M. Clerici, a lawyer who had helped shape the BioShield legislation; John Hishta, former chief of staff to Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia; and Allen Shofe, a former tobacco industry lobbyist.

The lobbyists argued that quality control problems at Emergent's plant in Michigan had been corrected and that reports of serious side effects from the vaccine were unfounded. But mostly, they tried to undermine confidence in VaxGen.

In a series of meetings with lawmakers and administration officials, they attacked their rival. "VaxGen has a history of failure and irregularities," their briefing books said. "VaxGen has never produced an F.D.A.-approved product," and its "vaccine is based on unproven technology," leaving "the health and protection of the American public on a company with a history of scientific failure and financial scandal."

The lobbyists also criticized the officials involved in administering BioShield. In speeches and news interviews, Mr. Hauer questioned the credentials of Mr. Simonson, the health department official in charge of the program, and once called him the "Mike Brown of H.H.S.," a reference to the disgraced former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. (Mr. Simonson, who resigned this year, had worked as an Amtrak lawyer and as legal counsel to Gov. Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin, who was later head of the federal health department.)

The lobbyists also charged that Dr. Russell, who helped start Project BioShield, had a conflict of interest. They said he had helped develop the vaccine as former director of the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research and then been instrumental in awarding the manufacturing contract after moving to the health department. (Dr. Russell says he retired from the Army before it began research on the VaxGen vaccine.)

Fearful of losing the public relations battle, VaxGen increased its own lobbying effort. It hired Robert Housman, who had worked with Mr. Hauer to help Emergent open its anti-VaxGen campaign and then switched sides. But VaxGen, which spent $200,000 on lobbying last year, was outmanned by Emergent and put on the defensive.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, an Iowa Republican and focus of Emergent's lobbying, sent a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt that closely echoed criticisms of VaxGen that had first been raised in Emergent documents.

Representative Davis scheduled a hearing last summer at which Emergent's chief executive was invited to testify, but no one was invited from VaxGen. Mr. Davis said Mr. Hishta, his former aide, apparently did contact his office about Emergent. But he said he was not sure why only Emergent was asked to testify.

Under pressure from Congress, the health agency agreed in May to double its order of Emergent's vaccine to 10 million doses, worth $243 million. The next day, health officials demanded what VaxGen says are additional safety and efficacy tests that will further delay delivery by a year or two. Threatening to sue, VaxGen is seeking upfront payments from the health department or other concessions. If no agreement is reached, company officials say, the entire deal could collapse.

"We understand this program is new and changes will have to be made," said Piers Whitehead, a vice president of VaxGen. "But in our case, the goalposts were moved much farther than they needed to be."

Words of Determination

Health officials said they were determined to see the anthrax contract — and other BioShield endeavors — through to the end.

"There are people out there who feel like they are not getting a piece of the pie or that this is not running the right way," said Mr. Hall, the department spokesman. "That may be. But to come in and criticize BioShield as a failing program because we have not spent all the money and don't have all the products in the warehouse is completely and sorely misguided."

The maneuvering has been so intense, with lobbyists and media consultants helping the companies undermine the competition, even some of the people who have profited now express disgust.

"This ought be driven by the science, by efficacy and threat, not lobbyists," Mr. Housman said. "It has been shanghaied. And the implication is our national security is compromised."

Next week, agency officials will meet with industry representatives to discuss a new strategy for Project BioShield. Mr. Greenberger, the University of Maryland expert, and others argue that government agencies must determine more quickly what is needed for the stockpile and provide more financial incentives to lure the big companies and better support the start-up companies.

Some in Congress say the improvements are much needed because Project BioShield has proven so disappointing.

"A torturous labyrinth of federal fiefdoms into which billions disappear," Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said of the program. "Yet few antidotes have yet to emerge."

Bluegill On Guard In Region's Water Supply (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

The bluegill is a freshwater fish of many talents, able to elude predators by hiding in submerged tree stumps and to survive for weeks without food.

Now, with the help of a scientific contraption developed by the U.S. Army and a private company, the fish also is keeping vigil over the Washington region's water supplies, where it might be able to save millions of lives in the event of a terrorist attack.

The scaly sentinels are a key component of the IAC 1090 Intelligent Aquatic Biomonitoring System, a new water-monitoring device that electronically analyzes the behavior of eight captive bluegills to detect the presence of chemical toxins or other contaminants. The system is also in use in New York City and San Francisco.

If the fish show signs of distress in response to something in the water, the system automatically trips an alarm, takes samples, and summons authorities by e-mail and pager so that they can investigate whether there is a threat to humans. It costs $45,000 to $110,000.

"We're basically using it as part of an early-warning contaminant-monitoring system for water in the national capital region," said Stuart A. Freudberg, director of environmental programs for the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments. "This is another tool in the arsenal, if you will, that water utilities use to make sure the water in this region is safe."

Freudberg said the system has been in place for at least six months and monitors water for a number of Washington area utilities serving 4.5 million people. He declined to reveal how many devices are in place, citing security needs.

Ever since Sept. 11, 2001, governments at all levels have sought ways to deter and defend against the next terrorist attack. One scenario that officials fear is an attempt by terrorists to dump chemicals or other toxic agents into the water supply, an attack that could kill or sicken millions of people.

Utilities have always taken routine steps to ensure the quality of the water they provide, including the regular testing of samples and the treatment of water to kill pathogens. Such measures continue, and experts point out that poisoning a city's water supply would be difficult because the sheer volume would dilute and overwhelm most chemicals. Yet the risk of such an attack has prompted officials to search for every tool they can find.

For the past six months, the San Francisco Public Utilities Commission has used bluegills in its treatment plant south of the city to monitor water provided to about half of its 2.4 million customers, spokesman Tony Winnicker said.

"It's another layer of protection," he said. "The fish are extremely sensitive to minute changes in the source water quality, so even if we don't know what the fish react to, we know that they are reacting to something. . . . With traditional sampling, you can only find what you are looking for. The fish might pick up something that you are maybe not specifically looking for."

The biomonitoring system is a 2-by-3-foot device developed for commercial use by Intelligent Automation Corp. of Poway, Calif., with technology patented by the Army. The device resembles a luggage trunk shot through with cables and tubes and hooked up to a monitor.

Eight juvenile bluegills swim in a row of solitary compartments the size of a large mail slot, each fish submersed in piped-in water and separated from the others by a pane of frosted glass. Electrodes attached to each compartment convey data about the fish's movements and breathing patterns to a nearby computer, which monitors the data and sounds the alarm if at least six of the fish show signs of distress.

"It's kind of similar to a doctor putting a stethoscope on your chest -- it's to look for something that's not normal," said Tom Shedd, a research biologist with the U.S. Army Center for Environmental Health Research at Fort Detrick, who helped invent the system. "It's the same thing here, only what you are looking at is . . . the breathing apparatus of the fish."

The sensors do not touch the bluegills' chests, of course, Shedd said. Instead, when the fish use muscles to breathe, the action sends a low-level electrical impulse through the water that can be picked up by the two electrodes attached to each fish chamber. From those signals, scientists can tell how quickly and deeply the fish are breathing and can detect when they "cough," or try to discharge an irritant from their gills, Shedd said. All of which, along with the fish's movements, can signal the presence of a toxin.

The system uses bluegills because the fish are sedentary, Shedd said, and because the Environmental Protection Agency has a "huge" database showing how various toxins affect them. Although adult bluegills can grow to be 13 inches long, the system relies on juveniles that are generally no longer than four inches. It requires that they remain in the chamber, unfed, for two-to-three-week tours of duty, Shedd said.

Such conditions do not upset the fish, said William A. Lawler, an executive with Intelligent Automation, who noted that the system wouldn't work if the device itself made the fish agitated. "We want them very calm and very happy," he said. "We're monitoring against stress."

The company's key contribution was to add software that automated the analysis of the raw data and the sending of alerts, because scientists cannot be on hand all the time, Lawler said.

The system can monitor either untreated or treated water as long as chlorine is removed. It also can be configured to directly measure water temperature and acidity, which can agitate fish without posing a threat to humans. The system cannot detect bacteria such as anthrax, E.coli and fecal coliform, but utilities have other tests for such things, Lawler said.

So far none of the municipal systems has found signs of a terrorist attack, although a few have had alerts for disruptions in algae levels and the like, officials said. One city received an alert after janitors opened the device to check on the fish, spooking them, Lawler said.

More serious was the "substantial alarm" at Fort Detrick in the spring of 2004, when fish at the facility's water treatment plant on the Monocacy River signaled a problem, Shedd said. The fish died, and testing showed the presence of materials typically used in pesticides and herbicides. Officials never found the source, but the toxins never got into the drinking water.

"We had confidence that that didn't take place," Shedd said.

Lawler said the bluegills don't always have to give their lives to be of service. "The idea is to prevent harm to the fish and get a handle on something before there is a problem," he said.

The Path To Hysteria (WSJ)

By Cyrus Nowrasteh

I am neither an activist, politician or partisan, nor an ideologue of any stripe. What I am is a writer who takes his job very seriously, as do most of my colleagues: Also, one who recently took on the most distressing and important story it will ever fall to me to tell. I considered it a privilege when asked to write the script for "The Path to 9/11." I felt duty-bound from the outset to focus on a single goal -- to represent our recent pre-9/11 history as the evidence revealed it to be. The American people deserve to know that history: They have paid for it in blood. Like all Americans, I wish it were not so. I wish there were no terrorists. I wish there had been no 9/11. I wish we could squabble among ourselves in assured security. But wishes avail nothing.

My Iranian parents fled tyranny and oppression. I know and appreciate deeply the sanctuary America has offered. Only in this country could a person such as I have had the life, liberty and opportunity that I have had. No one needs to remind me of this -- I know it every single day. I know, too, as does everyone involved in the production, that we kept uppermost in our minds the need for due diligence in the delivery of this history. Fact-checkers and lawyers scrutinized every detail, every line, every scene. There were hundreds of pages of annotations. We were informed by multiple advisers and interviews with people involved in the events -- and books, including in a most important way the 9/11 Commission Report.

It would have been good to be able to report due diligence on the part of those who judged the film, the ones who held forth on it before watching a moment of it. Instead, in the rush to judgment, and the effort to portray the series as the work of a right-wing zealot, much was made of my "friendship" with Rush Limbaugh (a connection limited to two social encounters), but nothing of any acquaintance with well-known names on the other side of the political spectrum. No reference to Abby Mann, for instance, with whom I worked on "10,000 Black Men Named George" (whose hero is an African-American communist) or Oliver Stone, producer of "The Day Reagan Was Shot," a film I wrote and directed. Clearly, those enraged that a film would criticize the Clinton administration's antiterrorism policies -- though critical of its successor as well -- were willing to embrace only one scenario: The writer was a conservative hatchetman. * * *

In July a reporter asked if I had ever been ethnically profiled. I happily replied, "No." I can no longer say that. The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. To them I was an Iranian-American politically conservative Muslim. It is perhaps irrelevant in our brave new world of journalism that I was born in Boulder, Colo. I am not a Muslim or practitioner of any religion, nor am I a political conservative. What am I? I am, most devoutly, an American. I asked the reporter if this kind of labeling was a new policy for the paper. He had no response.

The hysteria engendered by the series found more than one target. In addition to the death threats and hate mail directed at me, and my grotesque portrayal as a maddened right-winger, there developed an impassioned search for incriminating evidence on everyone else connected to the film. And in director David Cunningham, the searchers found paydirt! His father had founded a Christian youth outreach mission. The whiff of the younger Mr. Cunningham's possible connection to this enterprise was enough to set the hounds of suspicion baying. A religious mission! A New York Times reporter wrote, without irony or explanation, that an issue that raised questions about the director was his involvement in his father's outreach work. In the era of McCarthyism, the merest hint of a connection to communism sufficed to inspire dark accusations, the certainty that the accused was part of a malign conspiracy. Today, apparently, you can get something of that effect by charging a connection with a Christian mission.

"The Path to 9/11" was intended to remind us of the common enemy we face. Like the 9/11 Report itself, it is meant to enable us to better defend ourselves from a future attack. Past is prologue, and 9/11 is merely another step in an escalating Islamic fundamentalist reign of terror. By dramatizing the step-by-step increase in attacks on America -- all of which, in fact, occurred -- we are better able to see the pattern and anticipate the future. That was the point of the series, its only intention. Call it the canary in the coal mine. Call it John O'Neill in the FBI.

Despite intense political pressure to pull the film right up until airtime, Disney/ABC stood tall and refused to give in. For this -- for not buckling to threats from Democratic senators threatening to revoke ABC station licenses -- Disney CEO Rober Iger and ABC executives deserve every commendation. Hence the 28 million viewers over two nights, and the ratings victory Monday night (little reported by the media), are gratifying indeed.

"The Path to 9/11" was set in the time before the event, and in a world in which no party had the political will to act. The principals did not know then what we know now. It is also indisputable that Bill Clinton entered office a month before the first attack on the World Trade Center. Eight years then went by, replete with terrorist assaults on Americans and American interests overseas. George W. Bush was in office eight months before 9/11. Those who actually watched the entire miniseries know that he was given no special treatment.

It's good to have come to something approaching the end of this saga, whose lessons are worth remembering. It gave us, for one thing, a heartening glimpse (these things don't come along every day) of corporate backbone in the face of phenomenal pressure -- and an infinitely more chilling one testifying to the power and reach of politically driven hysteria. A ripe subject for a miniseries, if ever there was one.

Mr. Nowrasteh wrote the screenplay for "The Path to 9/11."

Freedom Tower Moves Closer To Being Filled Despite Hurdles (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- New York state and the federal government have moved closer to committing to help fill the long-troubled Freedom Tower, the iconic skyscraper planned at the World Trade Center site. The moves are necessary to make the $2 billion tower financially viable, but several hurdles remain to secure actual leases.

New York state's Office of General Services has signed a nonbinding "term sheet" that will be the basis for negotiations to take 415,000 square feet in the 2.6-million-square-foot tower. The agency, which is the state government's property manager, would pay an initial annual rent of $59 a square foot. The lease would last 15 years. The term sheet includes an option for the state to expand to one million square feet over 50 years.

Meantime, the federal government's property-management arm, the General Services Administration, has signed the third in a series of nonbinding "memorandums of agreement" to take 600,000 square feet in the Freedom Tower. This latest document specifies the initial rent, also $59 a square foot. A final deal would likely need congressional approval.

The rent represents a substantial premium to current rental rates in lower Manhattan. Average rents for office space downtown were $35.18 in the second quarter, according to real-estate brokerage Cushman & Wakefield Inc. Moody's Investors Service signed a lease to take 15 floors in the rebuilt 7 World Trade Center for the high-$30 to low-$40-a-square-foot range, after government incentives that apply to the Freedom Tower, which is scheduled to open in 2012.

If the state and federal commitments turn into actual leases, it would put the Freedom Tower on stronger financial footing, since the leases can be used as collateral to back construction bonds. The project will be paid for with insurance proceeds and money the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey collects from tolls at its bridges and tunnels.

The project appears to be gaining political support, too. New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the leading candidate in New York's coming gubernatorial election, who in the past has derided the Freedom Tower as a "white elephant," called Sunday's announcement a "crucial step in ensuring the financial viability of the Freedom Tower."

The Freedom Tower rentals are one piece of a larger rebuilding pact under negotiation and meant to be finalized later this week. That plan would divide responsibility for building the site's five towers and retail mall between private developer Larry Silverstein and the site's owner, the Port Authority.

A joint announcement by New York Gov. George E. Pataki, New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine, and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, indicates that despite bickering, the sides involved in the rebuilding seem to be working hard to finalize an overall rebuilding pact by Thursday's Port Authority board meeting. Gov. Pataki, in a statement Sunday said the deal helps "ensure downtown's future as the financial capital of the world."

It is unclear if the new World Trade Center will attract private business. The only tentative commitments to fill space there have been from government agencies. In addition to the state and federal governments, the Port Authority and New York City are negotiating to lease 1.2 million square feet in one of the smaller office towers at the site, which will be controlled by Mr. Silverstein. People familiar with the negotiations say the parties are close to agreeing on rents in the high-$50-a-square-foot range.

WAR NEWS:

Officials Deny Plans For Baghdad Berms (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah

USA Today, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's Defense Ministry said Sunday that plans to fortify the 28 entrances to Baghdad do not include encircling the city with trenches, as has been reported.

Col. Qassim Atta, a ministry spokesman, denied that Iraqi and U.S. forces planned to set up a perimeter of new trenches and berms to try to staunch one of the bloodiest periods in the capital since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

“The 28 entrances to Baghdad will be tightly controlled by the Iraqi police,” Atta said. “But to besiege Baghdad with trenches is total exaggeration.”

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman here, said the plan had been “mischaracterized” in the media. “There are plans for a security belt around Baghdad in order to constrict movement through authorized checkpoints,” he said. “This will help stem the flow of criminal activity in and out of the city, such as transporting illegal weapons and kidnap victims. This has been mischaracterized by some media as a giant trench around the city. This is not what's happening.”

Johnson said existing barriers such as canals and ditches “will be tied together with new obstacles to keep traffic moving through manned checkpoints … to reduce violence in Baghdad.”

On Sunday, more violence rocked the capital, where the Associated Press reported more than 180 people had died since Wednesday. A bomb left in a plastic bag exploded on the commercial Jumhouriyah Street in central Baghdad. Two people were killed and eight were wounded, police 1st Lt. Ahmed Mohammed Ali said.

Also, the bullet-riddled bodies of four unidentified men were found in separate neighborhoods in eastern Baghdad. All were blindfolded and had their hands and legs tied, police Maj. Mahir Hamad Mussa said.

Brig. Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf al-Kenani, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the plan to secure Baghdad with a perimeter of trenches and berms had been floated — and rejected.

"Gen. Rashid Flayeh, the commander of the Iraqi police commandos, suggested this idea," al-Kenani said. "We made a mistake of talking about it to the media because this idea has been rejected by the ministry. … A plan like this is very difficult to be applied in a big city like Baghdad."

Saleh al-Mutlaq, head of the National Dialogue Front, the second-largest Sunni Arab party, said trying to protect Baghdad from insurgents by surrounding the city won't address the problem of violence from within.

"The booby-trapped cars don't come from outside Baghdad only," he said in a phone interview from the United Arab Emirates. "The gangs of death squads exist inside Baghdad."

Al-Mutlaq said money that would have been used to build a security perimeter should be directed to improving services and helping the poor.

"What is the meaning of digging trenches around Baghdad?" asked Hassan Rashid, 42, who runs a clothing shop in central Baghdad. "Are the Persians or Greeks going to invade Baghdad on their horses? Why don't they build hospitals and restore the local services instead of digging trenches?"

Ammar Ahmad, 31, who works in the Ministry of Trade, said the security problem in Baghdad could be solved only by political, not military, measures.

"Surrounding Baghdad with trenches is one of the funniest jokes I have ever heard," he said. "The danger coming from Baghdad is not from outside. The problem is between the politicians."

Blasts In Kirkuk Kill 27; Police Bureau Destroyed (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 17 -- A wave of seven suicide car bombs and explosions rocked the oil-rich city of Kirkuk on Sunday, killing at least 26 people and wounding 85 others, police said.

The restive northern city -- considered a likely flash point for sectarian violence because of its combustible mix of Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens -- declared a state of emergency and hastily put up dozens of checkpoints to thwart further attacks, police Maj. Jalal Mahmood Aras said.

The attacks were the most recent bloodshed in a bitter struggle between Arabs and Kurds to take control of Kirkuk, the country's third-largest city. Iraq's new constitution calls for a referendum to determine whether the Kirkuk region will become a part of the Kurdish north.

In the deadliest attack, a suicide truck bomb exploded about 10 a.m. outside the Kirkuk police department's bureau of major crimes, which is between the offices of the country's two major Kurdish parties. The blast killed 18 people and wounded 58, said Maj. Gen. Hazim al-Khazraji, the general inspector of the Kirkuk police.

"The explosion was so big that it flattened the whole bureau building to the ground," Khazraji said from the hospital, where he was being treated for injuries suffered during the attack.

Minutes later, two blasts targeting police patrols in southern and central Kirkuk killed one person and wounded 12 others, Khazraji said.

Another car bomb exploded in front of the house of Sheik Wassfy al-Assy, a tribal leader who has called for the release of Saddam Hussein. Two people were killed and five others wounded, police Col. Taha Salahaldeen said.

Two minutes later, a remote-controlled car bomb exploded near a security company in central Kirkuk, killing two people and wounding three. As U.S. forces gathered at the scene, a suicide bomber exploded his Toyota near the crowd, killing three people and wounding seven others, police Capt. Farhad Mahmood said.

The string of attacks in Kirkuk came as police in Baghdad reported the discovery of 24 bullet-riddled corpses that had been dumped in various parts of the capital. Armed men also assassinated Muhammad Shihab al-Dulaimi, an official with the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni political bloc in parliament, while he was driving his car in the capital's Mansoor district, said Brig. Gen. Fadhil Abdul Muhsin of the Interior Ministry.

In Fallujah, a volatile city in the Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold of western Anbar province, two suicide car bombs exploded within minutes as the drivers tried to ram into a U.S. military base, killing at least three Iraqi police officers and wounding five others, police Capt. Ammar Yasser Halbousy said.

Al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility for the two attacks in a statement distributed at mosques in Fallujah.

U.S. forces sealed off the entrances to the city and imposed a curfew on some neighborhoods. Messages blasted on loudspeakers warned residents to remain in their homes until further notice.

Also on Sunday, tribal leaders in Anbar province denied news reports that local chieftains had gathered recently and agreed to join forces to fight al-Qaeda.

"All the talk and rumors that you may hear about alliances or new initiatives to wipe out al-Qaeda by the tribes in Anbar is all pure nonsense," Sheik Faraj Khalid Essawi said. "We wish that we could build a strong tribal alliance against al-Qaeda to defeat them and reestablish security in our area and rebuild the dignity and the stature of the tribal sheiks. But frankly, we are unable to stand up to or to confront al-Qaeda because even the American army itself has not succeed in defeating it."

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced that a sailor assigned to the 1st Marine Logistics Group died Saturday from combat injuries in Anbar province.

Most Tribes In Anbar Agree To Unite Against Insurgents (NYT)

By Khalid Al-Ansary And Ali Adeeb

BAGHDAD, Sept. 17 — Nearly all the tribes from Iraq's volatile Sunni-dominated Anbar Province have agreed to join forces and fight Al Qaeda insurgents and other foreign-backed "terrorists," an influential tribal leader said Sunday. Iraqi government leaders encouraged the movement.

Twenty-five of about 31 tribes in Anbar, a vast, mostly desert region that stretches westward from Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, have united against insurgents and gangs that are "killing people for no reason," said the tribal leader, Sheik Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi.

"We held a meeting earlier and agreed to fight those who call themselves mujahadeen," Mr. Rishawi said in an interview. "We believe that there is a conspiracy against our Iraqi people. Those terrorists claimed that they are fighters working on liberating Iraq, but they turned out to be killers. Now all the people are fed up and have turned against them."

It is unclear how quickly or forcefully the tribal fighters will confront Al Qaeda and other insurgents, who mostly operate in and around the provincial capital, Ramadi, despite recurrent American military efforts to stop them. But for American and Iraqi officials, who have tried to persuade the Sunni Arab majority in Anbar to reject the insurgency and embrace Iraqi nationalism , Mr. Rishawi's comments are seen as an encouraging sign.

Word of the tribal agreement came on a day when coordinated suicide bombings rocked Kirkuk and Falluja, and graphic evidence of more sectarian killings surfaced in Baghdad.

In Kirkuk, an oil-rich city in the north bordering the autonomous Kurdish region, suicide bombers detonated four cars and one truck laden with explosives, killing more than two dozen people and wounding more than 100, Iraqi and American officials said. In Falluja, a Sunni-controlled city in Anbar, 30 miles west of Baghdad, five suicide car bombs exploded within 15 minutes, an American military official said, killing five people and wounding 23.

The police in Baghdad reported finding 36 bodies in several neighborhoods, an Interior Ministry official said. Eight were discovered in one area with gunshot wounds to the head and bearing marks of torture. But an American military spokesman said her office was aware of only 11 bodies found.

Also Sunday, the American military said a sailor with the First Marine Logistics Group died Saturday from wounds in fighting in Anbar Province.

Mr. Rishawi said the 25 tribes counted 30,000 young men armed with assault rifles who were willing to confront and kill the insurgents and criminal gangs that he blamed for damaging tribal life in Anbar, dividing members by religious sect and driving a wave of violent crime in Ramadi.

"We are in battle with the terrorists who kill Sunnis and Shiites, and we do not respect anyone between us who talks in a sectarian sense," said Mr. Rishawi, the leader of the Rishawi tribe, a subset of the Dulaimi tribe, the largest in Anbar. Half the Rishawi are Shiite Arabs and half are Sunni, he said.

Mr. Rishawi estimated that the insurgents had about 1,300 fighters, many of them foreigners, and are backed by other nations' intelligence services, though he declined to specify them.

On Sunday, he said the coalition of 25 tribes sent letters to the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and other top government officials to seek their support.

Sheik Fassal al-Guood, a prominent tribal leader from Ramadi, said Sheik Khalid al-Attiya, the deputy speaker of Parliament and a Shiite, met with the tribal leaders Thursday and gave them a "positive response."

In addition to the government's blessing, Mr. Rishawi said, the tribes also wanted weapons, equipment and tactical help from an Iraqi Army brigade. "The terrorists have different kinds of weapons while we have only AK-47's," Mr. Rishawi said. He predicted that with sufficient help, "their force will collapse in one month."

Ali Dabbagh, a government spokesman, said Mr. Maliki supported "any operations that try to resist terrorism and aims to maintain security in this dear and important part from the country."

Government officials are weighing an official response to the tribes, Mr. Dabbagh said, but there has not been any agreement to supply them. "We are grateful to them for their desire to protect their cities," he said, "and we are encouraging them."

An American military official said tribes had fought Sunni insurgents in Anbar in the past but had never formed a united front. "This would be the first we've seen of tribes banding together," said the official, who asked for anonymity because the subject was a delicate one.

Last month, a Marine intelligence report described Al Qaeda as an "integral part of the social fabric" of Anbar, and said the American military, with about 30,000 troops there, did not control vast reaches of the province, roughly the size of Louisiana.

In Kirkuk, Iraqi and American military officials said they could not immediately tell which groups were behind the suicide bomb attacks. Kirkuk has become a violent battleground between Iraqi Arabs — Shiite and Sunni — and Kurds who control Kirkuk's police and government.

The deadliest of the Kirkuk bomb attacks, by a truck laden with explosives that blew up between the offices of two Kurdish political parties, killed at least 18 people and wounded 55, said Lt. Col. Urhan Abdullah of the Kirkuk police. Two minutes later, a car bomb, apparently intended for a private security firm, killed two people and wounded three others, said Maj. Farhad Mahmoud of the Kirkuk police.

A third suicide car bomb detonated near an Iraqi police checkpoint about 15 miles south of Kirkuk, the police said. A fourth car bomb exploded in front of the house of Sheik Wasfi al-Asi, who had recently publicly called on the government to release Saddam Hussein, who is currently being tried on genocide charges. The house was empty, the police said, but the bomb killed two people and wounded five others.

Death Squads Target The Iraqi Next Door (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

DOJ_NMG_0063739

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD — On that scorching afternoon last month, Ahmed Kamel was playing soccer with his two children outside his home here when three men drove up in a Chevy Caprice, pulled out their guns and dragged him away.

"You will see your father tomorrow behind the levee," one advised Kamel's 13-year-old, Mustafa, as the boy clung desperately to the escaping car.

Four hours later, the family later learned, police found Kamel's body where the kidnappers said he would be: a notorious dumping ground for the dead in northeast Baghdad. His crime? He had served in the Iraqi army for more than a decade and lived in a neighborhood where Shiite Muslim militias are pushing out Sunnis like him.

Evidence enough in the cold calculation of life and death in this capital of fear. A wrong turn, a detour, an untoward stare, a pointed finger, an anonymous denunciation, a nod of the head — these can, and do, lead regularly to death.

Sectarian death squads snatch victims off the street or from their cars, from their homes or their offices, from mosques or hospitals. The killers come at night or day. They come in uniforms or civilian garb.

"They say this is God's will, but this is not God's will," said Nisreen Yaseri, mourning the killing last week of her cousin Mohammed Jabbar, 26. "This is people's will. It's not about God."

Jabbar's mistake? He was a Shiite house painter who was riding in a taxi through a mostly Sunni west Baghdad neighborhood when gunmen at an improvised checkpoint stopped the cab last Monday. He and four co-workers, all Shiite, were taken away.

Their bullet-ridden corpses, trussed and showing signs of torture, were found Tuesday on the streets of the same Adil district where their taxi had been stopped.

Their loved ones next saw them in the morgue of Kadhimiya Hospital.

"Hamoodi," as Jabbar was known, had taken precautions: He had recently obtained a new identification card, omitting his tribal name — and thus blurring his sect, at least theoretically. "If they want me to be a Sunni, I'll be a Duleimi if they like!" Jabbar had told friends, referring to a major Sunni clan, his cousin recalled. "I'll be a Shia. Anything."

Others seek to erase their name altogether; newspapers here daily contain legal ads from men seeking to change their given name from Omar, a trademark Sunni name.

"But if they stop you, they ask you questions — what tribe do you come from? Who is your uncle? It is impossible to escape," lamented Omar Hirmizi, a shopkeeper in the largely Sunni Adhamiya district who had contemplated the ruse and decided it was no solution.

Some feel a false sense of security. Such apparently was the case with Muatiz Qaisi, a Sunni who was a longtime grocery shop owner in the largely Shiite enclave of Sadr City. He had many Shiite friends and acquaintances and was well liked. Gunmen came for him one day last spring after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, the event that sparked the current wave of violence.

He was thrown into the trunk of a sedan, but the kidnappers forgot to take his cellphone.

"I was taken by armed men, and I'm inside the trunk of their car," he told his relatives in a telephone call, according to a nephew.

Later that evening, the kidnappers used the cellphone to call the nephew, saying they were from the "central crime bureau," although the nephew had never heard of the agency, and doubted its existence.

"We have information that your uncle used to kill Shia during the time" of Saddam Hussein, the kidnappers told the nephew, according to the nephew's account.

"When did my uncle have time to kill those people?" the nephew responded. "My uncle had a shop for 15 years that used to be open from 7 in the morning until 8:30 at night."

The uncle's body turned up the next morning, along with four others. Bullets had disfigured all five faces in a similar pattern of mutilation.

In the anxious hours after a disappearance, frantic relatives of the missing embark on a now-ritualized hunt: to police stations, government ministries, to shady contacts who may know something.

When men in fatigues arrested Feraz Abbas Kubais, a Sunni electrician, at his home, his cousin placed a telephone call. The cousin knew someone close to the Badr Brigade, a Shiite, Iranian-trained militia that has ties to the Interior Ministry.

"I'll see what I can do," the cousin was told, a friend recalled. Two hours later, the Badr man called back. "I'm sorry, it's too late," the cousin was told. "You'll find him in the morgue."

Some bodies are never found, perhaps tossed in a clandestine grave, or decomposed beyond recognition, or dumped in the Tigris River or an irrigation canal from which they never emerge.

So many corpses were clogging the capital's main sewer plant last spring that authorities launched an inquiry, with U.S. technical assistance. Investigators discovered a macabre pattern: Manholes from as far as several miles away had been used as disposal sites, allowing the remains to course underground through broad concrete pipes along with the city's subterranean effluvia.

"It's possible some bodies were minced by the pumping system, and we never knew about them," said Ahmed Abdil Elah, assistant general manager of the city sewage system. "There is no trace of them."

The city battened down the manholes, and the ghoulish torrent ceased.

Other remains are identified only after they have been interred with the anonymous.

Such was the case with Muayid Rahman Batawi, 28, a Sunni living in Al Khatib neighborhood, where Shiites have been displacing Sunnis as the majority.

Batawi was afraid to leave the house on foot, though he occasionally ventured out in his car, his brother recalled. That was his misstep. He disappeared after stopping at a gas station July 3, his brother said. His corpse turned up six days later in the mostly Shiite Shula section of Baghdad.

Morgue officials would not release the body without a letter from the police. By the time the family secured the needed document, it was too late. Batawi's body had been taken with others of "unknown identity" to the Shiite burial grounds of Najaf, 90 miles south of the capital — not a place where Sunnis would opt to send their loved ones, especially in these days of mutual enmity.

"We immediately sent our mother, alone, to Najaf to get the body, since we thought it was safer for a woman," his brother recalled. "But they wouldn't give her the body."

Batawi's corpse remains entombed in the gray earth of Najaf.

At the Wadi al Salam (Valley of Peace) cemetery complex in Najaf last week, gravediggers were gouging holes for 63 more bodies, the latest no-name victims shipped down in a refrigerator truck from the capital.

"I feel a very deep sadness. Those killed are our brothers," said Mehdi Asadi, who oversees disposal at the so-called Cemetery of the Unidentified, a kind of potter's field.

Workers paint a number on a stone at each grave of the unknown, a reference should someone wish to claim the remains. Relatives who identify the dead from digital morgue photographs regularly seek to have the bodies disinterred and moved.

For the families left behind, there is little consolation in the discovery of a body, only the quelling of lingering doubt.

Although police found Kamel's body at the levee just hours after he was spirited away, his family members didn't discover his fate until last week because his body hadn't been identified. They finally recognized him in a morgue photograph.

Kamel's remains had been dispatched for burial as an "unknown" to the Shiite holy city of Karbala.

His Sunni family decided to leave him there in peace. Loved ones plan to make their graveside pilgrimage 40 days after his death, respecting a venerable Muslim custom that transcends Iraq's sectarian divide.

Violence Changes Fortunes Of Storied Baghdad Street (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

BAGHDAD -- A silence has fallen upon Mutanabi Street.

In the buttery sunlight, faded billboards hang from old buildings. Iron gates seal entrances to bookstores and stationery shops. On this Friday, like the past 13 Fridays, the violence has taken its toll. There is not a customer around, only ghosts.

Perched on a red chair outside a closet-sized bookshop, the only one open, Naim al-Shatri is nearly in tears. Short, with thin gray hair and dark, brooding eyes, his voice is grim. This is normally his busiest day, but he hasn't had a single sale. A curfew is approaching.

Soon, his sobs break the stillness. "Is this Iraq?" he asked no one in particular, pointing at the gritty, trash-covered street as the scent of rotting paper and sewage mingled in the air.

It is a question many of the booksellers on Mutanabi Street are asking. Here, in the intellectual ground zero of Baghdad, they are the guardians of a literary tradition that has survived empire and colonialism, monarchy and dictatorship. In the heady days after the U.S.-led invasion, Mutanabi Street pulsed with the promise of freedom.

Now, in the fourth year of war, it is a shadow of its revered past. Many of the original booksellers have been forced to shut down. Others have been arrested, kidnapped or killed, or have fled Iraq. "We are walking with our coffins in our hands," said Mohammad al-Hayawi, the owner of the Renaissance book store, one of the street's oldest shops. "Nothing in Iraq is guaranteed anymore."

In a city known across the Arab world for its love affair with books, such emotions reflect the decline of a vibrant community. For the residents of Baghdad, Mutanabi Street is a link to their city's past glory, less a place than an extension of their souls.

"It is the lungs that I breathe with," said Zaien Ahmad al-Nakshabandi, another bookseller. "I'm choked now."

Three months ago, the government imposed the midday curfew on Islam's holiest day to stop attacks on mosques. That was a major setback for Mutanabi Street, named after a 10th-century poet. For most Iraqis, Friday is their only day off from work and a time to head to the book market.

In earlier days, a multiethnic stew of secondhand booksellers would lay their wares out and carefully swipe the dust off. Inside the famed Shahbandar cafe, intellectuals would gather to wax about politics and culture over cups of tar-black coffee and glasses of lemon tea, even during the most repressed of times.

Under former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, Mutanabi Street was the nexus for resistance and freewheeling debates, where underground writers published illegal books that denounced Hussein.

"I wish you could see how it used to be on Fridays," Shatri spoke before he broke down in tears. "You could not even walk. The whole street was filled with books and people. Mutanabi Street is a part of how great Baghdad is."

Then, in a reverent tone, he uttered a proverb known across the Arab world: "Cairo writes. Beirut publishes. And Baghdad reads."A Futile Protest

Since 1963, Shatri has peddled books on Mutanabi Street, like a faithful friend, through military rule and political oppression, wars and embargo. Of all the eras he has watched ebb and flow, it is today's Iraq, with its violent nature, that most mocks the proud legacy of Mutanabi Street, he said.

"It means the death of education, the death of the history of the street, the death of the culture of Baghdad," Shatri said.

Two Fridays ago, Shatri took action. He and other members of his writers union gathered in front of his shop. They sipped breakfast tea. Then, at around 9:30 a.m., they poured kerosene over a pile of books and set them aflame.

"I cried when I was burning the books," Shatri said.

"It's a message to the government," said Nakshabandi, who also took part. "It's an S.O.S. Help us. An important part of Baghdad is dying. And it is on its last breath."

"But no one got the message. There was no action."'Better Under Saddam'

After the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, once-banned Western magazines were displayed openly. Religious books, especially those catering to Iraq's long-oppressed Shiite Muslims, flourished. Hayawi, a burly man with intense, honey-colored eyes, said what the booksellers earned on Fridays was double all the other days combined. Back then, he was optimistic about his future.

Now, the street is still a hive of activity on every other day. But poor security has altered its character, said many of its old booksellers. Before the invasion, they used to stay open till evening. No longer.

"By 2 p.m., we close our shops and run away fast," said Abdullah Gumar al-Ogaeli, 85, who opened a stationery shop in 1947. Thin and frail with a gray mustache, Ogaeli said he knew about 200 merchants in the months after the invasion. Now, he knows three. Some died of natural causes, others lost their lives to the violence.

Several booksellers, he said, were kidnapped by gunmen, but were later released. In Baghdad, the elite and the educated are often targets of criminals, who seek ransom, and of extremists, who seek to shred the city's cultural and intellectual fabric. "Many of our merchants have left Iraq and opened shops in Egypt, Syria and Jordan," said Ogaeli. "The business is weak now."

Today, a new generation of merchants sells paper and other supplies. Several original booksellers said the newcomers were looters who thrived during the chaos of the invasion. Now, they have tarnished the legacy of Mutanabi Street, they said. "At work, I am always honest," said Ogaeli, who calls Mutanabi Street "a holy name."

The sectarian violence is also blemishing a place where Shiite and Sunni Muslims have always worked side by side. "I am Shiite," Ogaeli said. "All my daughters are married to Sunnis. And my son is married to a Sunni woman. No one used to mention Sunni and Shiite. This is all new to us."

When he thinks of the few lasting friendships he has left on Mutanabi Street, "I feel sad. I feel uncomfortable," said Ogaeli, his voice disappearing in the noise of the street outside.

On a recent Saturday, Hayawi and his older brother Nabil, both Sunni Muslims, sat at a neatly kept desk inside their store. On an iron staircase, next to a sign that read "40 to 50% off on all books," hung a portrait of their late father.

They were once five brothers. Four, including Nabil, left Iraq after the February bombing of a Shiite holy shrine in Samarra, which triggered an avalanche of reprisal killings. Nabil, who now lives in Cairo, travels back and forth to Baghdad. They said the family business was suffering. It took the first half of this year, Mohammad lamented, to earn what they did in one month after the invasion.

"We asked the new government to improve the street, like providing services and cleaning it," said Mohammad, puffing a cigarette. "What happened was the opposite. The street was neglected."

"It was better under Saddam," said Nabil, who is balding and has a sharp nose and a white beard. "On Fridays, even when we had electricity problems, they didn't switch the electricity off. There was a system and order."

He has always resented the U.S. occupation. But now he outright blames the Americans for the violence that is tearing apart their lives. "The Americans are the reasons for it. This is the truth. You must hear it. Sectarian strife is like a fire. When the fire starts, it eats everything."

A year ago, the store imported 1,000 boxes of books from Jordan, Syria, Lebanon and Egypt, said Nabil. Then he pointed at some boxes in a corner of the store. "Now, in August, we imported 20 boxes."

After the invasion, the family paid 6,000 Iraqi dinars for 20 liters of gasoline to use for their generator. Now, it costs 30,000 dinars. The government gives them electricity for one hour a day, Mohammad said. Now, it's not certain if they can get to work or return home safely, Mohammad said. He knew 25 merchants on the street who were either arrested for unknown reasons, kidnapped or killed.

"Yesterday, we were expecting today will be better. But today is worse than yesterday," Mohammad said. "Now, if you ask me, 'Are you optimistic?' I would say, 'No'. I don't have a single ounce of optimism."A Dying Street

Across the street on a recent Wednesday, the century-old Shahbandar cafe, its walls covered with black-and-white photos of Baghdad, is empty, save for two men. They silently smoke their water pipes. It is 1:30 p.m.

"At this time, you could not find a place to sit down," said Fahim al-Khakshali, whose father owns this legendary cafe.

That was before gunmen a few months ago killed two professors after they left the cafe, Khakshali said. And before men entered the nearby Al-Sadim bookshop last August. As they exited, they left a suitcase by the door. It exploded, killing the owner's son.

Three months ago, strangers threatened Khakshali and ordered him to shut down the cafe. He refused. He says he doesn't know why the Shahbandar is a target, but he can guess. "Maybe it is because educated people come here," he said.

At 1:40 p.m., Nakshabandi, the bookseller, entered the cafe. Pear-shaped and bald with owlish spectacles, he reminisced about the artists and actors, the writers and poets who once frequented the cafe.

"During the Iran-Iraq war, when the bombs were falling on top of our heads, the cafe was filled with people," he said. "No one was afraid."

Today, those Iraqi writers, artists and intellectuals who are still here have no time to come to Mutanabi Street when daily life means waiting for five hours in a gas line or risking death in a traffic jam.

"Now, the load on your back is heavier than ever before," Nakshabandi said. He sadly remembers how elderly intellectuals would sit here and pass down stories to a younger generation, a tradition now extinct. On Fridays, Nakshabandi sometimes still sees Iraqis walk to the cafe. They stare at the shuttered doors, then walk back. "You feel they are broken, like they have lost someone they loved," he said.

It's nearly 2:30 p.m. Khakshali has closed every door but one. He looked at his visitor and gently said: "You should leave now. It is getting dangerous for you."

From his red chair, Shatri watched Iraq's latest chapter unfold. He has clung to what little he has. His shop. His memories. His street. That helps explain why he is out here this Friday, outside the only shop open on a dying street.

Some days, his mind skips to the future. "Bring back the security, and I'll give you back the greatness of Mutanabi Street," he says to anyone who cares to ask.

But most days, his mind flips back to the past. And that's when he starts to cry.

"All the educated people have left," said Shatri, as he reached into his pocket to pull out a neatly folded, gray handkerchief.

"Iraq," he said, as he wiped his eyes, "it is the first country. It set the laws of Hammurabi." He was referring to the first ruler of Babylon, which was built in what is now modern-day Iraq. Hammurabi created the world's first legal codes.

"And now," he said, "there are no laws."

His voice faded. He wiped his eyes.

And silence fell upon Mutanabi Street again.

Is War In Iraq A Shield Against Attacks At Home? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

The war in Iraq constitutes a perimeter defense of the United States. Simply put, the US is fighting Al Qaeda and other extremists there, so it doesn't have to fight them on American soil.

That's the way President Bush sees the situation, anyway. In his speech to the nation on Sept. 11, he said that terrorists wouldn't quit fighting if the US pulled out of Iraq. Instead, they'd pursue their target, in essence pouring through a gap in US lines. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us," said Mr. Bush. "The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Is that really the case? Many critics of the administration think Iraq is not the foremost trench in a global war on terrorism. The enemy there, they say, is only loosely related to the one that struck at the American heartland five years ago.

Most insurgents in Iraq are natives, not wandering members of a terrorist international. It's unlikely they'd look for further ways to target the US if it left, say some terrorism experts.

"It's like in the Vietnam era, when they said we'd be fighting communists in San Diego if we pulled out," says John Mueller, a professor of national-security studies at Ohio State University in Columbus. "It's a preposterous argument."

The White House has long argued that the war in Iraq needs to be judged as part of a larger historical context. And one lesson of 9/11, Bush said in his speech on the fifth anniversary of the attacks, is that the US must confront threats before they reach its shores.

Saddam Hussein did not have anything to do with 9/11, Bush added in his speech. But after Al Qaeda successfully slammed airliners into US targets, Mr. Hussein's very existence posed a risk the US could no longer afford to take - hence the invasion that drove him from power.

Now "Al Qaeda and other extremists from across the world" have come to Iraq to fight the rise of democracy, said Bush. They've joined remnants of Hussein's regime to try to drive the US out. If America left, Osama bin Laden and his allies would gain a haven and new resources, according to the president. "We will not allow this to happen," said Bush. "America will stay in the fight."

Iraq today is indeed a strategically vital front in the war on terror, say some experts. Al Qaeda's own statements show it wants to establish a state-within-a-state there, to use as a haven and training base, according to James Phillips, a research fellow in Middle Eastern studies at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

Arab-dominated Al Qaeda would find it easier to operate in the Sunni Arab regions of Iraq than it does in Pakistan or Afghanistan, where Arab travelers stand out, writes Mr. Phillips in a recent analysis. "If the US abandons Iraq, it will become the next Afghanistan - a major source of terrorism, subversion, and warfare for decades to come," writes Phillips.

But other experts say this line of reasoning lumps together many kinds of enemies under the general category of "terrorist."

It's true that foreign fighters are in Iraq, such as the late Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. But they are a small minority of the insurgent force, say administration critics. Most Iraqi mujahideen are Sunnis who fear their interests will be ignored under Iraq's Shiite-dominated government. They are fighting for concrete, local political goals - not the destruction of America.

"If the Iraqi Sunni nationalists could take over their own territory, they would not put up with the few hundred foreign volunteers blowing things up, and would send them away or slit their throats," writes Juan Cole, professor of modern Middle East and South Asian history at the University of Michigan, in his blog "Informed Comment."

Nor are Islamist terrorists just burning to break through the US lines in Iraq and race to America, say some. They are fighting a battle of ideas, not a battle for territory. Operations in Iraq allow Al Qaeda to appear to many sympathizers in the region as if it is struggling on behalf of an oppressed Muslim people.

"Getting us to fight in a Muslim country is something they want to do," says Jessica Stern, a terrorism expert at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government in Cambridge, Mass.

Finally, critics say that even if the US did pull out of Iraq, the result might be more fighting there, not less. A Sunni-Shiite civil war would explode throughout the country, they say.

In general, the administration talks as if the US is fighting a monolithic terrorist army, with a command hierarchy and a final goal of replicating 9/11. In fact, Islamist terrorism is a loose amalgam of regional groups and local cells, with cross-cutting political goals, say some experts.

The reason there have not been more major attacks in the US may not be because terrorism's legions are pinned down in Iraq. "We've made headway on surveillance," says Dr. Stern. "It would be very hard for terrorists to come from another country and pull off another 9/11 today."

To Recapture A City (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

Gen. George Casey, the senior U.S. military officer in Iraq, convenes a battlefield conference in a Baghdad street. Maps are flapping in the rotor wash from the helicopter that has just set him down in Adhamiya—a place that has been known for years as the worst neighborhood in Baghdad. American officers gather around the general, together with their U.S.-trained Iraqi counterparts. They all speak the same language now. "Some of the bad guys left and are trying to infiltrate again," says Brig. Gen. Imad Ismail, Iraq's top police commander, poking the map as he speaks. "We're patrolling 24/7 here, and here."

"You think you can hold this?" Casey asks. He looks Ismail in the eye.

"We're working day and night," the Iraqi says. "I haven't slept in 48 hours."

Adhamiya is on the front line of what may be America's best hope of victory in Iraq: the "clear, hold and build" strategy. Casey was confident enough of success to take a NEWSWEEK reporter along on a tour of the neighborhood. Only 10 days before his visit, U.S. and Iraqi forces began the job of retaking Adhamiya from the gunmen who ruled its streets. The place is quiet now, but there's no guarantee it will stay that way when the soldiers move on to other neighborhoods.

The "clear" phase began on Sept. 4, when troops cordoned off the entire area, home to 300,000 mostly Sunni Iraqis. Checkpoints kept Shiite death squads out and Sunni insurgents immobile while every house and building was searched for weapons and insurgents. As the operation went on, Iraqi forces took on "hold" duties while the Americans began the "build" phase, restoring public services after months if not years of neglect. Other Baghdad neighborhoods get six hours of electricity a day; Adhamiya was lucky to get one. For the past month, much of the area had none at all.

Casey's convoy of up-armored Humvees makes its way through a warren of alleyways. On a narrow street, the Americans have installed a generator to power the block until repair crews from the Ministry of Electricity can be persuaded to enter the neighborhood. "Thanks to God, things are safer now," an Iraqi engineer says. "There is a difference." A young Iraqi civilian is hanging out near the generator, and the general asks his opinion of the project.

"It's not enough," the Iraqi snaps.

"For what?" the general asks. "Your videogames and Game Boy?" Everyone laughs, but Casey understands what the young man is talking about. The machine can supply the 40 houses on this block with enough power for refrigerators, fans, lights, even Game Boys—but not for air conditioning. Temperatures here still climb to triple digits just about every day.

Casey moves on to a session of the district advisory council. A few local administrators are gathered around a huge, mostly empty conference table. After voicing eloquent thanks for America's help to Adhamiya, the council's chairman, Sheik Hassan Sabri, launches into a list of complaints—particularly allegations that the Shiite-dominated central government is deliberately neglecting the neighborhood. "Give them a chance," Casey replies. "They've only been [in power] for 100 days." The room is sweltering. There's no air conditioning, no fans, no electricity—not even cold drinks. "Is this so you can keep the meetings short?" Casey jokes.

"General, I have a personal request," says the sheik. "Two of my brothers were killed by the Mahdi Army militia. My other brother is in the airport [at the American detention center, Camp Cropper]. I am sure he is innocent. We are all against terrorism, but now I am feeding four families." With that, the man breaks down in tears. Casey promises to look into the case and give him an answer within 48 hours.

The team heads back toward the helicopters. Casey says he's pleased with the progress he's seeing. "It has worked," Casey says. "You see the reactions of the people on the streets." Even so, the general acknowledges, "there's a long way to go." He says Iraq will need 12 to 18 months more before it's ready to take charge of its own security.

Casey can still take comfort in small victories: he's able to help Sheik Hassan even sooner than promised. The detained brother's case is reviewed the very next day, and orders are issued to free him. If only all of Iraq's problems were so easy to solve.

Hell To Pay (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

The fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks was marked with the sadness and solemnity appropriate to the day, with President Bush sharing the rituals of public mourning at ground zero, at the farmer's field in Shanksville, Pa., and at the Pentagon. But it was clearly another troubled place that weighed on him, as he capped the commemoration with a prime-time TV address that drew on 9/11 emotions to appeal for greater public support on Iraq. "The safety of America," the president declared, "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Most Americans, though, don't seem to see it that way. Polls show that a majority believes that the country is, in fact, now less safe from terrorism because of the war in Iraq. At every opportunity, Bush is pressing his case that things in Iraq are headed in the right direction-and that the war must be won. But with elections just weeks away, some vulnerable lawmakers may have shuddered after opening the Washington Post last week to see a column by influential conservatives William Kristol and Rich Lowry calling for the president to send "substantially more" troops to Iraq to "improve the chances of winning a decisive battle at a decisive moment."

The mean streets of Iraq last week saw some 130 bodies, most bullet-riddled and bearing signs of torture, collected in just one 48-hour period, even as U.S. and Iraqi troops launched neighborhood-by-neighborhood security sweeps. Despite a "spike" in sectarian killings, U.S. military officials in Baghdad cited progress in security operations by 12,000 American and Iraqi soldiers in other areas of the capital. Iraqi officials also unveiled a security plan to encircle the capital with trenches and route all vehicle and pedestrian traffic through just 28 entry checkpoints.

But nothing in Iraq, it seems, is simple. Congress's Government Accountability Office last week reported that the Pentagon's own Defense Intelligence Agency concluded that sectarian tensions have been fueled in part by the same national elections that

Washington has hailed as milestones. Even amid spiraling Sunni-Shiite violence, the GAO report said, U.S.-led coalition forces remained the main target of attacks, which increased nearly 60 percent during the first six months of this year over a year ago.

That came as no surprise to marines in Anbar province in western Iraq, an area the size of Louisiana. A Marine intelligence assessment, details of which were first disclosed in the Washington Post, describes a political and military vacuum in Anbar, where an undersized American force of some 30,000 troops is unable to impose security much beyond the perimeters of its bases. Whether or not the answer is more troops, many in the Pentagon were more struck by the report's stark candor than its conclusions. "It's like, 'yeah,'" a general who read the report told U.S. News, "'no kidding.'"

On the heels of the Post's story, the Pentagon called a press briefing with Gen. Richard Zilmer, commander of the Marines in Anbar, who provided less damage control than might have been expected. "I do concur with that assessment," he said. But Zilmer qualified his remarks by saying that the report was meant to give an unvarnished picture without dwelling on positive developments, which he attempted to describe. "We have come a long way in terms of the strength of the police and the [Iraqi] Army," he noted. However, "in both cases," he acknowledged, "we are not where we intended to be."

6 Bombs Leave 2 Dozen Dead In North Iraq (USAT/AP)

By Yahya Barzanji

USA Today, September 18, 2006

KIRKUK, Iraq — Six bombs killed 24 people and wounded 84 Sunday in Kirkuk, a northern oil city the Kurds want added to their self-ruled region.

There was no indication who was behind the bombings in Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad. The city is in the center of Iraq's vast northern oil fields and is claimed by the region's Arabs, Kurds and Turkmen.

The worst assault involved a suicide truck bomb. The explosion in the city center killed 18 and wounded 55, police Brig. Sarhat Qadir said. A few hours later, a car bomb was rammed by a suicide attacker into a joint U.S.-Iraqi army patrol in the south of the city. At least three bystanders died and eight people were injured. Two roadside bombs and two parked car bombs went off in other parts of the city, killing three civilians and wounding 21 people, including two policemen and four soldiers, police told the Associated Press.

Police said a gunman fired on civilians before the truck bomb exploded near the headquarters of the two main Kurdish political parties: the Kurdistan Democratic Party and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, headed by Massoud Barzani, who also is president of the autonomous Kurdistan region. Barzani angered many Iraqis on Sept. 1 when he ordered that the national flag be replaced by the Kurdish banner on all government buildings in the self-rule zone.

Kurds want to incorporate Kirkuk into their autonomous region, an idea that has been caught up in the heated debate over a proposal to transform Iraq into a federate state.

The idea of federalism is enshrined in the Iraqi constitution, which was adopted last fall. Before it can be implemented, the mechanics have to be legislated and approved in a national referendum.

The second-largest Sunni Arab party, the National Dialogue Front, rejected on Sunday proposed legislation to pave the way for a federal system, arguing that it would divide the country. The party's call for the bill to be dropped came a day before a planned informal meeting of leaders from all parties in the parliament to discuss the legislation, proposed last week by the main Shiite Muslim alliance.

Some Shiites want to create an autonomous region in the oil-rich south where they are dominant. The Kurds already have their region in the north. Sunni Arabs would be left with Iraq's western provinces, which are mostly desert.

“This country, which has been united in its entire history, cannot be divided into regions. It is a step toward dividing Iraq into mini-states,” Mishan al-Saadi, a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, told the Associated Press.

Blasts In Kirkuk Kill 23; 36 Die Elsewhere In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063747

BAGHDAD — At least five bombings in Kirkuk killed 23 bystanders and wounded 76 others Sunday in what appeared to be coordinated attacks on police as well as Kurdish and Sunni Arab politicians in the oil-rich northern city, bringing the day's toll in Iraq to at least 59 dead.

There has been an upsurge in attacks during recent weeks in Kirkuk, where Kurds and Sunni Arabs have struggled for control of the city's oil wealth. Late Friday night, a bomb exploded in the Tiseen neighborhood, injuring three people. Sunday's attacks, however, were unusual in their scale and toll.

In the first and deadliest attack, a driver drove a truck loaded with concrete barriers toward the entrance of a police building near Kurdish political offices, shooting at guards as he steered with one hand. Witnesses said that as the guards returned fire, the attacker detonated the bomb, killing himself and 17 others.

Salim Sabbah, 44, threw himself on the ground behind a car as the explosives went off. When he opened his eyes, the normally tranquil street had been transformed into a gory mess of shattered concrete, metal and flesh. Charred bodies were strewn across the road as fires burned in several buildings.

"Why is this happening to us?" Sabbah asked, distraught. He blamed Sunni extremists and foreign fighters. But the diversity of targets during the day made it difficult to determine who might be behind the explosions.

At least four subsequent car bombs struck the city, including another suicide attack. The second blast of the day hit a Sunni sheik's office and the third a Sunni mosque. The other attacks targeted Iraqi and American security forces. Elsewhere in Iraq, 36 people were killed in assassinations and explosions or were found dead, authorities said.

Two civilians and three Iraqi police officers were killed in Fallouja in a series of attacks against American and Iraqi security forces involving mortars and several bombs. An American sailor was killed in the town, west of Baghdad, on Saturday, the U.S. military said in a statement.

A roadside bomb killed two security guards in Baqubah, and gunmen in Taji fired at a police patrol, killing two officers, according to Iraqi authorities.

In the capital, two bombs killed two people and injured 12 in separate attacks.

Mohammed Shihab Dulaimi, a Sunni politician and vocal critic of the election that brought the current Shiite Muslim-dominated government to power, was assassinated on a road in an upscale area along the Tigris River after he left the Palestine Hotel following a television interview.

Authorities also recovered the bodies of at least 24 people from Baghdad neighborhoods. Most of the victims were found shot, blindfolded and with their hands tied behind their backs. A headless corpse and another body were fished out of the Tigris River near the Sinak Bridge after they had drifted into some reeds along the riverbank.

Iraqi Police Find Large Munitions Cache (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

Iraqi police have uncovered a large munitions cache in southern Iraq, near the area where a roadside bomb killed two British soldiers earlier this month, a spokesman said Sunday.

Police received a tip that munitions were being stored in the town of Ad Dayr, near the southern city of Basra, Maj. Charlie Burbridge said.

A raid early Saturday uncovered dozens of artillery and mortar rounds, as well as 100 rounds of high explosive shells of various caliber, Burbridge said.

Roadside bombs are often constructed by using explosives recovered from old munitions.

On Sept. 4, two British soldiers were killed and a third was seriously wounded by a roadside bomb in Ad Dayr.

Although that device was completely destroyed in the explosion and it was unclear whether it had been made using this method, "we do know that munitions are being used to create" roadside bombs, Burbridge said.

The munitions cache was uncovered at a disused army barracks.

"Initially we thought they were from the armory. But it transpired that it was more than that," Burbridge said.

The Iraqi police acted without assistance from coalition forces, he added. They recovered the munitions and took them to Qurnah, about 35 miles north of Basra, where they are to be destroyed.

U.S. Holds AP Photographer In Iraq 5 Mos (AP-Y)

By Robert Tanner, Ap National Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

The U.S. military in Iraq has imprisoned an Associated Press photographer for five months, accusing him of being a security threat but never filing charges or permitting a public hearing.

Military officials said Bilal Hussein, an Iraqi citizen, was being held for "imperative reasons of security" under United Nations resolutions. AP executives said the news cooperative's review of Hussein's work did not find anything to indicate inappropriate contact with insurgents, and any evidence against him should be brought to the Iraqi criminal justice system.

Hussein, 35, is a native of Fallujah who began work for the AP in September 2004. He photographed events in Fallujah and Ramadi until he was detained on April 12 of this year.

"We want the rule of law to prevail. He either needs to be charged or released. Indefinite detention is not acceptable," said Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer. "We've come to the conclusion that this is unacceptable under Iraqi law, or Geneva Conventions, or any military procedure."

Hussein is one of an estimated 14,000 people detained by the U.S. military worldwide — 13,000 of them in Iraq. They are held in limbo where few are ever charged with a specific crime or given a chance before any court or tribunal to argue for their freedom.

In Hussein's case, the military has not provided any concrete evidence to back up the vague allegations they have raised about him, Curley and other AP executives said.

The military said Hussein was captured with two insurgents, including Hamid Hamad Motib, an alleged leader of al-Qaida in Iraq. "He has close relationships with persons known to be responsible for kidnappings, smuggling, improvised explosive device (IED) attacks and other attacks on coalition forces," according to a May 7 e-mail from U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Jack Gardner, who oversees all coalition detainees in Iraq.

"The information available establishes that he has relationships with insurgents and is afforded access to insurgent activities outside the normal scope afforded to journalists conducting legitimate activities," Gardner wrote to AP International Editor John Daniszewski.

Hussein proclaims his innocence, according to his Iraqi lawyer, Badie Arief Izzat, and believes he has been unfairly targeted because his photos from Ramadi and Fallujah were deemed unwelcome by the coalition forces.

That Hussein was captured at the same time as insurgents doesn't make him one of them, said Kathleen Carroll, AP's executive editor.

"Journalists have always had relationships with people that others might find unsavory," she said. "We're not in this to choose sides, we're to report what's going on from all sides."

AP executives in New York and Baghdad have sought to persuade U.S. officials to provide additional information about allegations against Hussein and to have his case transferred to the Iraqi criminal justice system. The AP contacted military leaders in Iraq and the Pentagon, and later the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

The AP has worked quietly until now, believing that would be the best approach. But with the U.S. military giving no indication it would change its stance, the news cooperative has decided to make public Hussein's imprisonment, hoping the spotlight will bring attention to his case and that of thousands of others now held in Iraq, Curley said.

One of Hussein's photos was part of a package of 20 photographs that won a Pulitzer Prize for breaking news photography last year. His contribution was an image of four insurgents in Fallujah firing a mortar and small arms during the U.S.-led offensive in the city in November 2004.

In what several AP editors described as a typical path for locally hired staff in the midst of a conflict, Hussein, a shopkeeper who sold cell phones and computers in Fallujah, was hired in the city as a general helper because of his local knowledge.

As the situation in Fallujah eroded in 2004, he expressed a desire to become a photographer. Hussein was given training and camera equipment and hired in September of that year as a freelancer, paid on a per-picture basis, according to Santiago Lyon, AP's director of photography. A month later, he was put on a monthly retainer.

During the U.S.-led offensive in Fallujah in November 2004, he stayed on after his family fled. "He had good access. He was able to photograph not only the results of the attacks on Fallujah, he was also able to photograph members of the insurgency on occasion," Lyon said. "That was very difficult to achieve at that time."

After fleeing later in the offensive, leaving his camera behind in the rush to escape, Hussein arrived in Baghdad, where the AP gave him a new camera. He then went to work in Ramadi which, like Fallujah, has been a center of insurgent violence.

In its own effort to determine whether Hussein had gotten too close the insurgency, the AP has reviewed his work record, interviewed senior photo editors who worked on his images and examined all 420 photographs in the news cooperative's archives that were taken by Hussein, Lyon said.

The military in Iraq has frequently detained journalists who arrive quickly at scenes of violence, accusing them of getting advance notice from insurgents, Lyon said. But "that's just good journalism. Getting to the event quickly is something that characterizes good journalism anywhere in the world. It does not indicate prior knowledge," he said.

Out of Hussein's body of work, only 37 photos show insurgents or people who could be insurgents, Lyon said. "The vast majority of the 420 images show the aftermath or the results of the conflict — blown up houses, wounded people, dead people, street scenes," he said.

Only four photos show the wreckage of still-burning U.S. military vehicles.

"Do we know absolutely everything about him, and what he did before he joined us? No. Are we satisfied that what he did since he joined us was appropriate for the level of work we expected from him? Yes," Lyon said. "When we reviewed the work he submitted to us, we found it appropriate to what we'd asked him to do."

The AP does not knowingly hire combatants or anyone who is part of a story, company executives said. But hiring competent local staff in combat areas is vital to the news service, because often only local people can pick their way around the streets with a reasonable degree of safety.

"We want people who are not part of a story. Sometimes it is a judgment call. If someone seems to be thuggish, or like a fighter, you certainly wouldn't hire them," Daniszewski said. After they are hired, their work is checked carefully for signs of bias.

Lyon said every image from local photographers is always "thoroughly checked and vetted" by experienced editors. "In every case where there have been images of insurgents, questions have been asked about circumstances under which the image was taken, and what the image shows," he said.

Executives said it's not uncommon for AP news people to be picked up by coalition forces and detained for hours, days or occasionally weeks, but never this long. Several hundred journalists in Iraq have been detained, some briefly and some for several weeks, according to Scott Horton, a New York-based lawyer hired by the AP to work on Hussein's case.

Horton also worked on behalf of an Iraqi cameraman employed by CBS, Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein, who was detained for one year before his case was sent to an Iraqi court on charges of insurgent activity. He was acquitted for lack of evidence.

AP officials emphasized the military has not provided the company concrete evidence of its claims against Bilal Hussein, or provided him a chance to offer a defense.

"He's a Sunni Arab from a tribe in that area. I'm sure he does know some nasty people. But is he a participant in the insurgency? I don't think that's been proven," Daniszewski said.

Information provided to the AP by the military to support the continued detention hasn't withstood scrutiny, when it could be checked, Daniszewski said.

For example, he said, the AP had been told that Hussein was involved with the kidnapping of two Arab journalists in Ramadi.

But those journalists, tracked down by the AP, said Hussein had helped them after they were released by their captors without money or a vehicle in a dangerous part of Ramadi. After a journalist acquaintance put them in touch with Hussein, the photographer picked them up, gave them shelter and helped get them out of town, they said.

The journalists said they had never been contacted by multinational forces for their account.

Horton said the military has provided contradictory accounts of whether Hussein himself was a U.S. target last April or if he was caught up in a broader sweep.

The military said bomb-making materials were found in the apartment where Hussein was captured but it never detailed what those materials were. The military said he tested positive for traces of explosives. Horton said that was virtually guaranteed for anyone on the streets of Ramadi at that time.

Hussein has been a frequent target of conservative critics on the Internet, who raised questions about his images months before the military detained him. One blogger and author, Michelle Malkin, wrote about Hussein's detention on the day of his arrest, saying she'd been tipped by a military source.

Carroll said the role of journalists can be misconstrued and make them a target of critics. But that criticism is misplaced, she said.

"How can you know what a conflict is like if you're only with one side of the combatants?" she said. "Journalism doesn't work if we don't report and photograph all sides."

Compact For Iraq (WSJ)

By Robert M. Kimmitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Ministers from around the world will meet today to discuss the International Compact for Iraq, an Iraqi government-led initiative to transform Iraq's economy and achieve financial independence within five years. If the Iraqis map out a credible and promising plan, the international community will support it, investing in Iraq's future. Additional assistance will be expressly conditional on Iraq achieving the benchmarks it has set out.

A most important issue to be covered is how to develop Iraq's oil sector and immense oil reserves in a manner that benefits all the Iraqi people and serves as a unifying force across sectarian lines. Today's meetings, at the U.N. in New York and the annual meetings of the World Bank and IMF in Singapore, follow a successful Sept. 10 conference in Abu Dhabi. There, Iraqi leaders presented the outline of a hydrocarbon law now under review by their cabinet and being discussed between central and regional governments. In the compact, they will commit to pass a law developed through a consensus-building process that will share oil revenue among all Iraqi regions, enable development and delineate significant opportunities for private investors.

The compact will begin to reverse the stagnation and suppression resulting from years of a command economy. A premium will be placed on creating jobs to offer a lasting alternative to violence. Iraq will take steps to improve the business climate and promote private investment. Agricultural reforms will begin restoring that sector's vital influence on growth and employment and Iraq's former status as breadbasket of the Middle East.

In spite of the challenges faced by the Iraqi government, there are good reasons to believe this initiative will succeed. First, it's the economic component of a strategy that also includes the Iraqi government's security and political initiatives, including national reconciliation. Second, though inflation and budget execution are continuing concerns, the Iraqi economy has made consistent progress, with strong foreign-currency reserves, growing revenues, a recently enacted fuel-import liberalization law, and an investment law to be passed this month. Third, the Iraqis have already taken difficult steps, including reducing fuel subsidies, maintaining fiscal discipline and an extensive audit of the Central Bank, as part of their standby arrangement with the IMF. The Compact will add a strong oversight mechanism. All of this should further compel us to remain steadfast in our support of an initiative that deserves the urgent support of the entire international community.

Mr. Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary, is a presidential emissary for the Iraq compact.

A Christian View Of War (USAT)

By Oliver "Buzz" Thomas

USA Today, September 18, 2006

"Pray for our troops."

Millions of signs and bumper stickers carry the message, and part of me likes it. But part of me keeps waiting for another bumper sticker — the one I still haven't seen. Whether Jesus would drive an SUV, I'm still not sure. Truth is he'd probably ride the bus. Or the subway. But if he had money for a car and didn't give it all away to the hookers and the homeless before he got to the used-car lot, I'm pretty sure that his bumper sticker would say "pray for our enemies."

Before you write me off as a left-wing crackpot, consider what we know. During his famous Sermon on the Mount, Jesus said three things relevant to the subject of war:

•Blessed are the peacemakers.

•Turn the other cheek.

•Pray for your enemies.

Here's something else we know. Three-quarters of the U.S. population consider themselves Christian. That translates into about 224 million Americans.

So why are so few of us taking the teachings of Jesus seriously when it comes to this latest war? Out here in the heartland, only a handful of churches are even talking about it.

The most plausible explanation is that we're scared. Some things, it seems, may trump religion. Fear is one of them. If Christians are afraid (and who could blame them after 9/11?), it's not surprising that they're listening to other voices besides Jesus' when it comes to the war in Iraq. So what should the three-fourths of Americans who identify themselves as "Christian" make of the Iraq war?

We could spend a lot of time debating whether St. Augustine's "Just War Theory" can be stretched to accommodate our invasion of Iraq, but at this late date it really doesn't matter. We invaded. And, if the Just War Theory means anything, it means that we shouldn't leave Iraq in a bigger mess than we found it. Americans of faith, it would seem, are obligated to do at least the following:

•Express concern for all suffering, including that of our enemies. That means more than paying lip service. As James, the brother of Jesus, said, it does not suffice to tell a hungry man "God bless you!" or "We will pray for you!" We must address his hunger. The same can be said for the additional food, health care, police and countless other things the Iraqi people need. And, though an immediate withdrawal would be precipitous, we must work diligently to respond to the Iraqis' desire that our troops leave as quickly as possible.

•Recommit ourselves to the fundamental principles of justice and human rights that have been a hallmark of our faith, as well as of our nation. That means no more secret prisons, no more secret trials and no more torture. America cannot resort to the worst practices of the Gulag (where citizens were declared "enemies of the state" and whisked away to Siberian work camps without the benefit of a fair trial or the assistance of counsel) and expect to be an accepted member of the world community, much less a leader of it.

•Repudiate the statements of any religious or political leader who suggests that America has a special claim on God. He may have a special claim on us, but we do not have a special claim on him. Our beloved nation is a civil state, not a religious one. There are no references to God in our Constitution. The only reference to religion — other than in the First Amendment — is found in Article VI, which proclaims that there will be no religious test for public office in the USA. The Founding Fathers gave us a secular state in which all religions are free to flourish or flounder on their own initiative without interference by the government. Those running around claiming we are "in the army of God" or slapping up copies of the Ten Commandments on government buildings threaten to turn us into the very sort of society we are fighting against in this new war.

•Force our elected officials to address the conditions that have given rise to global terrorism in the first place. Terrorism exists for a reason. One of those reasons is that our society has been far too unconcerned about the plight of Muslim people around the world. Why, for example, have we not instituted a mini-Marshall Plan for the millions of Palestinians who have often gone without adequate land, roads, hospitals and schools since the 1967 war with Israel? Corruption among Palestinian leaders has squandered billions in the past, but responsible partners on the ground can and must be found. Private foundations with a long history of engagement might be a good place to start.

We need not and should not repudiate our long-standing alliance with Israel to accomplish this. It's simply that our religious traditions teach us that to whom much is given, much is required. The irony, of course, is that it's in our best interest to relieve Palestinian suffering. True, some terrorist leaders come from affluent families and cite Western worldliness and decadence as their motivation for jihad, but the economic factor cannot be ignored. There is no better recruiting ground for the troops of terror than the maddening monotony and grinding poverty of a refugee camp.

In ancient times, particular gods were associated with particular nations. “Tribal deities,” we call them. Today we know better. God is not the mascot of Republicans, Democrats or, for that matter, Americans. God transcends all national and political affiliations. His precinct is the universe.

America is in the deep woods. Never have we been less popular in the eyes of the world. Never have we faced so unsettling an enemy. But before we circle the wagons, Christians should get serious about following the teachings of the one by whose name we are called. He might just know the way out.

Violence Persists After Afghan Offensive (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

AP, September 18, 2006

NATO said Sunday that its two-week offensive in south Afghanistan was a "significant success" that had driven Taliban insurgents from their positions and opened the way for development. But violence was unabated, with suicide bombers killing three civilians and wounding six soldiers.

Militants also took control of a district in the west of the country after chasing away the police, an official said, in an apparent attempt to open a new front.

The developments came as the country is going through its bloodiest phase since the U.S.-led invasion ousted the hard-line Taliban from power in 2001.

Lt. Gen. David Richards, head of the 20,000-strong NATO-led force in Afghanistan, said the insurgents have been forced out of the volatile former Taliban heartland, and reconstruction and development efforts there would soon begin.

Alliance officials have said more than 500 militants were killed during the two-week operation, centered mainly in Panjwai, Pashmul and Zhari districts of southern Kandahar province.

Two foreign military convoys in different areas came under attack from suicide bombers, a method frequently used by insurgents in Iraq.

A 17-year-old youth carrying explosives jumped in front of a U.S. military convoy east of Kabul, killing a bystander, Afghan police said.

Earlier in the day, a suicide bomber plowed his explosive-laden vehicle into a Canadian military convoy west of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan, killing one civilian and wounding three soldiers, authorities said. Eight civilians also were wounded, said Zulmai Khan, a police official at the scene.

Most of Afghanistan's recent surge in violence has taken place in volatile southern provinces, where some 8,000 NATO forces took military control from the U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1. NATO commanders say they need another 2,500 troops plus greater air support to crush the Taliban threat more quickly.

Richards said the end of the southern offensive should open the way for much needed reconstruction and development in areas where the central government has been unable to reach.

But some 400 heavily armed Taliban crossed into the western Farah province, taking control of its Gulistan district after chasing away the police and burning the district headquarters and a local clinic, provincial police chief Gen. Sayed Aqa Saqib said. No casualties were reported.

"We are hoping the government will send more troops, because there are too many Taliban in the area," Saqib told The Associated Press over the phone.

Gen. Sher Mohammad Karimi, the Afghan army's chief of operations, acknowledged that the Taliban "were not all destroyed" and that some have simply slipped away into other areas. "They may reorganize but our troops will follow," Karimi said.

Richards ruled out immediately pursuing the Taliban holdouts.

DOJ_NMG_0063753

"We will not dance to the Taliban's tune," Richards said. "They want to deflect us and take us away. We won't let them do that."

The end of one operation coincided with a start of a new U.S. and Afghan offensive in the east of the country.

Dubbed Operation Mountain Fury, the new offensive involves 7,000 U.S. and Afghan soldiers in the central and eastern provinces of Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktya and Logar, the military said. Fighter planes and helicopters will back the ground forces.

A separate U.S.-led operation called Big Northern Wind has been under way in Kunar province's Korangal Valley since late August.

The Taliban, al-Qaida and other Islamic extremist groups are known to operate in the east, especially in the area bordering Pakistan where the reach of the government is weak and militants find sanctuaries.

The renewed American push to defeat the Taliban-led insurgency comes nearly five years after the hard-line militia was ousted from power.

Separately, the mutilated body of an Afghan engineer who had worked for a local aid agency was found Sunday in Ghazni province, where he had been kidnapped earlier in the week by suspected Taliban militants, said Ali Ahmad Fakuri, the provincial governor's spokesman.

A two-week offensive to drive Taliban insurgents from their positions in south Afghanistan was a "significant success" and opened the way for reconstruction and development, NATO's top commander in the country said Sunday. British army Lt. Gen. David Richards said the Taliban will not be allowed to regroup in the volatile southern Kandahar province. "This time, we're not leaving," he said.

The end of the operation in the south coincided with the start of an offensive in the east, where 7,000 U.S. and Afghan troops moved against insurgents in Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktia and Logar provinces. Also Sunday, about 400 Taliban fighters seized and burned the Gulistan district headquarters in Farah province, said Gen. Sayed Aqa Saqib, the provincial police chief.

Indicted Ugandan rebel leader surfaces

Ugandan rebel leader Joseph Kony, who is wanted by the International Criminal Court for alleged war crimes, surfaced at a camp in southern Sudan where rebels are assembling as part of a truce to end 19 years of conflict, a rebel official said. Martin Ojul, a negotiator with the rebel Lord's Resistance Army, said Kony showed up at Ri-Kwangba camp but didn't say when.

The peace deal with the Ugandan government calls for the rebels to gather at two camps in Sudan where they will be protected while a broader peace is negotiated. Kony is accused of civilian massacres and recruiting children to fight in a war that has killed tens of thousands of people and displaced nearly 2 million.

Palestinian unity talks stall over Israel

Talks between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas, the militant group that runs the government, have stalled over U.S. demands that a unity government recognize Israel, Palestinian officials said. Western nations insist Hamas recognize Israel and renounce violence as a condition for ending sanctions that have crippled the Palestinian economy. "What's the point of forming a government if this government is saying that it won't recognize agreements signed with Israel?" Palestinian lawmaker Saeb Erekat asked.

NATO Faces Growing Hurdle As Call For Troops Falls Short (WP)

By Molly Moore And John Ward Anderson

BRUSSELS -- More than a week after NATO's top leaders publicly demanded reinforcements for their embattled mission in southern Afghanistan, only one member of the 26-nation alliance has offered more troops, raising questions about NATO's largest military operation ever outside of Europe and the goal of expanding its global reach.

The plea for more soldiers and equipment to fight resurgent Taliban insurgents comes as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's forces are suffering the highest casualty rates of the nearly five-year-long conflict in Afghanistan, and as European governments are feeling stretched by the demands for troops there and in Iraq, Lebanon, the Balkans and in several African countries.

"NATO's credibility and future are at stake in Afghanistan," said Pierre Lellouche, president of the French delegation in NATO's parliamentary assembly. "They can't fail, otherwise NATO will lose its credibility."

"It's our most important mission, it's our first priority," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said in an interview at his office here, describing the ongoing combat with the Taliban in southern Afghanistan as "the most intense battle NATO has fought in its history."

Some members of the alliance complain that others are not contributing enough soldiers or equipment, leaving a handful of countries shouldering most of the burden for a high-stakes mission that is becoming increasingly treacherous.

Although no members have criticized others by name, eight of the 26 countries are providing more than three-fourths of the alliance's 20,000 troops now in Afghanistan. Many members are providing fewer than 200 troops. Poland, for example, has contributed 10 soldiers to the mission, according to NATO officials, although it pledged last week to send about 1,000 more.

"It is important that the whole of NATO regards this as their responsibility," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said last week.

The United States has 21,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, more than any other NATO member, but only 1,300 are part of the alliance's operation; the remainder are under exclusive U.S. command. Britain is currently the largest contributor to NATO's force in Afghanistan, with 5,000 troops.

Other countries have complained that their forces are already overstretched.

"Many countries are in the Balkans, in Bosnia and Kosovo, and then in Iraq and Afghanistan and the African countries, and now the Middle East -- Lebanon is taking a lot of resources," said Kimmo Lahdevirta, director of security policy in the Foreign Ministry of Finland, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union but is not a member of NATO.

"There are not many countries with troops that are up to the tasks that they might face in Afghanistan, a high-intensity conflict with the Taliban," said Antonio Missiroli, chief policy analyst at the European Policy Center, a research organization based in Brussels. "If you look at the picture across Europe . . . we are reaching the limits of what we can do."

Scheffer, the NATO secretary general, said military commanders took the highly unusual step about a week ago of publicizing their shortfall of troops, aircraft and other equipment after 18 months of fruitless private pleas with alliance members.

"From time to time, public pressure is necessary," Scheffer said. "You need those headlines to convince nations to step up to the plate . . . I want to ask nations to do what they promised -- and we're not there yet."

Scheffer said he expected the situation in Afghanistan to dominate a gathering of NATO foreign ministers this week in New York, a defense ministers' meeting the following week and a NATO summit in Latvia in November.

NATO took command of Afghanistan's restive southern provinces from a U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1.

The alliance had about 85 percent of the forces and equipment that field commanders said they needed to carry out their dual mission of maintaining security and carrying out reconstruction projects such as building roads, schools and medical clinics, according to NATO officials.

With Taliban fighters becoming bolder in their attacks, the alliance's newly arrived troops launched Operation Medusa this month, but without enough forces to conduct the operations as quickly or effectively as commanders had desired. On Sunday, suicide bombers attacked Canadian and U.S. troops in separate incidents, killing two civilians and wounding six soldiers, the Associated Press reported.

With about 10,000 troops -- half of NATO's entire Afghan force -- Operation Medusa is the biggest combat operation in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion dislodged the Taliban government in late 2001.

Although NATO troops in recent days have ousted Taliban fighters from positions near a vital transportation route west of Kandahar, officials said the battle could have been fought more quickly and with less risk to NATO forces with more troops and equipment -- particularly airlift capacity.

NATO commanders are seeking about 2,500 additional troops, a squadron of about 18 attack helicopters and three C-130 transport planes.

Poland responded to NATO's admonitions last week, announcing it would offer a mechanized battalion of about 900 soldiers in addition to the 100 soldiers previously promised but not yet delivered.

But Poland does not want to send the troops until February and is balking at allowing them to be used where NATO says it needs them most -- in southern Afghanistan. Romania reportedly is considering offering about 200 soldiers in addition to the 560 it now has in Afghanistan, NATO officials said.

Scheffer and other NATO officials said field commanders' hands are tied as much by a shortage of troops as by individual countries' prohibitions on how their forces can be used. Germany, for example, has mandated that its 2,750 troops can be stationed only near the capital of Kabul and cannot be diverted to the more dangerous southern provinces.

Michael Williams, who heads the transatlantic program at London's Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies, said politicians who played down the dangers troops would face in Afghanistan were responsible for withering public support in some European countries for the mission.

Even in the Netherlands, where generals and politicians warned of the dangers of the mission in protracted public debates earlier this year, officials said they have been taken aback by the deteriorating security conditions and the risks their 2,000 soldiers are facing.

"The Dutch government always made clear that it was not going to be an easy ride," said Herman van Gelderen, the Dutch foreign ministry spokesman. Now, he said, it's not a question of fighting only the Taliban. "It seems the Taliban is working together with local Afghan criminals and drug lords, so it's a very serious situation. We always knew it would be hard, but it's even a bit more than we expected."

European public opinion on troop involvement in Afghanistan is also tainted by the war in Iraq, and a general frustration that President Bush's fight against terrorism has led to a deteriorating global security situation, according to public officials and analysts.

"The fight against terrorism united all the nations five years ago, but today, things are not going as well as what we had expected, therefore certain countries question the durability of their commitment," said Serge Vincon, who heads the foreign affairs, defense and armed forces committee of the French Senate.

But Robert Hunter, U.S. ambassador to NATO during the Clinton administration and a senior adviser at the Rand Corp., said, "Some Europeans are hiding behind the Iraq issue and the public's unhappiness with the U.S. in order to shirk their own responsibilities in Afghanistan."

Anderson reported from Paris. Researcher Corinne Gavard in Paris contributed to this report.

Troops In Afghan District Find Anger At Lax Government (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

ANDAR DISTRICT, Afghanistan, Sept. 17 — American and Afghan forces moved Sunday into this district, one of the areas most troubled by insurgents in recent months, as part of a broader operation to reassert control in Ghazni, a strategically important province near the capital, Kabul. But while they encountered little insurgent activity, they did face anger and frustration from the local population.

The new operation, involving about 10,000 troops, began just as NATO forces declared that they had successfully taken control of Panjwai District, southeast of here near the city of Kandahar, after more than two weeks of heavy fighting.

“Afghan, ISAF and coalition forces have successfully cleared the Panjwai area, forcing insurgent forces to abandon their positions,” the NATO commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said in a statement released by the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force.

The extended battle and heavy bombardment in the district left an estimated 500 Taliban fighters dead, and five dead and many more wounded among NATO troops, including members of a unit hit by fire from allies. The remnants of the insurgents are thought to have escaped west into Helmand, a neighboring province, one senior military official said.

Since May, Taliban forces had tried to hold Panjwai, a rich suburb of vineyards and orchards, and make it a permanent base from which to expand their presence in the south and even threaten Kandahar, the military official said.

At the same time, more insurgents swarmed into Ghazni Province in a natural movement away from the border regions with Pakistan, where American and Afghan forces were concentrating much of their military might over recent months, into the more remote highlands.

Local residents in Andar said the Taliban were "everywhere around," but American and Afghan Army forces have so far not encountered much resistance, after an initial fight south of Ghazni that left 36 Taliban dead on Sept. 12.

They entered Andar without a shot fired and held a meeting with elders and townspeople on Sunday to announce that they had come to bring stability and security.

They found a population anxious about security and resentful of the government and the police, whom they accused of preying on the people.

"Please bring security and stability," pleaded one man, Daulat Khan, interrupting the opening speech of the provincial governor, Hajji Sher Alam. He said the police mistreated people, accusing them first of being with a rogue commander, and then of belonging to the Taliban.

Another man said: "Four months ago we had order and justice here. And now I don't know what is the cause, but it has gone."

As soon as he arrived for the town meeting, Muhammad Jan, 35, a mason, said: "There are a lot of Taliban. They are causing a lot of problems. If they come here and fight, it will affect us all."

A white-bearded man, glowering at the governor, shouted, "The governor has done nothing for us!" Another man thundered that the police chief was a bad man and that his police force treated the people badly and profaned their homes.

"The schools have no teachers, no tents, the children sit under the sun, the teachers don't get paid," said Sayed Muhammad, a shopkeeper. "Corruption exists in this district. The members of Parliament promised us a lot, but they did not fulfill even 2 percent of their promises."

"In some districts, the people are receiving a lot of assistance because they know the governor. Their roads are being built and repaired, and here we don't have anything," Mr. Muhammad said to loud applause. The district, badly hit by flooding several months ago, received none of the emergency flood aid that came to the province, he added.

The governor replied, "If anyone harms or mistreats you, come and tell us."

Soldiers of the United States Army 10th Mountain Division listened impassively, even as the gathering of some 200 Afghan men rumbled loudly with discontent.

Bringing security is only part of what the people in these remote, insurgent-ridden districts need and want, said Maj. Gen. Ben Freakley, the operational commander for American and NATO forces in Afghanistan. He said there was an equal need for good governance and development, something the government and the donors, rather than the military, had to achieve.

"If we have to fight, we will fight," he said after the meeting. "We could fight insurgents here for 10 years, but we don't want to."

"The biggest thing is changing the environment," he continued. "Where we have a decent district chief and district police chief, there is optimism, potential and such capability." But, he said, "Andar has been neglected by all of us."

That changed this week with the arrival of an American and an Afghan National Army brigade that will stay in the region until a new police force can be trained and deployed. They found only 70 police officers still working, hunkered down in the police station, frequently under attack, and with many deserting as the Taliban threatened them and their families, extending their warnings even to their cousins.

The neglect was such that many people had sided with the Taliban, since the alternative was a venal, scared police force, said the newly appointed district chief, Hajji Abdul Rahim. "Some of the people are very hungry for government," he said. "We have to work with the people."

Violence continued with two suicide bombers striking Sunday, killing a Pakistani laborer in Kandahar and wounded eight civilians. Another suicide bomber threw himself at an American convoy on the east side of Kabul, wounding two American engineers and two of their Afghan colleagues.

DOJ:

Margolis Is The DOJ's Ultimate 'Inside Man' (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 18, 2006

It's never easy to indict a senator, but this time federal prosecutors thought they had the goods.

In the summer of 2004 prosecutors in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia had assembled evidence they believed would lead to a criminal indictment against Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.). The charge: that Shelby had leaked classified information to reporters about messages intercepted by the National Security Agency on the eve of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The prosecutors had been called in to investigate a June 2002 report by CNN, which, citing two congressional sources, stated that on Sept. 10, 2001, the NSA had intercepted two Arabic messages that said, "the match is about to begin" and "tomorrow is zero hour." The messages weren't translated, however, until Sept. 12. The anonymously sourced report came almost immediately after intelligence officials had presented the information to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, of which Shelby was a member. Armed with information gleaned from FBI interviews with reporters and congressional staff, prosecutors had gone so far as to type up a draft of the indictment.

What was needed to bring the charges, according to two sources with direct knowledge of the investigation, was grand jury testimony by the reporters who spoke with Shelby after the hearing. In order to subpoena the journalists, prosecutors needed approval from David Margolis, an assistant deputy attorney general and the Justice Department's most powerful career lawyer.

But at a meeting in a fourth-floor conference room at Justice Department headquarters along Constitution Avenue Northwest, Margolis turned down the request. The decision effectively killed the investigation. "Without the subpoenas you just couldn't do a grand jury," says one of the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitivity of internal DOJ deliberations.

In theory the prosecutors could have appealed Margolis' decision to then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. But that would have meant taking on Margolis, one of the Justice Department's most respected officials, a lawyer with a sterling reputation earned over 42 years of service at the department. "Taking him on is a losing battle," says the source. "The guy is Yoda. Nobody fucks with the guy."

In many ways, comparing the 66-year-old Margolis to the quirky and ancient Jedi Master is apt. Margolis is widely described as the "institutional knowledge" of the Justice Department. A notorious straight shooter known more for his love of country music and outlaw garb than his politics, he's managed to navigate the shifting sands of Washington to retain a powerful voice under Attorney Generals Janet Reno, John Ashcroft, and now Alberto Gonzales. Though Margolis is technically outranked by more than a dozen political appointees at DOJ headquarters and all 94 U.S. attorneys scattered throughout the country, his influence on the department extends far beyond his title, say both current and former Justice officials.

Margolis' bulletproof reputation and lack of partisan stripes also mean that the presidentially appointed attorneys general and deputy attorneys general at the top often turn to Margolis when Justice Department investigations venture into the swirl of national politics. From the investigation after former White House lawyer Vincent Foster's suicide to the ethics of Kenneth Starr's Lewinsky probe to the leak of Valerie Plame's identity, Margolis has played a major role in the DOJ's attempts to show that its law enforcement actions aren't motivated by political concerns.

That was certainly the case in the Shelby investigation, where a Republican-led Justice Department was probing one of the closest congressional allies of a Republican president. "You can see why in a situation like that it's better to have a Dave Margolis supervising those [investigations] than a Larry Thompson," says Thompson, Bush's deputy attorney general at the time of the Shelby probe and now general counsel at PepsiCo.

Margolis' office is littered with photographs of him with Democratic and Republican politicians alike. FBI Director Robert Mueller once joked that as elections approach, Margolis shuffles the pictures based on who he thinks will win. Like President George W. Bush, he bestows nicknames on favored colleagues. Janet Reno was the "Old Lady." Former Deputy Attorney General Jamie Gorelick was the "Bionic Babe." The studious-looking Chuck Rosenberg, now the U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia, was "Tex," for a previous stint in Texas.

Margolis, who last week was given a lifetime achievement award by Gonzales, declined to comment on the Shelby probe. But his influence goes far beyond merely making recommendations on media subpoenas and overseeing the investigations that stir up Washington's chattering classes. "I have an eclectic portfolio," he says.

And a lengthy one. Margolis serves as the Justice Department's chief disciplinarian of its federal prosecutors, helps choose U.S. attorneys and U.S. marshals, vets top FBI officials, advises prosecutors on when to recuse themselves from investigations, authorizes travel requests for the director of the FBI and the administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and approves requests by political appointees to attend campaign events. In addition, on the rare occasion when a nominee for a presidential appointment is part of a criminal investigation, it falls to Margolis to decide how much of the investigation's information should be shared with the White House and the Senate.

MR. CLEAN

Margolis cut his teeth as an organized-crime prosecutor, and he often uses mob analogies in talking about his career at the Justice Department. When asked by an incoming attorney general what his job duties entailed, Margolis responded: "I'm the department's cleaner. I clean up messes."

The analogy calls to mind the character of Winston Wolfe, played by Harvey Keitel in the 1994 film "Pulp Fiction." In the movie, Wolfe is called in by mob honchos to dispose of the evidence after two foot soldiers accidentally kill a murder witness in the back of their car. But Stephen Trott, who served as Margolis' boss in the Criminal Division during the Reagan administration, sees Margolis' role slightly differently.

"Margolis is the guy who comes in and makes sure the brains don't get splattered all over the car," says Trott, who's now a senior judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in Boise, Idaho. "He keeps people out of those situations."

One example of his efforts to head off trouble came on July 21, 1993. On that day, Margolis, who had recently been promoted from the Criminal Division to become assistant deputy attorney general, took a call from his boss, then-Deputy Attorney General Philip Heymann. "I want you to go over to the White House with [federal prosecutor] Roger Adams. Vince Foster is dead. There's an investigation of it," Margolis recalled Heymann as saying, in testimony before the Senate Whitewater Committee in 1995.

The death of Foster, a deputy counsel in the Clinton White House, had come at a sensitive time in the Whitewater investigation. Republicans in Congress had long suspected the White House was withholding embarrassing information about the Clintons' involvement with a failed Arkansas savings and loan. Immediately after Foster's death the White House had promised the Justice Department that law enforcement officials would be able to review Foster's files in order to look for a suicide note or evidence of extortion.

But when Margolis arrived, then-White House counsel Bernard Nussbaum changed his mind. Instead of allowing Margolis and others from the DOJ to search Foster's files and briefcase, Nussbaum would review them for any relevant material to be turned over while Margolis and other investigators sat across from him in Foster's office. Margolis objected to the change in plans, but after consulting with Heymann, he unhappily acceded. "I explained to Mr. Nussbaum that to do it his way would be a big mistake," Margolis later testified. "I said, 'It was your mistake . . . but it is a big mistake.' "

Margolis' prediction would turn out to be prescient. Nussbaum reviewed the files but didn't find evidence of a suicide note. Almost a week later, however, White House officials would discover a torn note in Foster's briefcase that attested to his unhappiness with life under the Washington microscope. The belated discovery of the note, and Nussbaum's efforts to shield Foster's briefcase and files from Margolis and other investigators, would stoke Republican suspicions that the White House had something to hide. Margolis' own testimony about the episode before the Senate Whitewater Committee in 1995 would only contribute to that perception.

The Foster episode wasn't the only time Margolis tried to head off trouble for his political bosses. In September 1994 the White House contacted the FBI in order to run a name-check on Arthur Coia, the head of the Laborer's International Union, who was being considered for an appointment to a presidential advisory council. But there was a problem. As was later spelled out in a 1997 report by the House Judiciary Committee, the Criminal Division had concerns that Coia was linked to the Patriarca family, a New England organized-crime group. Margolis, according to the report, would repeatedly contact the White House over the next few months to ward off Coia's nomination. Coia would remain close to the White House, but, according to news reports, would subsequently be forced to resign from his post at the union as part of a plea deal with the Justice Department.

Today, Margolis says he has little recollection of the Coia incident. "One of the reasons I'm here is to handle controversial stuff," he says. "And I do and I have, and I thrive on it."

George Terwilliger III, who served as deputy attorney general under President George H.W. Bush, says the reason that Margolis has been so valuable is that he "sees the trainwreck coming." Adds Terwilliger, "He sees the people who could potentially be problems."

HELLBENT AND WHISKEY-BOUND

Margolis was reared in Hartford, Conn. The son of a school administrator and a teacher, he graduated from Harvard Law School in 1964 and was hired as an assistant U.S. attorney in Hartford the following year. He distinguished himself in 1969, when he personally persuaded an armed fugitive wanted for two bank robberies to surrender to him during a meeting at a deserted baseball field. At the time, Margolis was given to long sideburns and Edwardian suits, and, according to a report in the Hartford Courant, left a marked impression on a policeman who observed the negotiations. "When I first saw the kid sometime back, I thought he looked like a draft-card burner," the policeman was quoted as saying. "But now I know the kid's got moxie."

From Hartford, Margolis joined the Justice Department's Organized Crime Strike Force, working labor-racketeering and other Mafia cases during stints in Hartford, Cleveland, and Brooklyn.

In 1976 he would come to Washington, where future Attorney General Richard Thornburgh, then head of the DOJ's Criminal Division, appointed Margolis as a deputy chief of the organized crime section. In 1979 he took over as section chief, a job he'd hold for the next 11 years. By that time, Margolis had earned a reputation not only as a hard-charging prosecutor but something of a long-haired iconoclast amid the DOJ's button-down culture. He kept an oversize portrait of Elvis Presley on the wall of his office and a jailhouse photo of Hank Williams Sr. naked to the waist. The dapper suits had disappeared and were replaced by T-shirts with slogans like "Hellbent and whiskey-bound."

"He would come to work in blue jeans with a giant leather belt and silver Elvis Presley belt buckle," says Paul Coffey, Margolis' former deputy. "As chief of the organized crime section, he had this huge, huge office on the second floor. As you walked in you saw the pictures and the painting, and Dave's desk was on the right. What you immediately noticed were four or five half-full coffee cups. In each cup would be the carcass of a cigarette; on the floor would be thousands of remains of popcorn, because [he] ate popcorn all day.

"We'd let a defense attorney come in from time to time and [they] would all come in looking like a million bucks and smelling like a million bucks, and you could tell they were shocked," Coffey continues. "You could hear their feet crunching the popcorn kernels. They'd walk across, they'd see the pictures, the popcorn-strewn carpet, the cups of coffee all over the place, and a guy dressed in T-shirt and jeans."

During the Reagan years, Margolis also got a taste of the glare of the media. As head of the organized crime section, Margolis supervised the long-running investigation of Teamsters Union President Jackie Presser. Presser had been a prominent supporter of Ronald Reagan's presidential campaigns, but also led a double life as both FBI informant and mob-connected union boss. In 1985, when prosecutors were set to indict Presser on labor-law violations, Margolis turned down the prosecution — a move that quickly drew attacks from those who saw the decision as politically motivated. "I've been accused of being a handmaiden," Margolis says.

Under criticism, Margolis was later forced to reveal to the media that a group of FBI agents had said they had authorized Presser's conduct. Later, the Justice Department would conclude that the FBI agents had been lying. Presser was eventually indicted, and he died while awaiting trial in 1989.

Despite the controversy, Margolis emerged with his reputation intact. "David was like a beacon pointing true north on the case," says Trott, his former boss in the Criminal Division from 1983 to 1986.

THE GODFATHER

In 1990, Margolis left the organized crime section to become a deputy assistant attorney general in the Criminal Division. After Bill Clinton was elected, in 1993, he was promoted again, this time to the deputy attorney general's office. He no longer oversaw organized-crime cases but took on a range of new duties, including that of supervising the DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility. In effect, Margolis became the Justice Department's internal affairs chief, the guy you didn't want showing up at your office unannounced. He was a key player in the decision to prosecute Michael Abbell, a former federal prosecutor turned lawyer for the Cali cartel. More recently, he was involved in the investigation of Richard Convertino, the Detroit federal prosecutor now facing charges for his role in a botched terrorism prosecution.

During the Clinton administration he was also asked to examine certain questions about the propriety of some of Kenneth Starr's actions in the independent counsel investigation, according to Eric Holder Jr., one of Clinton's former deputy attorneys general. But little has been publicly revealed about Margolis' role in the matter, and Margolis calls it an "internal" one he won't discuss.

Clinton DOJ officials expected Margolis to be demoted after Bush's election victory in 2000. But Thompson, who served as Bush's first deputy attorney general and had known Margolis since Thompson's days as a U.S. attorney in Atlanta in the 1980s, kept him on. "There wasn't any question as to whether I was going to keep him," Thompson says. "You don't make decisions; you let Dave make decisions."

That may be an exaggeration, but Margolis' power doesn't appear to have waned even late in his seventh decade of life. Margolis was influential in the selection of Mueller as FBI director, in 2001, says Michael Bromwich, a friend of Margolis' who served as the DOJ's inspector general in the 1990s. He's also influenced a number of U.S. attorney appointments in the current administration, including that of Rosenberg in Virginia. "His opinion is weighed heavily," says Kenneth Wainstein, the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia who previously served as the director of the DOJ's Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys.

As the Shelby case demonstrates, his role hasn't been limited to personnel. Thompson was succeeded by James Comey, and when Comey resigned, in the summer of 2005, he handed supervisory authority of the department's most politically sensitive case — the leak investigation involving CIA agent Valerie Plame — to Margolis. After Paul McNulty succeeded Comey, he made a point of keeping Margolis in that role.

Those who've worked with Margolis attribute his sustained influence at the Justice Department to predictable traits — namely, good judgment and intelligence. But his remarkable devotion to the culture of the department itself is no doubt a factor in his success. In 1995, Margolis suffered a massive heart attack in his office. Then-Deputy Attorney General Gorelick recalls hearing the crack of Margolis' head hitting a coffee table from her desk several doors away. Margolis was rushed to the hospital for quadruple-bypass surgery. Five weeks later, he was back at work. Friends say the heart attack has mellowed Margolis. He's quit smoking, gained weight, and given up wearing T-shirts in the office. He has no plans to retire, and still puts in nearly a full day of work on Saturdays.

Over the years he could have no doubt traded the relative anonymity and government salary of his Justice Department post for the gilt halls of Washington's white-shoe law firms or a slot on the judiciary. But he hasn't. "There's so many games played in Washington with people angling for things," says Trott. "People are trying to become judges, senators, presidents. That doesn't happen with David. In Washington you need somebody like that."

"I stay because this is what I do," Margolis says.

"In 'The Godfather,' Hyman Roth says to Michael Corleone, 'This is the business I've chosen,' " he says. "This is the business I've chosen."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sentencings Await (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, September 18, 2006

Highest-profile case will be ex-CEO Jeff Skilling's

Open season for the Enron era's criminal sentencings is about to get into full swing.

DOJ_NMG_0063761

A few former executives-turned-felons have already received their punishments for crimes they committed within the disgraced energy company's walls, and two have lived in a prison cell.

But this month launches a string of sentencings for those who helped prosecutors as well as those who fought them and lost since Enron cratered nearly five years ago.

The most high-profile sentencing comes next month for former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, barring any last-minute delays. Andrew Fastow, the former finance chief who is among the most notorious felons to emerge from the Enron rubble, also is expected to garner attention when he is sentenced later this month.

A jury convicted Skilling in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors in the government's foremost case to emerge from its sprawling Enron investigation. He aims to appeal.

Skilling's potential punishment of 20 to 30 years in prison is comparable to the 25 years awaiting WorldCom founder Bernard Ebbers, who was convicted last year of engineering an $11 billion fraud that undercut the company.

Another Enron defendant convicted by a jury this year, former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, is slated to be sentenced a week after Skilling. He faces a maximum of 30 years, but likely will serve half that or less, for one count of conspiracy, three counts of wire fraud and a count of falsifying books and records.

And a slew of Skilling's former underlings whose cooperation helped prosecutors win his conviction face punishments for their own crimes, ranging from probation to 15 years behind bars, depending on the offense and whether prosecutors recommend leniency.

Some prison terms are already determined. Fastow, who orchestrated schemes to manipulate the company's books while skimming millions of dollars for himself on the side, agreed to serve the maximum 10-year term when he pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy. And Richard Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, agreed to serve seven years when he pleaded guilty to securities fraud in December. Prosecutors can recommend he serve only five years if pleased with his help.

However, unlike Fastow and others, Causey didn't testify against Skilling and former Enron Chairman Ken Lay — who died July 5. Causey was bound for trial alongside them, but cut a plea deal just weeks before the jury was seated.

The rest are expected to try to avoid incarceration.

"That's just the reality of it," said Philip Hilder, a former federal prosecutor in Houston who represents several Enron defendants and witnesses. "There are cooperators who may get a reduced sentence, and it's up to the defense to hold their feet to the fire. That's the way the system works."

Defense attorneys for Skilling and Lay have repeatedly accused cooperators of lying for the government in hopes of getting lenient sentences after cutting deals to avoid expensive and risky prosecution.

"Their real crimes were committing perjury at trial, and for that they should be sentenced accordingly," lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli said.

The government has already filed notice it will seek leniency for some cooperators, and more may come. Hilder said such requests often influence judges, particularly those who would otherwise adhere to advisory federal sentencing guidelines.

"In many courts, it holds great weight because the judge has the ability, and the cover, if you will, to go below the guidelines and give the defendant anything ranging from the guideline to probation," Hilder said.

Those include David Delainey, a Canadian citizen and former head of Enron's retail energy arm, who will be sentenced Monday for insider trading. Delainey pleaded guilty in 2003 and was among the government's more significant witnesses against Skilling, saying the ex-CEO pressured management to fudge Enron's reported finances and hide losses. He faces anywhere from probation to 10 years behind bars.

In a court filing late last month, Delainey asked to serve probation or be confined at his home in Canada. In the filing, his lawyers described Delainey's help as "exemplary," and that he gave "powerful, credible testimony that has helped to expose one of the greatest frauds ever committed in this country."

Fastow comes next on Sept. 26, followed by eight more through the end of the year, including Skilling and Causey. Specific sentencing dates have not been set for three former California Enron traders.

Two cooperators who never participated in any court proceedings beyond their own plea hearings have already been sentenced. In June, Larry Lawyer, a former midlevel broadband unit executive, received probation for two years for failing to report kickbacks as income. And on Friday Timothy DeSpain, a former assistant treasurer, was sentenced to probation for four years for helping obfuscate Enron's financial health to credit-rating agencies.

The first Enron guilty plea came in 2002, and Causey's was the last.

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches at the Washington University School of Law, said it's not unusual for defendants to wait years between pleading guilty and receiving their punishment, because the more a defendant cooperates, the more information judges have to consider in sentencing. Most sentencings were put off until after the Lay-Skilling trial.

Also, until sentencing, the government can prosecute cooperators if they lie or otherwise break their plea deals.

"If the witness has already been sentenced, those adverse consequences are no longer a factor," Buell said.

The two exceptions were Ben Glisan Jr., former Enron treasurer, and Fastow's wife, Lea.

Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 and went straight to prison for the five-year maximum. He later began helping prosecutors and testified in two trials — including Skilling's.

His prison term was reduced only through means available to all inmates — credit for good behavior and completion of an alcohol abuse treatment program.

Glisan is expected to be released from prison this month to serve his last few months confined at home.

Lea Fastow pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor tax crime in 2004 for helping her husband hide illegal kickbacks from his Enron schemes and served a year in prison.

House Committee Awaits HP Documents Related To Scandal (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 18, 2006

Hewlett-Packard has until today to turn over a massive stack of documents related to its snooping scandal to Congress, which has also asked four key players to testify.

The House Committee on Energy and Commerce is investigating whether HP illegally obtained the home phone records of nine journalists and at least two board members. It wants the computer giant to voluntarily hand over nearly all related documents.

Friday, the panel also requested testimony from HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini, who works for prominent Silicon Valley law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

Additionally, it summoned Ronald DeLia, a private investigator. HP has admitted hiring detectives who pretended to be reporters and board members to access their phone records, a trick that may be illegal under fraud laws.

HP won't say who those detectives are. But committee spokesman Terry Lane says DeLia has relevant information to the case.

On its company website, Security Outsourcing Solutions identifies DeLia as its managing director. The site says the firm helps other companies address internal and external security concerns.

The phone number and address listed actually belong to Boston law firm Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata. Attorneys there did not return phone calls. DeLia did not return e-mails.

HP spokesman Mike Moeller says his company is cooperating with the committee. But he wouldn't say whether employees would turn over documents or testify. As of Friday afternoon, the committee had not received anything, Lane says.

Sonsini's office had no comment.

The committee's requests have so far been voluntary. But it can issue subpoenas if necessary.

On Saturday, HP officials acknowledged they improperly accessed the phone records of Moeller and another employee during the leaks probe. Moeller said Dunn and HP CEO Mark Hurd apologized to him.

DOJ_NMG_0063763

Other agencies are interested in HP. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to charge employees of HP and its subcontractors. The Department of Justice, Securities and Exchange Commission and FBI have also launched inquiries.

The requests will make it tougher for HP to move past the scandal, says business professor Eric Johnson at Dartmouth College. Last week, HP said that Dunn would step down as chairman in January.

Dunn hired the detectives earlier this year to figure out which board member was leaking information to the press. She says she told the detectives to do everything legally and didn't know about the subterfuge until after the fact.

"They were hoping things would blow over," Johnson says. "But there are more shoes dropping."

Hewlett Review Is Said To Detail Deeper Spying (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

A secret investigation of news leaks at Hewlett-Packard was more elaborate than previously reported, and almost from the start involved the illicit gathering of private phone records and direct surveillance of board members and journalists, according to people briefed on the company's review of the operation.

The effort received some degree of supervision from three officials — Patricia C. Dunn, the company's chairwoman, along with its general counsel and another staff attorney — but was quickly farmed out to a network of private investigative firms early last year, according to descriptions of the findings. It is still unclear how much they knew of the details.

Those briefed on the company's review of the operation say detectives tried to plant software on at least one journalist's computer that would enable messages to be traced, and also followed directors and possibly a journalist in an attempt to identify a leaker on the board.

The revelations at Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer maker that helped define Silicon Valley, have provided a rare glimpse of boardroom turmoil — resulting in Ms. Dunn's agreement to step down as chairwoman in January, and two resignations from the board.

But they have also cast a harsh light on the questionable and possibly illegal techniques used in the episode, raising the possibility of criminal charges.

The account of those briefed on Hewlett-Packard's review of the matter sheds new light on the scope and timing of the investigative methods, establishing that invasive and possibly illegal techniques were used far earlier than previously known and that the company's chief ethics officer was among those providing supervision.

The hunt for a boardroom leaker began as early as January 2005, with a focus on disclosures immediately preceding the ouster of Carleton S. Fiorina as chairwoman and chief executive, with a second phase that began a year later. Hewlett-Packard has said that as a public company, it had a responsibility to stop unauthorized disclosures.

But the review reveals that the investigation by its detectives was notable for a lack of close supervision by company officials.

Those briefed on the internal review said that at various times, questions were raised about the legality of the methods used. They did not identify who raised the questions, when, or to whom they were addressed. But a crucial legal opinion, its origins previously undisclosed, was supplied by a Boston firm that shares an address and phone number with a detective firm on the case.

Those speaking about the company's review would do so only if they were not identified. A Hewlett-Packard spokesman yesterday declined to comment on their account.

In addition to scrutiny by prosecutors, a House subcommittee has entered the case, asking for documents on the internal investigation to be delivered today in advance of a Sept. 28 hearing in Washington.

Some of those documents are expected to reveal that detectives made several attempts at direct surveillance of some directors, and were given photos of reporters to help identify them.

At least one reporter, Dawn Kawamoto of the online technology news service CNET, may have been followed as part of the 2006 investigation, said a person briefed on the investigation. Ms. Kawamoto was a co-author of an article on a senior management meeting in January.

The detectives also tried to plant software in the computer of an unspecified CNET reporter that would communicate back to the detectives, people briefed on the company review said. Ms. Kawamoto said in an interview this month that prosecutors had told her that such a ploy may have been used, but said she was not aware of any surveillance.

Representing themselves as an anonymous tipster, the detectives e-mailed a document to a CNET reporter, according to those briefed on the review. The e-mail was embedded with software that was supposed to trace who the document was forwarded to. The software did not work, however, and the reporter never wrote any story based on the bogus document.

On Saturday, the company identified one of two employees who it said had been a target of scrutiny in the internal operation. It said the private phone records of the employee, Michael Moeller, director of corporate media relations, were taken.

It is not clear why Mr. Moeller, whose job it is to speak with reporters, was included in the operation. Robert Sherbin, Hewlett-Packard's vice president for external communications and Mr. Moeller's boss, said yesterday, "Investigators' suspicions were misdirected and were unfounded." He would not elaborate.

Although the company said others outside the company were also targets of detectives, it has not identified those people.

According to those briefed on the internal review, the Hewlett-Packard investigation had two stages: from January to August 2005, when nothing of substance was turned up, and again in January 2006, after the CNET article appeared.

The first call for an investigation from the board came in January 2005 after The Wall Street Journal published an article that cited discussion of the board about a management reorganization and changes in the responsibilities of Ms. Fiorina, then chairwoman and chief executive.

An article in The New York Times on Feb. 10, recounting Ms. Fiorina's ouster by the board, contained extensive details of a directors' meeting and fueled the desire to plug leaks.

Reporters from those two newspapers, CNET and Business Week have been told by the California attorney general's office that they were targets in the operation.

Within 60 days, the investigation into the leaks was up and running, according to those briefed on the company review. Responsibility for the investigation was delegated to the company's global investigations unit, based in the Boston area. Those company officials turned the effort over to Security Outsourcing Solutions, a two-person agency that hires specialists for investigations.

That firm hired Action Research Group, an investigative firm in Melbourne, Fla. The actual work of obtaining the phone records was given to other subcontractors, one of which is said to have worked in or near Omaha. The methods were said to have included the use of subterfuge, a practice known as pretexting, in which investigators pose as those whose records they are seeking.

Previous accounts of the Hewlett-Packard operation have focused on the use of such methods in the 2006 phase of the investigation, but not in its earlier phase.

Federal and California prosecutors, as well as the Congressional subcommittee, are examining the chain of detectives for possible criminal wrongdoing in obtaining phone records. The California attorney general said last week that he had enough evidence to indict people inside and outside the company.

Hewlett-Packard has steadfastly refused to identify any of the investigators it used, including its own.

People briefed on Hewlett-Packard's review of its internal investigation say that it was authorized by Ms. Dunn, the chairwoman, and put under the supervision of Kevin Hunsaker, a senior counsel who is the company's director of ethics. But it is not clear what level of supervision he gave to the project.

Ms. Dunn has said in recent interviews that she could not supervise the investigation because she was also a potential target. She has said she turned to the company's security department in April or May 2005 for an initial investigation, then asked Ann O. Baskins, the company's general counsel, for help in the further investigation last January. Ms. Baskins supervises a team of more than 100 lawyers around the world.

At at least one point, the company's lawyers sought a legal opinion. But it did not come from Hewlett-Packard's own outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, an eminent Silicon Valley law firm.

Instead, the company asked one of its contractors, Security Outsourcing Solutions, which turned to a Boston lawyer, John Kiernan of Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, for the opinion. Mr. Kiernan's office shares a Boston address and phone number with Security Outsourcing Solutions.

The company, in a recent filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, said it had received an outside counsel's opinion that the investigative methods were legal, but it did not identify the source.

It is also not clear whether company lawyers were aware of the close business and personal ties between Mr. Kiernan, Ronald R. DeLia, the owner of Security Outsourcing Solutions, and Anthony R. Gentilucci, the Boston-based manager of global investigations for Hewlett-Packard.

Executives and lawyers back in the company's Palo Alto, Calif., headquarters remained in the dark even after a summary report was produced for them about each of the two phases of the operation, according to those briefed on the review. Neither of the reports, they said, outlined the methods used.

There were discussions of phone numbers and calls in the report. But it is not clear why that fact apparently did not raise alarm among any Hewlett-Packard lawyers about the means used to gain the information.

The findings were presented to the board at a meeting in May, with George A. Keyworth II, the board's longest-serving member, identified as a source of leaks. He refused an initial request to resign, though he ultimately agreed to do so last week. But a fellow director, Thomas J. Perkins, a Silicon Valley venture capitalist, resigned immediately over the handling of the investigation.

It was only through subsequent inquiries to Mr. Sonsini that Mr. Perkins learned more about the methods used. It was his determination to get the company to acknowledge the reasons for his departure that brought the internal investigation into the spotlight this month.

In an e-mail message to Mr. Sonsini on June 19 , Mr. Perkins asked about the legality of obtaining private phone records without a subpoena. Mr. Sonsini responded that Ms. Baskins had "looked into the legality of every step of the inquiry and was satisfied that it was conducted properly."

According to those briefed on the company's review of its investigation, there is no indication that Mr. Sonsini, considered the most powerful lawyer in Silicon Valley, was involved in seeking outside investigators for Hewlett-Packard in 2005 or 2006. He became involved, they said, only when the board asked him for a legal opinion of the investigation and the methods used.

Mr. Sonsini has said that his direct involvement in helping the board trace news leaks was limited to interviews with directors in early 2005.

Mr. Sonsini told the board in August, after his firm's investigation of the detectives' methods, that the use of pretexting "was not generally unlawful." The law firm could not say whether the detective agencies hired by Hewlett-Packard, or the subcontractors any of them used, "complied in all respects with applicable law."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Another One Bites The Dust (USNEWS)

By Edward T. Pound

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

For months, whenever questions arose about an influence-peddling investigation, Rep. Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican, was adamant: He did nothing wrong and wouldn't resign. But all that was so much smoke. First, Ney announced he would retire. Then, last week, he agreed to plead guilty to criminal charges linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ney acknowledged his guilt on charges of conspiring to defraud the public of his "honest services" and making false statements. According to prosecutors, Ney accepted trips worth more than $170,000 from Abramoff, his lobbyists, and their clients. The Abramoff team showered him with campaign gifts, meals, and sports and concert tickets; Ney gave them legislative help. Separately, Ney admitting taking "thousands of dollars" in gambling chips from a foreign executive who wanted his help.

Rep. Ney Pleads Guilty In Ongoing Abramoff-Related Corruption Probe (LAW)

By Anna Palmer And Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 18, 2006

Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, pleaded guilty Friday to criminal fraud charges as part of the government's ongoing public corruption probe stemming from the business deals of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

In the two-count plea, filed in the U.S. District Court for the D.C. Circuit, Ney, 52, admitted to making false statements and to being part of a conspiracy to violate congressional gift bans by accepting handouts and free trips from Abramoff and his clients in exchange for pushing their legislative agenda beginning in 2000 until April 2004.

Ney is the first member of Congress to face charges in a lobbying scandal that has already ensnared six other lobbyists and government officials. Abramoff and his associates Michael Scanlon, former Ney Chief of Staff Neil Volz, Adam Kidan and Tony Rudy all pleaded guilty to bribery charges. David Safavian, former chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstructing justice in connection with his work with Abramoff. (Judge Paul Friedman denied Safavian's motion for a new trial this week.)

Lawyers familiar with the investigation say the government is likely to bring charges against other government officials, former Hill staffers and lobbyists in the coming months.

Ney's lawyers, Mark Tuohey and William Lawler of Vinson & Elkins, did not return calls. A spokesperson at Ney's office declined to comment on the future of Ney's congressional office. But even though the Ohio congressman soundly won his primary election in May, the state Republican Party moved quickly to remove him from the November ballot and named Joy Padgett, a former state representative, on Thursday as his replacement. The New York Times reported Friday that Ney had entered into treatment for alcoholism.

"Congressman Ney obviously has some personal issues that he needs to deal with, and we wish him the best of luck, but he's not on the ballot this November. Our focus is keeping the 18th District in Republican hands," says John McClelland, a spokesman for the Ohio Republican Party.

Ney will appear in court Oct. 13 before Judge Ellen Huvelle. He faces a maximum sentence of 10 years and a $500,000 fine, although the Justice Department is recommending he receive closer to 27 months in prison.

The case is being prosecuted by Mary Butler, M. Kendall Day and James Crowell IV of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

Ney's relationship with Abramoff and his associates began shortly before he took over as chairman of the House Committee on Administration in 2001, a position he held until the House leadership forced him to step down in January.

One of Ney's first illegal acts was inserting statements into the Congressional Record on Scanlon's behalf twice in 2000, according to the plea. According to the Congressional Record, those statements related to Abramoff's Florida business venture, SunCruz Casino.

Ney soon accepted numerous lobbyist-sponsored trips, including an August 2002 golfing junket to Scotland, which included Abramoff, Safavian, Volz and former Christian Coalition organizer Ralph Reed. Ney also took a gambling trip to New Orleans, in May 2003, and vacationed at Lake George, N.Y., in August 2003. Both trips were paid for by lobbyists.

In the plea, Ney admitted he had frequently accepted free meals and drinks at Abramoff's restaurant, Signatures, and took free tickets to concerts and sporting events using Abramoff's box suites at the Verizon Center, FedEx Field and Camden Yards.

In exchange for these gifts, Ney agreed to add language favoring Abramoff's clients into pending bills, according to Ney's plea documents. One of the key pieces of legislation was the Help America Vote Act, in which Ney inserted amendments to lift an existing casino ban for two Abramoff clients and to allow another Abramoff client, a foreign-beverage distiller, to label its product "Made in Russia" even though it was made in a former Soviet republic, according to the plea agreement.

In addition to the Abramoff-related matters, Ney admitted to taking bribes from a foreign businessman who had hired U.S. lobbyists to help get a license to sell U.S.-made airplanes and parts. The businessman, who was not named in charging documents, gave Ney and his staff thousands of dollars in gambling chips on a 2003 trip to a London casino, from which Ney walked away from with more than $50,000. According to lobbying and travel records, the businessman was Nigel Winfield, whose company, FN Aviation, hired lobbyist David DiStefano, a former chief of staff to Ney, in 2003.

Lynch Pleads Guilty To Fraud, Tax Evasion Charges (NSL)

By JOHN P. MARTIN

Newark Star-Ledger, September 18, 2006

Ex-senator and Democratic Party kingpin admits taking kickbacks

State Sen. John Lynch yesterday admitted secretly taking tens of thousands of dollars from a contractor while lobbying to help him develop state parkland, a stunning acknowledgment of corruption by one of New Jersey's most influential politicians.

Standing before a federal judge in Newark, Lynch pleaded guilty to defrauding the state's citizens and to tax evasion. He said he and his business partner, Jack Westlake, used a Tinton Falls consulting company as a "conduit" to accept and hide kickbacks they demanded from contractors.

Westlake, a developer and longtime member of the Monmouth County Board of Taxation, pleaded guilty to a separate tax evasion charge.

Their pleas marked a sudden end to a four-year investigation that began with an inquiry into billboard sales by two high-level aides to former Gov. James E. McGreevey and ended with the prosecution of Lynch, the former Senate president, Democratic Party leader and McGreevey's political mentor.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie called it possibly "the most significant" case in his office during a four-year barrage of corruption prosecutions that has sent dozens of elected officials, public employees and contractors to prison.

None was as powerful as Lynch, who left the Senate after two decades in 2002, but remains widely viewed as one of the state's reigning political bosses.

"Today, an era of corruption and influence peddling for personal profit has been put to an end," Christie said at a news conference.

Under the terms of his plea, Lynch, who is also a former mayor of New Brunswick, agreed to serve between 33 and 41 months in prison, although U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler could opt to impose a longer or shorter term. He released Lynch on $100,000 bail but ordered him to return for sentencing Dec. 19.

The plea spared Lynch, the de facto leader of the Middlesex County Democrats, a trial on more serious charges that, if proven, could have sent him to jail for three times as long. Prosecutors had threatened to charge him with racketeering, a sweeping charge that would have portrayed Lynch as the mastermind of a criminal enterprise spanning years, according to three attorneys with knowledge of the negotiations.

Typically reserved for organized crime figures, a racketeering charge, if proven, could have exposed Lynch to a decade in prison and allowed the government to first freeze then seize millions of dollars of his assets. For months, Lynch had been characteristically defiant, telling friends he would fight the allegations.

Guilty Plea From Former N.J. Lawmaker (PHI)

By Troy Graham And Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 18, 2006

He was once atop the New Jersey political world, one of the most powerful men in Trenton, a mentor to former Gov. Jim McGreevey.

Now former state Senate President John A. Lynch has become another in a long line of politicians convicted in federal court on corruption charges.

Lynch and his business partner, John Westlake, pleaded guilty in Newark on Friday to tax-evasion charges. Lynch also pleaded guilty to a corruption charge for accepting more than $25,000 while in office to lobby on behalf of a sand-mining company.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie, who has brought charges against 97 political figures during his tenure, said Lynch's plea ended "an era of corruption and influence peddling for personal profit."

"At this point, this an an old story... but one today that's of particular significance," he said. "This is one of the most important - if not the most important case - we've brought to a conclusion in my 41/2 years."

The guilty pleas spun off a four-year investigation that began with federal officials examining the business dealings of two top McGreevey aides - Paul Levinsohn and Gary Taffet.

The aides, who were accused of improperly using their influence to broker lucrative deals to install billboards throughout the state, were never charged with a crime. The investigation morphed over time to focus on Lynch and Westlake, Christie said. The aides have denied any wrongdoing.

The billboard investigation began with a deal Taffet and Levinsohn pursued in Gloucester County, and a grand jury seated in Camden heard the evidence that eventually brought down Lynch.

In a statement distributed by his attorney after the hearing, Lynch, a Democrat from Middlesex County, apologized for his "misconduct."

"I remain proud of the many public achievements in which I played a role," he said. "However, I recognize that the misconduct which I today acknowledged will forever overshadow those achievements."

Lynch, 67, could face 33 to 41 months in prison. Westlake, 76, of Red Bank, faces 10 to 16 months. Both men remain free on bond pending their sentencings on Dec. 19.

Lynch was a three-term mayor of New Brunswick, a state senator for 20 years, the Senate president from 1990 to 1992, and one of the men most credited with helping McGreevey win the governor's office. He retired from public life five years ago.

His conviction comes four days before the release of McGreevey's book, The Confession, which details his time as a closeted gay man in politics, and his downfall after admitting an affair with a male employee.

In the book, McGreevey calls Lynch "by far the most powerful warlord in the state," and says Lynch pressured him "to appoint his people to ranking positions, particularly in law enforcement."

Lynch is one of several McGreevey figures to have their day in federal court. Fund-raiser David D'Amiano and real estate mogul and Democratic donor Charles Kushner both were given prison terms last year in political-corruption cases.

Gov. Corzine said Friday that the "toxic mix" of money and politics was a "broad cultural problem" in New Jersey.

"It's unacceptable, the breach of trust, and I'd say the same thing if it were my best friend," Corzine said. "Politics is the basis for economic gain, and that has got to stop."

Lynch and Westlake were partners in a company called Executive Continental, and Westlake controlled another company called Alma Limited, both of which were based in the same Red Bank office and purported to provide consulting to developers. Prosecutors said Lynch used these companies to hide his illegal work for developers.

Lynch admitted to accepting more than $25,000 from a South Brunswick company seeking to mine state-owned lands and then turn the land into a recreation park. The plan needed approval from the state Department of Environmental Protection.

Lynch admitted writing letters on Senate letterhead to the DEP commissioner hailing the proposal as having "great appeal to the general public."

Meanwhile, Alma sought between $120,000 and $200,000 in payments from the company. The money from the sand company passed through Alma, to Executive Continental and then to Lynch, according to court documents.

Christie would not address questions about whether Lynch conducted other similar deals, saying he could only discuss what was contained in the court papers. But, the money Lynch admitted to not reporting to the IRS, about $150,000, passed to Lynch through another unidentified developer interested in a property on the Raritan River.

Christie said investigations spawned by the billboards case would continue, and FBI Special Agent in Charge Leslie Wiser warned, "our team is not done."

"Put this on the billboard: 97-0 and counting," he said.

In Trenton Friday, legislators had differing opinions on whether the conviction would stain the Democratic Party, with Senate President Richard J. Codey (D., Essex) offering the most satirical view.

"People already have the attitude that politicians are crooks," he said with a chuckle. "So another one isn't going to change that."

Christie called Lynch's plea "a sad moment," and acknowledged that the conviction might not change the way politics work in New Jersey.

"The problem is that you get rid of one set of corrupt bosses and another set seems to come in to replace them," he said. "It's up to the people of this state and the leaders of this state... to decide if they want to continue on this path."

Ex-Leader Of New Jersey Senate Is Guilty Of Corruption (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

NEWARK, Sept. 15 — Offering a public apology for adding another chapter to New Jersey's storied history of political corruption, the former Senate president, John A. Lynch Jr. — once the most influential power broker in the state — pleaded guilty on Friday to charges of official misconduct and tax evasion.

Mr. Lynch, whose political machine once gave him the power to appoint judges, shape legislation and pave James E. McGreevey's path to the governor's office, admitted that in 1998 and 1999 he used his public office to help win permit approvals for a mining company that eventually funneled more than $25,000 to him as a "success fee."

He also pleaded guilty to an unrelated tax evasion charge, admitting that in 1999 he failed to declare income he had received from the sale of a parcel of land along the Raritan River.

The charges for Mr. Lynch, 67, who will be sentenced on Dec. 19, carry a possible prison sentence of nearly three years. The case marked a remarkable downfall for Mr. Lynch, once considered a possible candidate for governor. His intensity, intelligence and temper made him a feared political opponent.

As Judge Stanley R. Chesler read the charges in United States District Court in Newark, Mr. Lynch appeared confident. But when asked by the judge whether he was taking any medication, Mr. Lynch said that he had had to calm his frayed nerves in the hours before the hearing by taking sleeping pills and a sedative.

In a written statement distributed by his lawyer, Jack Arsenault, Mr. Lynch said he was deeply sorry for betraying the public trust and embarrassing his family, political colleagues and constituents.

"I deeply regret it, not merely because it will irreparably stain my reputation but, more importantly, because it will further erode both the citizens' faith in their public officials and the country's perception of this great state," he said.

Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, hailed the guilty pleas as the end of an era of political bosses that had led to what he called "the corrupt McGreevey administration."

After watching the court proceeding from the spectators' bench, Mr. Christie held a news conference and said that he hoped the case would serve as a deterrent to any public official tempted to cash in on his public service. "No one, absolutely no one, in New Jersey is above the law," Mr. Christie said.

Although the plea involved only one deal in a career that spanned nearly three decades, lawyers familiar with the case said that after scouring Mr. Lynch's business and political records for more than four years, investigators were preparing to push for indictments on a wide range of charges involving at least six different transactions.

Mr. Christie declined to discuss whether Mr. Lynch might have faced more criminal charges if he had not agreed to plead guilty. But when reporters asked whether Mr. Lynch had gotten off easy by pleading to a single corruption charge, Mr. Christie gave an adamant reply.

"A few years ago he was the most powerful figure in the state," he said. "I don't think John Lynch ever expected to go to jail."

The guilty plea, coming during the final two months of a closely contested race for the United States Senate, was quickly seized on by Republicans, who called it an indictment of New Jersey's Democratic leadership. But there was no evidence in the court documents or hearing that pointed to any other public official.

The investigation into Mr. Lynch was a result of an inquiry that was started in late 2001, the month before his protégé, James E. McGreevey, was sworn in as governor. The following year, federal authorities began investigating a complaint that Mr. McGreevey's incoming chief of staff and chief counsel used their positions on his transition team to inflate the value of a billboard company that they later sold for a profit.

No charges have been brought regarding the billboard transaction. But as agents examined the deal, they discovered that Mr. Lynch and his business partner, Jack Westlake, had received a share of the profits through a consulting company they had formed in 1993.

The company, Executive Continental Inc., helped businesses win government approvals for a wide range of commercial projects, apartment buildings, strip malls and subdivisions throughout the state.

In an interview with The New York Times last December, Mr. Lynch said that his role with Executive Continental was to act as a "choreographer" and help businesses navigate the bureaucratic thicket. He said the company received a "success fee" if the projects were completed, and insisted that he was proud to use his policy expertise to promote private development projects that did not contribute to suburban sprawl.

But in court papers made public on Friday, Mr. Lynch acknowledged that in 1998 he used his public office to lobby for the Dallenbach Sand Company as it sought state approval for the rights to mine property in South Brunswick. Mr. Lynch wrote two letters urging the state's Department of Environmental Protection to approve the project. He later submitted an invoice to the company charging $25,000 "for professional services rendered for lobbying."

Although the project never materialized, Mr. Lynch was ultimately paid more than $25,000 for his work, some of which was paid through Mr. Westlake's other company to conceal Mr. Lynch's participation.

Mr. Westlake was not charged with any wrongdoing in connection with the mining deal. He did, however, plead guilty to tax evasion charges for failing to report the $350,000 in income he made from the sale of the Raritan River property that he owned with Mr. Lynch.

ONE MAN, MANY ROLES: Lynch Flexed His Muscle In New Brunswick City Hall, State Senate, Behind The Scenes (APP)

By Rick Malwitz, STAFF WRITER

Plea eclipses long political career

NEW BRUNSWICK — In the 1840s, Patrick Corrigan emigrated from Ireland and went to work helping construct the city's sewer system. While he chopped through roots under the city sidewalks, he would at the same time plant family roots.

Nearly a century later, in 1938, his granddaughter, Evelyn Rooney Lynch, gave birth to John A. Lynch Jr., who would play a significant role in the city's history and be hailed as a principal architect of its recent revival.

Lynch would follow in his father's footsteps, becoming mayor of the city, president of the state Senate and a major player in state politics, and the reputed political boss of Middlesex County politics.

But whatever good deeds there were in the eyes of many, these were eclipsed Friday, when he pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges. In a deal with the U.S. Attorney's Office, he is expected to be sentenced in December to federal prison for between 33 and 41 months.

While Lynch crafted a lucrative career as an attorney with success not in small ways owing to his political connections, he maintained a passion for the political arena. When the U.S. Attorney's investigation became known in November, he said it was the result of his high political profile.

Of his passion for politics, he explained in a 1999 interview, "Every man needs a crap table."

Taking dad's lead

The senior Lynch was named city magistrate in New Brunswick in 1938. In 1941, he was named Middlesex County prosecutor by Gov. Charles Edison. He would serve two terms as mayor in the 1950s and serve in the state Senate from 1955 to 1977, rising to the position of Senate president.

Following his death in 1978, the John Lynch Sr. Bridge, crossing the Raritan River, was named in his honor.

His son would take the same career path — mayor, state senator, Senate president.

John was the eldest of five children raised on New York Avenue, near St. Peter's Hospital, and he attended St. Peter's High School.

Lynch graduated from College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass., and Georgetown University Law School in Washington, D.C., and then returned home to practice law.

Lynch became mayor of New Brunswick in 1979, and would serve three four-year terms. During his tenure, the city had a revival that made it the envy of other cities in the state.

McGreevey mentor

Lynch toyed with the idea of running for governor in the 1980s. However, his statewide political ambitions would suffer, through no fault of his own.

In 1989, his brother-in-law, Louis Auricchio Jr., was sent to federal prison on income-tax evasion. In 1994, Auricchio pleaded guilty to aggravated manslaughter, admitting his role in the 1988 murder of a mob rival in Kearny.

After Lynch's statewide political ambitions were foiled, he found someone to groom for the governor's office, identifying James E. McGreevey of Woodbridge as an up-and-coming star in Democratic Party politics.

In 1997, Lynch co-chaired McGreevey's campaign, when he sought his party's nomination to challenge incumbent Gov. Christie Whitman.

McGreevey upset U.S. Rep. Rob Andrews in the 1997 Democratic primary, and came within 28,000 votes of upsetting Whitman. In the 2001 election, McGreevey easily defeated Republican Bret Schundler in the governor's race and Lynch was hailed as the kingmaker. That year the www.politicsnj.com Web site named Lynch its "Politician of the Year."

Once McGreevey took office, however, his relationship with Lynch soured. No longer did Lynch have access to the governor's office, and Democratic power brokers repeatedly asked him why he had promoted McGreevey.

Political "choreographer"

Lynch would describe the duration of the McGreevey administration as "the worst 34 months of my political life."

Ironically, Lynch entered his guilty plea the same week The Associated Press printed the most salacious excerpts from McGreevey's tell-all autobiography.

Officially, Lynch's power began to diminish following the 1991 election. Voter dissatisfaction with Gov. James J. Florio's tax increase tipped the balance in Trenton, putting the Republican Party in charge.

Lynch, no longer Senate president, said he believed it was time to enter "the real world" and begin developing business interests in addition to his law practice.

In 1993, Monmouth County developer Jack Westlake created the Alma Limited Partnership to develop business projects. Lynch was not part of Alma, reasoning that, if he was, "I would become the story, as opposed to the project."

Lynch and Westlake then established Executive Continental, to act as a subcontractor working for Alma, with Westlake and Lynch sharing 50/50 ownership. Lynch told the Home News Tribune his role was as a "choreographer . . . to make the politics work."

FBI raid

When the FBI exercised a search warrant at the office Westlake and Lynch shared in Tinton Falls, Lynch claimed he was innocent.

"I am sure that I have been investigated due to the repeated press accounts calling me "boss,' a "warlord,' and many other uncomplimentary names as a result of the nonsense perpetrated by people associated with the McGreevey Administration."

In May, Gannett New Jersey reported that Monroe Mayor Richard Pucci received $150,000 to act as a consultant to New Directions for Responsible Leadership. At the same time, developer Jack Morris, a developer with close ties to Lynch, was seeking approval of a project in Monroe.

Lynch said there was no wrongdoing, although he acknowledged there was a perception of wrongdoing, based on his connection to the story.

"I am a liability because of perception, not reality," Lynch said.

In the wake of that story he faxed a statement to the media, announcing his decision, "to withdraw entirely, permanently and irrevocably from a wide range of public organizations, whether political or philanthropic in nature."

In an interview with the Home News Tribune one week after he issued that statement, he indicated he would not leave the political arena altogether. "God willing I will be around long enough to be banged around some more," he said.

With Friday's guilty plea, the bang of a judge's gavel in federal court forever tainted his name.

Ex-Senate President Admits He Got Payoffs (BERGR)

By PETER J. SAMPSON And MITCHEL MADDUX, STAFF WRITERS

Bergen Record, September 16, 2006

John A. Lynch Jr., a former state Senate president and one of New Jersey's most powerful Democratic bosses, admitted Friday that he took thousands of dollars in payoffs from a company seeking state approvals.

Lynch, 67, pleaded guilty in federal court to devising a scheme to defraud the public. He also admitted evading taxes on $150,000 in unreported income from a separate venture in 1999.

The former legislator -- who sponsored James E. McGreevey's rise to the governor's office in 2001 -- is by far the most prominent of dozens of New Jersey public officials convicted in a series of federal corruption probes during the past several years.

State Republican Party chief Tom Wilson was quick to make political hay of the news.

"John Lynch isn't just symbolic of the Democratic Party in New Jersey: He was the literal hub of the Democratic Party in New Jersey," Wilson said. "Another Democratic Party leader sent to jail, another black eye for New Jersey's reputation."

Democratic State Committee Chairman Joe Cryan fired back: "These types of things happen in both parties, whether it's Republican mayors in Monmouth County or Republican congressmen around the country. Tom should know better than to make these kinds of allegations."

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie -- no stranger himself to accusations of partisan politics -- noted that Lynch, of New Brunswick, once was "probably the single most influential person on the governor of New Jersey."

"Today's guilty plea should send a message that no one -- absolutely no one -- is above the law in the state of New Jersey," Christie said during a news conference in Newark.

Lynch, a former New Brunswick mayor, admitted his guilt before a packed courtroom as part of a plea agreement that brings a close to a four-year investigation. Under federal guidelines, he faces 33 to 41 months in prison when he is sentenced on Dec. 19.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler allowed Lynch to remain free on $100,000 bail, provided he surrenders his passport, submits to a mental health evaluation and limits his travel to New York and Florida.

Lynch, who left office in January 2002, later apologized for betraying the public trust.

"I accept full responsibility for [my] misconduct, and I deeply regret it, not merely because it will irreparably stain my reputation but, more importantly, because it will further erode both the citizens' faith in their public officials and the country's perception of this great state," he said in a statement read by his attorney outside the federal courthouse.

The statement also said Lynch is pained that his crimes will now overshadow decades' worth of achievements in public office.

By pleading guilty, he said, "I hope I can cease being part of the problem and start being part of the solution."

Sand company payoffs

Moments earlier, Lynch told a federal judge that he accepted payoffs funneled through two consulting firms from a South Brunswick sand company in return for his official actions and influence as a senator.

His longtime business associate and a principal of the two consulting firms, John E. "Jack" Westlake, also pleaded guilty Friday.

Westlake, 76, of Red Bank, admitted that he failed to report about $350,000 in 1999 income and, as a result, owes between $70,000 and $120,000 in back taxes.

The partners used the Red Bank firms Executive Continental Inc. and Alma Limited to hide corrupt payments to Lynch, federal authorities said. The firms purported to provide consulting services to developers.

In 1995, the sand company hired Alma to help secure mining rights to state-owned land next to its property in South Brunswick. After the sand was extracted, the land was to be turned into a park and ownership reverted to the state. The company turned to Alma, which is solely owned by Westlake, to get the necessary approvals from the state Department of Environmental Protection.

Lynch wrote letters to the DEP vouching for the sand company and endorsing the park plan.

Between 1998 and 2002, Alma regularly demanded and received payments of $120,000 to $200,000, from the sand company, Lynch admitted Friday. About $25,000 of that money was passed on to him through Executive Continental, a firm in which he held a 50 percent stake, he said.

Christie said Lynch pressed the DEP to approve the park project while not admitting to anyone that he was receiving payments from the sand company.

"That's influence peddling and concealing corrupt conduct," he said.

'Powerful warlord'

As Senate president and as an influential political boss, Lynch exerted behind-the-scenes control over a wide range of government decisions affecting every corner of New Jersey.

In his recently released autobiography, "The Confession," McGreevey described Lynch as "by far the most powerful warlord in the state."

At times pugnacious, often feared and sometimes downright profane, Lynch charted a successful political career secured through written legislation and backroom deals.

He led the revival of a blighted New Brunswick, convincing health-care giant Johnson & Johnson to keep its world headquarters there and sparking an urban renewal movement. He also authored New Jersey's fair housing law after the state Supreme Court ruled that municipalities must provide affordable housing to the disadvantaged.

Among his other achievements were laws to protect the state's dwindling open spaces, protect wetlands and create urban enterprise zones.

Lynch was born in 1938, the son of the late John A. Lynch, himself a New Brunswick mayor who also ascended to the Senate presidency. The younger Lynch studied at the College of the Holy Cross and Georgetown University Law School before beginning a legal career. He was elected to the Senate in 1981.

Aide McGreevey Cited Says They Never Had An Affair (NYT)

By Andrew Jacobs

There were no fireworks, no swooning — and no sex, for that matter, says the man at the center of the political maelstrom that led to the resignation of Gov. James E. McGreevey of New Jersey two years ago.

Golan Cipel, the man with whom Mr. McGreevey says he had a two-year affair, said in an interview from Israel yesterday that he wanted to set the record straight and dispute Mr. McGreevey's memoir, "The Confession," which is to be released tomorrow. He said the book was simply an attempt to rehabilitate Mr. McGreevey's public image.

He said he was the victim of unwanted advances. "I was not his lover," said Mr. Cipel, 37, an Israeli citizen who was New Jersey's homeland security adviser. "I've never met a liar like Jim McGreevey."

In an interview yesterday, Mr. McGreevey would not directly address Mr. Cipel's remarks, but he described the book as a "rigorously and deeply honest" recounting of his years in the closet, his furtive sexual exploits at truck stops and what he portrays as a rapturous breakthrough affair with Mr. Cipel.

"I want to recognize my obvious complicity in the relationship and to underscore the damage and suffering I caused," he said. "But for Golan, I would have never confronted my own truth."

State Senator Raymond J. Lesniak, Mr. McGreevey's close friend, was less conciliatory. "There is a special place in hell reserved for liars like Golan Cipel," he said.

At the time of Mr. McGreevey's resignation, lawyers for the governor said Mr. Cipel was threatening to file a sexual harassment lawsuit. One of the lawyers, William E. Lawler, said that Mr. Cipel's lawyer, Allen M. Lowy, was demanding $50 million in exchange for dropping the matter.

Mr. Cipel denied yesterday that he or his lawyer was seeking money. He said he wanted only that Mr. McGreevey stop harassing him. The F.B.I. investigated extortion accusations but declined to take action.

In the book, Mr. McGreevey calls the relationship a consensual affair that started one night while his wife was recovering from surgery after the birth of their first child. “We undressed and he kissed me. It was the first time in my life that a kiss meant what it was supposed to mean — it sent me through the roof,” Mr. McGreevey writes.

Mr. Cipel said the two men never kissed.

Mr. Cipel called it an encounter marked by deceit and physical force. He said the evening started at a bar near the governor’s home in Woodridge, where Mr. McGreevey tried to ply him with beer while state troopers waited outside. When he refused to drink, he said, Mr. McGreevey asked him to return to his home under the guise of doing work. Once there, Mr. McGreevey poured two glasses of Jägermeister. Again, Mr. Cipel said, he would not drink.

He said Mr. McGreevey downed both glasses, and said he had some paperwork upstairs he wanted to give him. “Contrary to what is in the book, we were not holding hands as we walked up the stairs,” Mr. Cipel said. As they neared the master bedroom, Mr. Cipel said, the governor pushed him onto the bed and jumped on top of him.

After a brief tussle, he forced him off and asked why he thought he was gay. “Everyone is a little bit gay,” he quoted Mr. McGreevey as saying. He said he returned home and the next day, the governor apologized, chalking it up to the liquor and the absence of his wife.

Mr. Cipel said there were other encounters during his two years in the administration.

One episode occurred one night in 2002 when state troopers drove the two men to Washington for a meeting, and the governor tried to rub up against Mr. Cipel’s leg. Mr. Lawler said he interviewed the troopers, who denied that the encounter took place.

After that, Mr. Cipel said, he resigned. Asked why he had not left sooner or gone to the authorities, he said he had been afraid no one would believe him. “I knew McGreevey would do anything to keep his job and I didn’t want to get between him and his ambition,” he said. “I felt I couldn’t really run away from a man this powerful and ambitious.”

Former Aide Denies Affair With McGreevey (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 18, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. - Former Gov. James McGreevey says it was an affair with another man that wrecked his marriage and led to the downfall of his political career.

But the former aide implicated in the affair, Golan Cipel, denies the stories recounted in McGreevey's new tell-all book, saying there was never consensual sex and that there were several occasions where he felt sexually harassed, according to newspaper reports.

"I didn't have sex with him - ever," Cipel, 37, told The Philadelphia Inquirer for Sunday newspapers. "In his book, he talks about love, but I never heard anything from McGreevey that was affectionate. The only thing I experienced from him was sexual harassment."

Speaking by phone from Israel, where he works, Cipel told The Inquirer that he needed to counter what he described as lies in McGreevey's book, "The Confession," which is due in bookstores Tuesday. Cipel repeatedly has denied that he is gay.

McGreevey stood by his account of the relationship as described in the book.

"The book is rigorously, if not painfully, honest," McGreevey told The Associated Press Sunday. "It was necessary in my recovery to be totally honest, to embrace my mistakes, my failures and the pain I caused, and to take responsibility for my actions. The book is an effort, however imperfect, to describe the dangers of living a divided, inauthentic life."

A copy of the book, obtained Thursday by The Associated Press, has McGreevey recounting how he first bedded Cipel in December 2001 while his wife was in the hospital after delivering their daughter. McGreevey describes the first kiss in his life that meant something and lovemaking that was "a boastful, passionate, whispering, masculine kind of love."

Cipel said the evening instead involved McGreevey taking him out to a bar, then back to his condo for shots of Jagermeister. McGreevey pushed him to drink more and then told him to come upstairs to look at something "for work," Cipel said.

"So McGreevey comes up, turned toward the den very fast, and pushed me toward the bedroom. I froze, and I said, 'What's going on?' He pushed me again on my chest. He jumped on me and we wrestled. He tried to kiss me. He tried to sexually assault me," Cipel said.

Cipel said he asked McGreevey why he would think he was gay. "And McGreevey said, 'Everybody is a little gay.' I was completely in shock," Cipel told the newspaper.

According to Cipel, he broke free. But he said he was scared because there was a state trooper outside.

"If I hit the governor back, who would they blame? I rushed out. I went home. I couldn't sleep all night. Thoughts in my mind were running. What am I going to do?" Cipel said.

State Sen. Ray Lesniak, a longtime McGreevey friend, told the Inquirer that Cipel is an "extortionist and opportunist" and a "liar and a coward."

"He's proven it his entire history here in the United States over and over again. And he continues to lie and he continues to hide and run away from the truth," Lesniak said.

Allen Lowy, a lawyer who handled Cipel's sexual harassment case, did not immediately return messages left Sunday night, seeking comment about Cipel's remarks.

In a separate interview with The New York Daily News, Cipel addressed McGreevey's claims that blackmail threats led to his August 2004 resignation announcement.

Cipel said FBI investigators came to Israel and concluded he didn't try to blackmail McGreevey. "I was just the only one with the courage to speak out," Cipel said.

Through lawyers, Cipel threatened to sue McGreevey for sexual harassment shortly before and after McGreevey's resignation. A lawsuit was never filed, and the statute of limitations lapsed. "I wanted to get on with my life," Cipel told The Daily News.

After the resignation, McGreevey, 49, retreated into private life and remained silent until he spoke with Oprah Winfrey on Tuesday about the book - that show will air this Tuesday. He works now as a university-level educational consultant and a childhood anti-poverty advocate, and lives in Plainfield, N.J., with his partner, Mark O'Donnell.

According to Cipel, he enjoyed working on McGreevey's 2001 gubernatorial run, but thought he wouldn't be on McGreevey's staff, because he was a non-U.S. citizen.

"He said, 'I can arrange anything. I'm the most powerful governor in the nation,'" Cipel told The Inquirer.

Cipel told The Daily News that he once asked McGreevey whom he reported to. "And he said, 'Only God is above me,'" Cipel said.

Jury Deadlocked On Aryan Execution (LAT)

By Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Jurors deadlocked today on whether to execute two kingpins of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang who orchestrated a decades-long reign of murder from their cellblocks.

As a result, Barry "The Baron" Mills, 58, and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 59, will live out their years where they have spent most of their adult lives — and where their names already carry near-mythic weight: behind bars.

The jury had been deliberating on the death penalty for a week when it announced the deadlock Thursday to U.S. District Judge David O. Carter, who told the panel to deliberate further. This afternoon, jurors sent word they still could not make up their minds. In federal death penalty cases, if jurors cannot reach a unanimous verdict, defendants receive a default penalty of life in prison.

The same jury convicted the graying, walrus-mustached pair of racketeering and murder in July after a five-months trial in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. The case involved 17 murders or attempted murders dating back to 1979, when Mills stabbed another inmate to death in an Atlanta prison for cheating the gang on a drug deal.

Under Mills' and Bingham's leadership, prosecutors said, the Brotherhood killed to enforce obedience among vast prison populations, run the drug trade, eliminate government informants and keep its members loyal to the gang's strict code.

The gang's violence culminated in 1997, when Mills and Bingham, incarcerated at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, Colo., smuggled a message written in invisible ink to another Brotherhood leader, Al Benton, at the federal prison in Lewisburg, Pa. The message urged Benton to wage war on black inmates, prompting him and his soldiers to launch a blitz attack that left two black inmates dead.

"They thought about it, they plotted, and they sent a message," prosecutor Terri Flynn told jurors, contending that the premeditation involved in the Lewisburg murders argued for the death penalty for Mills and Bingham. "This was not a spur of the moment event that happened."

As the leaders of a gang that employed elaborate ruses to communicate, such as cloaking messages with a 400-year-old binary alphabet system and embedding notes in the text of library books, Mills and Bingham remained a threat to guards and other inmates, the prosecutor said.

Even at the Supermax, the nation's tightest lockup, they were able to thwart the best efforts to watch them. "These men were still able to start a nationwide race war from that prison," the prosecutor said. "They know how to get around the secure facilities."

Mills oversaw the Brotherhood's reign of violence even as he was serving a life sentence for the 1979 murder, the prosecutor said, asking jurors to consider what besides death might deter him from further crime. Like Bingham, Mills has two prior convictions for robbery with a firearm and has been incarcerated most of his adult life.

It would not be adequate punishment, the prosecutor told jurors, "to send them back to prison, to send them back to the place where they are legends."

Defense attorney Dean Steward said the aging defendants would spend the rest of their lives in maximum-security cells and posed no further threat, especially because the Bureau of Prisons had improved security enough to intercept any clandestine communication between the Brotherhood. "They can easily bottle this up," Steward said.

Arguing to keep Mills and Bingham alive, the defense attorney said that Benton, who committed one of the Lewisburg murders, received just a nine-year sentence in exchange for his testimony and would likely be paroled.

"How can you, under any fair system, send Al Benton home and kill these men?" Steward asked the jurors.

During the penalty phase of the trial, the defense sought to paint a picture of Bingham as more than a prison warlord. Jurors saw childhood photos of Bingham, as well as many taken from 1981 to 1985, when he was a free man, married with three sons. The sons took the stand to say they loved their father.

Penny Allamprese, Bingham's ex-girlfriend, testified that she met him when she was 12 years old and he was a 14-year-old with "auburn hair," a "beautiful smile," and a "girl on each side." Her mother forbade her from dating him, she said, so they ran away together.

"He stole a car and met me at midnight," she said. "We were going to Texas to get married."

Instead, a sheriff's deputy caught them in Barstow. Over the years, she added, Bingham has sent her hundreds of poems, many documenting the horrors of prison life.

The defense called no family members for Mills, who has been in prison continually since the 1970s and is known only to have one living relative. Instead, defense attorney Steward stressed that prison is a violent environment with harsh rules where survival means finding friends.

The case was the first of several targeting the Aryan Brotherhood's leadership. Along with Mills and Bingham, lesser gang members Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Gibson were convicted in July of conspiring to murder black inmates. They face 20 years to life in prison when Judge Carter sentences them in October.

Bingham and Hevle, had they not been convicted, were scheduled to be released in four years.

Aryan Brotherhood Convicts Get Life Sentences (OCR)

By Larry Welborn, The Orange County Register

Orange County Register, September 16, 2006

In Santa Ana, a jury deadlocks after five days of deliberations, leading a judge to declare a mistrial and impose judgments.

SANTA ANA – Two members of the violent Aryan Brotherhood prison gang stared unflinchingly straight ahead Friday when a federal jury announced it could not decide if they deserved the death penalty for multiple convictions of racketeering and murder.

U.S. District Court Judge David O. Carter then declared a mistrial and said he must now impose a sentence of life without the possibility of release for Barry "The Baron" Mills, 57, and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 58.

Carter scheduled a hearing to confirm the sentence Nov. 13.

The two inmates with shaved heads and bushy mustaches sat laughing and chatting with their lawyers behind a security wall inside the Ronald Reagan courthouse before the jury was brought into the ninth-floor courtroom. But they were somber and serious when the eight-man, four-woman jury announced the impasse after five days of deliberations.

Jurors revealed after the mistrial was officially recorded that their last vote had been 9 to 3 for death for Mills and 8 to 4 for life without release for Bingham, both reputedly members of the federal commission for the Aryan Brotherhood.

H. Dean Steward, one of Mills' defense attorneys, said Mills was relieved and grateful to the jury that he will not face execution even though it means he will likely spend the rest of his life in almost total isolation at a super maximum federal prison in Colorado.

Michael White, one of Bingham's lawyers, said that Friday's events were "bittersweet" for his client because he realizes he will never be released from prison to be with his longtime girlfriend and their three sons.

Bingham had been eligible for parole in 2010 before the same jury convicted him and Mills in July of racketeering and murder charges for ordering fellow Aryan Brotherhood inmates to commit violence against other gangs and inmates who were deemed in violation of the Aryan Brotherhood code.

The trial, which began in March, was part of a larger effort by federal prosecutors to dismantle the influence that the Aryan Brotherhood holds over prisons throughout the country.

The Aryan Brotherhood was founded by white prison inmates at San Quentin State Prison in Northern California in 1964 and is now made up of no more than 100 core members, according to federal authorities.

A federal grand jury indicted 40 known associates of the Aryan Brotherhood, including Bingham, who once boasted he could bench press 500 pounds, and Mills, in October 2002, charging them with a series of prison murders and violent attacks on inmates.

Two other top members of the Aryan Brotherhood were convicted in July along with Mills and Bingham. They are scheduled to be sentenced to 20 years to life without the possibility of release in October.

Several other trials are scheduled to begin in various federal courts later this year and early next year.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Terri K. Flynn said that even though the jury did not vote for death for Bingham and Mills, the trial was a success. She said the convictions in July should send a message to Aryan Brotherhood members and other prison gangs that the government will go after violent prison inmates.

"These two defendants have effectively been gutted," she said. "They will spend the rest of their lives hidden away in isolation in some prison."

Life Sentences For 2 Aryan Brotherhood Men (NYT)

By The New York Times

By The New York Times

SANTA ANA, Calif., Sept. 15 — Two Aryan Brotherhood members were spared a death sentence on Friday when jurors here reached an impasse after six days of deliberations in the penalty phase of their racketeering, murder and conspiracy trial.

The jury told Judge David O. Carter of Federal District Court on Thursday that it was deadlocked. Judge Carter ordered the panel to continue deliberations. On Friday, the jurors again declared an impasse, with nine of the 12 jurors favoring death for one man, Barry B. Mills, 57, and eight of the 12 favoring a life sentence for the other, Tyler D. Bingham, 58.

The judge is scheduled to sentence the two men to life terms on Nov. 13. Under the law, the prosecutors cannot ask for a new penalty phase.

"There is no real happy ending here, because both men are being sent back to the ADX, where they are going to spend the rest of their lives in the most secure prison in the United States," Mark Fleming, a lawyer for Mr. Mills, said as he referred to a federal prison in Colorado.

The men were the first among 40 people in an indictment meant to bring down the Aryan Brotherhood.

Judge Declares Mistrial In Death Phase Of Aryan Brotherhood Trial (MERCN)

By Gillian Flaccus

The San Jose Mercury News, September 16, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - A federal judge declared a mistrial Friday in the death penalty phase of the trial of two Aryan Brotherhood leaders convicted of murder, racketeering and conspiracy after jurors announced they were unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

The ruling means Barry "The Baron" Mills and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham will serve life in prison without parole. U.S. District Judge David O. Carter scheduled their sentencing for Nov. 13.

The same jury convicted Mills and Bingham in July. Jurors were then asked, in a separate proceeding, to determine whether Mills, 58, and Bingham, 59 should be sentenced to death or life in prison without possibility of parole.

After 3 1/2 days of deliberations, jurors told Carter on Thursday they were deadlocked, but he ordered them to return to the jury room and attempt to resolve their differences. After spending another day deliberating, they announced it would not be possible to reach a unanimous decision.

"We are honestly and conscientiously unable to agree after a full consideration of the evidence," the foreman said in a note sent to the judge.

The case against Mills and Bingham was part of a larger indictment that federal prosecutors hope will eventually dismantle the Aryan Brotherhood, the violent white supremacist organization that is accused of running powerful gambling operations and drug rings from inside some of the nation's most notorious prisons.

Among other things, the jury convicted Mills and Bingham of inciting a race riot at a prison in Lewisburg, Pa., in 1997 by conspiring to send a secret message to Aryan Brotherhood members. Frank Joyner and Abdul Salaam, alleged members of the rival DC Blacks prison gang, were killed during the uprising.

Charges against the pair were brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law, and they were convicted of offenses known as Violent Crime in Aid of Racketeering - laws originally passed to target the Mafia. The so-called VICAR verdicts made Mills and Bingham eligible for the death penalty.

Experts say the full indictment, which lists 32 murders and attempted murders, makes up one of the largest federal capital punishment cases in U.S. history. Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe said up to 16 people potentially face execution in a half-dozen trials scheduled in the coming months in Orange County and Los Angeles.

Jurors told Carter Friday they were split nine to three in favor of death for Mills and eight to four in favor of life in prison for Bingham.

He asked if the extra day of deliberations had any impact on the vote and they said only slightly, adding one juror moved from voting for life in prison to voting for death for Mills.

After Carter declared the mistrial, authorities escorted the jurors from the courtroom to their cars, and the judge said their identities would not be revealed.

Mills was already serving two life terms for nearly decapitating an inmate in 1979, but was eligible to apply for parole until Friday's ruling. Bingham, in jail on robbery and drug charges, would have been released in 2010.

Both were housed in ADX, the maximum-security prison in Florence, Colo., prior to the trial and will likely return there. Prosecutors said they will be held in solitary confinement 23 hours a day in a high-security wing that houses notorious convicts such as al-Qaida member Zacarias Moussaoui and Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Terri K. Flynn said the government's failure to win a death penalty verdict was "not a defeat."

"These two have effectively been gutted and they will be hidden away somewhere they can't do any more harm," she said. "It sent a message not only to the Aryan Brotherhood but to all the prison gangs that inmates can't kill other inmates, and if they do they will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law."

One of Mills' attorneys, Mark Fleming, said his client was "relieved and appreciative" that the jury had spared him the death penalty.

Bingham attorney Michael White said his client was also relieved but that both were concerned about being housed once more in ADX.

"They're very concerned about what their life will be like. The ADX can be very restrictive, and the question is, how restrictive will they make it," White said.

Defense attorneys argued that one of the reasons jurors should spare the defendants' lives was because the inmate who actually killed the two black prisoners struck a deal with prosecutors. Under the deal, he was sentenced to nine years in prison and testified in the trial against Mills and Bingham.

Carter said he wanted to poll the jury in an effort to determine if that information had an impact on its members.

"These cases are costing millions of dollars. ... I think with the millions and millions of dollars they should be forthcoming," he said.

During the trial, government witnesses revealed many of the secret inner workings of the Aryan Brotherhood. Among other things, they told of a secret note, written in invisible ink made from urine, that was passed from Bingham's high-security cell in Florence, Colo., to Lewisburg. The note read: "War with DC Blacks, TD."

Mills and Bingham were also convicted of a count of murder for the killing of Arva Lee Ray, a prisoner slain at the Lompoc, Calif., penitentiary in 1989, as well as counts of racketeering that included acts of murder and attempted murder.

Two other men who went on trial with Mills and Bingham - Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson - will be sentenced to life in prison.

Seniors Call For Action Against Fraud (MH)

By John Dorschner

The Miami Herald, September 18, 2006

When Muriel Sherman, 81, decided to go to war against Medicare fraud, she found a lot of seniors who wanted to join her.

Her story, reported in The Miami Herald last month, has sparked a wave of responses from seniors with similar stories about their identities being used for widespread fraud that FBI officials estimates runs $1 billion a year in South Florida alone.

Because their comments were so numerous and so intense, The Miami Herald has decided to open a forum on its website dedicated to healthcare fraud. (Go to MiamiHerald.com and click on Health).

The forum will consist of comments of seniors and others whose identities have been used, announcements from law enforcement and news reports. It will be updated frequently as developments occur.

"After I read this wonderful article, I went immediately to my summary notices, and I saw I too was a victim," wrote A. Friedman of North Dade in one of several dozen responses. "I'm very irate. I've already called Medicare . . . I got the phone number of the service that did the billing and I called. I got a recording in Spanish. I told them: `I'm reporting you to the FBI and the Herald! You better stop this.' "

Phil Wall of Kendall had a suggestion: ``Has anyone yet realized that Muriel Sherman, and thousands more seniors who are just as irked by what's going on, represent an untapped mass of unlimited resources that would gladly get busy and identify dozens of frauds every hour if their efforts were productive of anything but yawns on the part of the folks who take the reports?. . .

'My own experience in reporting 25 or 30 obvious frauds has told me plainly that all the protections presently in place amount to a very bad joke. Never before has there been such an immediate need for `whistle-blowers' by hundreds of thousands!! Might a small reward be workable?"

Timothy J. Delaney, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami Division, warned seniors not to do investigations on their own. ``I would leave that up to the professionals."

Delaney, who previously was the FBI's national case manager for healthcare fraud cases, acknowledged that healthcare fraud is a huge issue here, particularly in durable medical equipment, a long-standing concern, and in expensive HIV/AIDS infusion treatments, which was first revealed as a massive problem in a Miami Herald report last year.

"It is a huge problem, but there are many people trying to do something about it," Delaney said. Thirty of the Miami division's 390 case agents are dedicated to healthcare fraud.

Seniors can help by taking a careful look at their explanations of benefits that arrive periodically in the mail from Medicare. If they spot something odd on their bills -- particularly charges for clinics or doctors they've never been to -- they should start by calling the 1-800 number on their EOB form. They can also call the Medicare fraud hot line at 1-800-447-8477.

"I don't encourage calling the FBI," said Delaney. "Any single complaint is not enough" to launch an investigation. "Every citizen has the right to call the FBI," but in healthcare fraud cases, the agents generally fill out a form and forward the information to investigators.

Several seniors have told The Miami Herald that when they called Medicare to complain about fraud, they were told that an investigation is not launched until $1 million in claims has been built up.

Delaney acknowledged there was a threshold for investigations, but he refused to say what it was. Healthcare fraud cases tend to be complicated, he said, with agents having to gather records from several different sources -- meaning it can take months to bring a case to an indictment.

Meanwhile, many persons are irate. "If a person walked into a bank with a note demanding $1,000, the FBI would be on the case in seconds, and they would be arrested and prosecuted. We have people stealing millions and nothing is happening," Jim Nolan wrote to The Miami Herald. ``Every American taxpayer and the business community is paying for this fraud. Does it take 80-year-old woman and her husband to go to a phony store front to get some attention?"

As for Muriel Sherman, now 81, she said that since the report was published, she received a copy of a two-page letter the FBI sent Medicare fraud investigators about her case. But she's received no word about anything action against the clinic that billed her for visits she never made.

Sweep Targets Medicare Fraud (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, September 18, 2006

MIAMI - Medicare recipient J.D. got a $3,500 artificial leg and a $2,900 arm prosthesis. For F.R., it was a $2,320 prosthetic arm with locking elbow and a $6,840 artificial leg. Medicare provided M.C. with a $1,200 shoulder apparatus and a $1,700 device for a below-knee amputation.

Each of these people, identified in court documents only by their initials, is a real Medicare beneficiary who lives in the Miami area. But none of them lost even a finger, much less two limbs.

Instead, federal prosecutors say they were paid by a crooked medical devices company for use of their Medicare status to steal more than $3 million from the nation's health care program for the elderly. The company's owners also paid doctors kickbacks to write false prescriptions for the devices, investigators say.

Such schemes are all too common in the retirement haven of Florida, second only to California with more than 3 million Medicare recipients, according to 2005 Medicare data. Three urban counties in South Florida - Broward, Miami-Dade and Palm Beach - are home to almost a third of all Florida's recipients, and have become a national hotbed for fraud.

Borrowing a tactic used successfully against drug traffickers, federal prosecutors in Miami are attacking the problem by focusing on both the "street-level" scams that typically involve between $1 million and $5 million in fraud as well as the high-dollar cases involving large health providers.

Since last October, the effort has result in criminal charges against more than 100 people in 63 separate cases and civil lawsuits against another 38 defendants. All told, the cases over this one-year period involved more than $100 million in Medicare fraud, Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said.

In past years, Acosta said, criminals widely thought that investigators wouldn't waste much time on relatively small-dollar fraud amounts of $1 million or $2 million.

"Word on the street that you could fly under the federal radar is not a good thing," Acosta said. "We're talking real money here. I think this is a serious problem."

The crackdown involves several federal, state and local agencies. Miami and Los Angeles are also the only two cities where investigators are using sophisticated data analysis techniques to uncover Medicare fraud patterns, Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz said.

"When we see there is a pattern, we start looking into it," he said.

Such patterns include unusual surges in Medicare billings from particular clinics or medical suppliers. Analysts also focus on billings for certain items that are prone to fraud. For example, investigators in Florida focused on AIDS drug fraud when they encountered more claims for certain drugs than there are AIDS patients in the entire state.

Two Miami men were arrested earlier this month for running a clinic that altered blood samples so the "patients" - who had been paid with cash or gift cards - appeared to be in need of a serious and costly AIDS drug treatment. That scheme defrauded Medicare of $1.4 million.

FBI Papers Portray How Fund-raiser Became A Power Player (PHI)

By Carrie Budoff

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 18, 2006

When Democrat Bob Casey Jr. needed money for his gubernatorial race, there was one man he couldn't do without: fund-raiser extraordinaire Robert M. Feldman.

Casey wasn't the only Feldman fan. Short and courtly, with a taste for expensive suits and power lunches at the Palm, Feldman also raised millions for other politicians, such as Gov. Rendell, Mayor Street, and former New Jersey Gov. Jim McGreevey.

No longer. Ever since Feldman got entangled in an FBI investigation into Philadelphia corruption and another in Puerto Rico, he has lived in exile from the political world he once walked as a king.

Casey, for one, still calls Feldman "a very good friend," but takes pains to point out that Feldman is playing no role in his campaign for U.S. Senate.

Feldman has become an issue in the race anyway. Casey's opponent, Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, is airing a TV ad that, without naming Feldman, refers to him as Casey's "handpicked finance chairman" and notes he was under federal investigation.

Feldman has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and appears to remain under scrutiny only in Puerto Rico, where federal authorities are investigating his role in campaign contributions to the island's governor. Feldman has said he did nothing improper.

Although his days as a kingmaker are on hiatus, maybe permanently, a remarkably candid portrait of Feldman's dealings has emerged from a court case and FBI wiretaps of conversations with the late dealmaker Ronald White. The documents had not been previously made public.

Feldman could raise money at a fantastic clip, $25,000 to $50,000 at a time, the bulk of it from a small group of donors, reports show.

And lots of money flowed to Feldman, too, thanks to his ability to open doors. Some donors in his network paid Feldman more than $4 million in fees to get them "in front of decision makers," Feldman said in documents in a civil lawsuit.

Feldman also sought deals for himself.

In a Sept. 24, 2003, taped conversation, Feldman pressed White to cut him into a Penn's Landing redevelopment project, saying he had yet to reap rewards from his investment in Street.

"I've got nothing. I've raised a ton of money for the mayor. I'm raising right now for him," Feldman said. "Maybe I should make this my 'big ask.' "

Feldman, 59, of Gladwyne, declined be interviewed for this article. His attorney, Henry E. Hockeimer, declined to comment.

Casey says he has worked hard to make sure his campaign contributions are proper; he says he shouldn't be criticized for Feldman's legal problems. Republicans are trying to "smear me any way they can," he says.

Casey and Rendell say they had no clue Feldman was getting paid as a consultant by donors, and they were never personally lobbied by him.

"I was never aware of it," Casey said. "I don't know about, nor should I know about, his private business ventures."

A rapid rise

In a world where it can take years for a bit player to become a big player, Feldman seemed to come out of nowhere.

He was a high school dropout who pushed himself, earning a GED and spending almost two years at Trenton Junior College and the School of Industrial Arts (now Mercer County Community College) before leaving. He worked as an insurance broker, then in construction. Eventually, he began a managed-care dental company that sold plans to labor unions and corporations.

When it came to political fund-raising, Feldman rose quickly.

In a court statement, he identified himself as finance chair for Democrat Mark Singel's 1994 race for governor and then-Republican Barbara Hafer's 1996 state treasurer's bid.

Raising money for Democrat Marty Weinberg's Philadelphia 1999 mayoral campaign, Feldman went head to head against fund-raising powerhouses such as State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo (D., Phila.) - often beating them.

"I had never seen him before. I had never heard of him before," said Ken Smukler, a Philadelphia political strategist who met Feldman on Weinberg's campaign. "The guy goes gangbusters in raising money."

Political players spent a lot of time trying to figure out what made Feldman tick. The consensus: It wasn't really ideology, or even business.

"He likes to be perceived as being important and being in the inner circle of whatever candidate he picks," said consultant Howard Cain, a longtime political operative for Fumo. "He likes to be courted by candidates and acknowledged. It may be simple as that."

After Weinberg lost, Feldman moved seamlessly into Street's mayoral campaign, as finance cochairman.

Soon, Casey came calling for help in the governor's race.

"I knew he was a really good guy and a great fund-raiser, and I had a lot of work to do to raise money," Casey said. "It was pretty simple."

Feldman had built significant fund-raising muscle, and he began to exercise it. One example came in 2001, when Feldman served simultaneously as top fund-raiser for gubernatorial campaigns in two states - Casey's in Pennsylvania and McGreevey's in New Jersey.

As usual, Feldman's network of donors sent hundreds of thousands of dollars to assist both men, records show.

This time, $250,000 donated to Casey was sent across the Delaware River into New Jersey.

The donations came in two installments, in March and October 2001, and were distributed to four political committees supporting McGreevey, finance records show.

The money transfers are striking because of their size and timing; in 2001, Casey was struggling to raise money for a primary fight against the better-financed Rendell.

Casey aides said it was a strategy: They hoped to generate good will in New Jersey so money would flow back to Casey.

Through the May 2002 Democratic primary, New Jersey donors gave $1.2 million to Casey and $885,000 to Rendell, records show.

Casey says he's now fuzzy on the details.

"I do remember we contributed to him or committees that were supporting him," Casey said of McGreevey.

Casey matched Rendell's fund-raising, but still lost the primary. Soon after, Feldman became one of Rendell's four finance cochairmen.

Providing access

Feldman's ability to deliver $25,000, $50,000, and sometimes $100,000 donations, seemingly with ease, confounded his rivals. The beneficiaries marveled at it.

"He was one of those guys who didn't do a lot of posturing or a lot of talking. He just came in with checks," said Shawn Fordham, Street's campaign manager in the 2003 race.

Flashy - he and Ron White rode chaffeured Mercedeses with their initials imprinted on the license plates - but also intensely private, Feldman rarely talked about his consulting business, political associates say.

In newly filed court documents, Feldman gave some details about his life as a top political dealmaker.

At least five firms, whose principals formed the foundation of his fund-raising network, paid Feldman to "primarily help with meetings, access."

"Say I am having lunch with someone and I may have three consulting clients," Feldman said in a court statement. "If the person that I am meeting with would have some interest in any of my clients, I would mention them.

"It is not time-consuming."

The five firms that paid Feldman as a consultant put $636,000 into Casey's gubernatorial campaign, $546,000 into Street's campaigns between 1999 and 2003, and $230,000 into Rendell's campaign in 2002, records show.

The most detailed disclosures concern Investment Management Advisory Group, or Image, a politically active Chester County investment firm to governments and nonprofits.

Feldman began consulting for Image in May 2000, earning more than $1.2 million through 2003, court documents show.

His compensation spiked in the months after McGreevey took office, rising from $30,000 in January 2002 to $187,000 in August 2002, court documents show. At that time, Image's government portfolio expanded as the firm won more than $4 million in work from the McGreevey administration, according to news reports.

It was Feldman's business partnership with White, the Philadelphia lawyer indicted on corruption charges, that attracted FBI scrutiny.

Together they raised money for Street and McGreevey, and tried to generate deals for themselves and people in their fund-raising network.

It didn't always run smoothly.

In that September 2003 taped conversation, White told Feldman that there was no more room in the Penn's Landing deal. White went on to protest that he was delivering for their "whole network," mentioning Image and Hill International, a Marlton construction company.

"Whatever you needed, I went in and asked for. For you," White said. "We got a lot."

"Me?" Feldman said.

"Well, your people," White said.

Not good enough, Feldman replied.

"When I raise money, they got to help me, too... so that I can continue to raise money," Feldman said.

Executives from Image declined to comment; Hill executives failed to respond to interview requests.

For more than a year after the FBI probe went public, Casey stood by his man, keeping him on as chairman of his 2004 state treasurer's race. Casey says he didn't give Feldman a role in his U.S. Senate campaign.

Casey says Feldman's legal woes aren't the reason.

"When you run for federal office, it is a different process, a different system," Casey said.

Feldman has donated just $1,000 in the U.S. Senate race - to Santorum, in 2003. Santorum later gave the money to charity.

An ongoing FBI investigation into the campaign finances of Puerto Rico's governor, Anibal Acevedo Vila, has renewed the controversy around Feldman.

Authorities suspect that tens of thousands of dollars from Philadelphia-area donors in 2002 were "straw contributions" to avoid finance limits. Feldman has said he did only one Vila fund-raiser, and was not involved in any improper contributions.

Some of the checks under scrutiny were raised by Feldman and his business partner, Candido Negron, who was also generous to Casey ($192,000) and Rendell ($75,000) in the 2002 governor's race.

Feldman stopped fund-raising a year ago, and has turned his focus to real estate, among other ventures. He enjoyed being indispensable to candidates, but was wounded by news coverage of the City Hall bug probe, close friends say.

DOJ_NMG_0063784

He no longer receives the adoration on display at a 2001 dinner, when a cast of heavyweights - Casey, Street, White, McGreevey, Hafer - paid tribute to him.

From the podium, Street described their close relationship, joking that anybody who could get his wife "to come to an event on a Saturday night - that's a special person."

Fordham, the mayor's aide, said recently that he couldn't recall the last time Street and Feldman had spoken.

Lucrative Consulting Work

Robert M. Feldman performed consulting work for at least five firms that paid him more than $4 million combined between 1999 and 2003, according to court documents. This is a partial list of clients and government work they have received, although in some cases it is unclear what role, if any, Feldman played in getting that work.

Young Gotti Was A Boss Until 1999, Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

John A. Gotti's lawyer acknowledged for the first time yesterday that his client had once been the boss of the Gambino organized crime family. But when Mr. Gotti gave up the Mafia life in 1999, the lawyer said, his withdrawal was heartfelt and true.

The statement by the lawyer, Charles Carnesi, came during closing arguments in Mr. Gotti's racketeering trial in federal District Court in Manhattan. A federal prosecutor, in her closing arguments, said Mr. Gotti's claim to have quit the Mafia was a ruse to avoid prosecution.

But Mr. Carnesi said his client had soured on the mob life. "The message is: 'I went to the very top of this life and it's no good. It destroys you and your family. It's not worth the toll,' " Mr. Carnesi said.

Mr. Gotti, 42, known as Junior, claims to have retired from the Gambino family in July 1999, about the time he began serving a six-year federal prison sentence on unrelated racketeering charges. If Mr. Gotti convinces the jury that he left the Mafia before the summer of 1999, he cannot be convicted on the racketeering counts because of a five-year statute of limitations.

Mr. Carnesi said that as a child, Mr. Gotti was exposed to a world of penitentiaries, social clubs and violent felons. Mob life, Mr. Carnesi said, was "pretty exciting" until Mr. Gotti was facing prison in the late 1990's and realized "the whole thing was a lie, it was an illusion."

The lawyer said one of Mr. Gotti's most difficult moments was during a 1999 prison visit to his father, John J. Gotti, then the Gambino boss, when he told his father that he wanted to quit the Mafia. The elder Gotti died in prison of cancer in 2002.

" 'I know you're dying in jail,' " Mr. Carnesi said the son told his father. " 'I know you gave your life for this thing, but it's not for me.' " The lawyer said the elder Mr. Gotti had accepted his son's decision.

Mr. Carnesi said, "There came a point that the boy becomes a man."

But the prosecutor, Miriam E. Rocah, hammered away at Mr. Gotti's "withdrawal" defense, saying recordings of him in prison, made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, show he continued to try to exert influence in the crime family.

"Just because you are in prison does not mean you are not still involved in the life," Ms. Rocah said. "He was still a full-fledged member of the Gambino crime family at this time."

Ms. Rocah said that in an attempt to avoid prosecution in the future, Mr. Gotti, knowing the F.B.I. was taping his prison conversations, had developed a strategy of telling visitors that he had left "the life" behind.

"Gotti wanted to be able to say in a courtroom like this one that 'I've had nothing to do with the mob life for five years, and so whatever happened before doesn't matter,' " she said. "Before he was even charged with a crime, Gotti was planting the lies he would someday use."

But Mr. Carnesi attacked the F.B.I. tapes that are at the center of the government's case, particularly a recording from 2003 in which prosecutors say Mr. Gotti can be heard complaining about a demotion to "captain" in the Gambino family.

Mr. Carnesi said that the word "captain" had never been uttered, though he did not say what the conversation had been about.

As part of the racketeering case, Mr. Gotti is accused of committing or ordering crimes including witness tampering, extortion and money laundering. He is also charged with helping to plot the 1992 kidnapping and beating of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk show host and founder of the Guardian Angels, who frequently criticized the Gottis on his program.

Growing Up Gotti (NSDY)

Defense argues 'Junior' wanted to be like his mobster dad, but was turned off by 'treachery' and 'deceit'

John A. Gotti wanted to emulate his father's life as a gangster but quickly soured on the mob when he saw the treachery, deceit and murder it involved, a defense attorney told a jury Friday.

Summing up for Gotti in his Manhattan federal racketeering trial, attorney Charles Carnesi said that as a young man, his client was intoxicated with the respect his late father, Gambino boss John J. Gotti, received.

"'I don't know what he does but I want to be just like him,'" Carnesi characterized the younger Gotti's thoughts as a boy growing up in Howard Beach. "That is how boys feel about their fathers."

Gotti, 42, is on trial for the third time on racketeering charges that include conspiracy, loan-sharking, extortion and involvement in the 1992 kidnapping attempt of radio talk show host and Guardian Angel founder Curtis Sliwa.

His client's own version of growing up as a Gotti included following in his father's footsteps with the 1988 induction into the Gambino crime family, a move that cemented his position in the crime clan, Carnesi said. But after a few years, the younger Gotti, known as "Junior," became disillusioned with mob life, the lawyer said.

"There is a point where the boy becomes a man; a man learns it is not like that," said Carnesi, referring to the romanticized notion of La Cosa Nostra. Instead, Gotti saw the death of men he knew and days filled with "treachery and deceit," the lawyer said.

Gotti's first two trials, one in 2005 and one earlier this year, ended in mistrials. As he did in the past, Gotti maintains in the current trial that he withdrew from the Gambino crime family life by July 21, 1999, more than five years before the current indictment. That date is crucial because it would place the charges outside the statute of limitations.

In wrapping up the prosecution's closing statements Friday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam E. Rocah, said that Gotti's claim of quitting the mob was a lie to dodge the charges he faces.

Judge Shira Scheindlin is slated to charge the jury Monday.

For more than three hours, as Gotti sometimes nodded his head in assent, Carnesi attacked the prosecution's case, attempting to cast doubts on the credibility of the government witnesses. Carnesi also tried to show how Gotti backed away from playing an active role in the crime family affairs.

Carnesi spent some time trying to show how government witnesses testifying about the attack on Sliwa gave accounts which were inconsistent with what Sliwa testified. In a switch at this trial, Sliwa was called by the defense, and although hostile to Gotti, contradicted prosecution witnesses on details of the attack in which he suffered a serious gunshot wound.

Going after 'Junior'

Previous two trials: Summer 2005 and winter 2006

Prosecution case:

Prosecutors alleged that John A. Gotti was a key member of Gambino crime family racketeering conspiracy, including 1992 abduction and shooting of Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa.

Defense case:

Gotti dropped out of membership and an active role in the mob by July 21, 1999.

Results:

On eve of 2005 trial, government dropped murder conspiracy charges. In September 2005, jury acquitted Gotti on securities fraud and couldn't reach a verdict on remaining charges. A mistrial resulted.

In March retrial, jury couldn't come to a unanimous agreement on Gotti's withdrawal from mob defense. A mistrial resulted.

Current Trial: August 2006.

Prosecution case:

The government added an obstruction of justice charge related to alleged attempt to get Michael "Mickey Scars" DiLeonardo, Gotti's former friend and mob crony, not to become a government witness in 2002 and 2003.

Defense case:

The withdrawal from the mob defense is still key. Defense elicited testimony from DiLeonardo's son to rebut allegations the youngster was used to try to keep his father from testifying.

Lawyers Make Last Bid To Sway Jr. Jury (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 16, 2006

John Gotti only had two choices when the son he had groomed to be his successor as boss of the Gambino crime family told him in 1999 that he wanted out of the mob.

"He can kill his son or he can let him out and he can say, 'Okay, I'm done with him. He doesn't exist,'" attorney Charles Carnesi told jurors yesterday during summations in John A. (Junior) Gotti's racketeering conspiracy trial.

"John Gotti Sr. was a tough guy...but he loved his son," Carnesi said.

The mob scion "found the strength to say 'I went to the very top of this life and it's no good,'" Carnesi said. "It destroys you and your family. It's not worth the toll."

Carnesi tried to convince jurors that Gotti had left "the life" by July 1999 - a key point in time since prosecutors must show that Gotti had committed at least one of the racketeering crimes in the conspiracy after that date.

But prosecutor Miriam Rocah said Gotti never fully left the Gambinos and pointed to the mounds of mob money she said flowed into companies Gotti controlled after July 1999.

And she pointed to tapes of Gotti, intercepted by the feds in 2003 and 2004 while Gotti was serving a six-year prison term, talking about the need to "put a different seed in people's head" to convince law enforcement that he was no longer the acting boss of the Gambino family.

"Gotti wanted to be able to say in a courtroom like this one, I've had nothing to do with the Mafia for five years," Rocah told jurors.

The jury of seven women and five men is expected to start deliberating Monday in the federal government's third attempt at convicting Gotti.

Gotti, 42, is accused in a wide-ranging conspiracy of loansharking, extortion, witness tampering and conspiring to kidnap radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Over the past year, jurors at Gotti's previous two trials were deadlocked.

Sliwa was shot twice after he jumped from a speeding cab by thugs prosecutors say were sent by Gotti. Gotti was "furious" at Sliwa's relentless on-air attacks on the Gotti clan that included calling his uncles "drug dealers," Rocah said.

"The Gottis care a lot about their public image, so it's really no surprise that John Gotti wanted to silence Curtis Sliwa," Rocah said.

But Carnesi told jurors that the prosecutors didn't put Sliwa on the witness stand because they knew his account didn't gibe with one delivered by the driver of the cab, mob informant Joseph (Little Joey) D'Angelo.

'JUNIOR': MY FATHER 'FREED' ME (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 16, 2006

John "Dapper Don" Gotti's absolute power over the violent Gambino crime family allowed son "Junior" to break a mob rule that no other wiseguy could - to retire from the Mafia, a defense lawyer argued yesterday.

Gotti's attorney Charles Carnesi told a Manhattan federal jury that the elder Gotti had just "two choices" when his oldest son and heir apparent announced his desire for "closure."

"He can kill his son or he can let him out," Carnesi said. "John Gotti Sr. was a tough guy, a boss, but he wasn't going to hurt his son or let anyone else hurt him."

John "Junior" Gotti has claimed that he left the mob in 1999 and therefore cannot be convicted of racketeering charges - including the sensational 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa - under a five-year statute of limitations.

Gotti's lawyer told jurors the mob scion rejected organized crime after seeing the destructive impact his father's imprisonment had on his family - and embraced a new message.

'Junior' Gotti Laments Loss Of Manliness (NSDY/AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2006

NEW YORK -- As he languished in a federal prison in 2003, John "Junior" Gotti had plenty to worry about.

The jail, he told visitors, was crawling with informants. He had money problems. Old friends were getting indicted. Other members of the Gotti clan were stealing his money.

But at the root of his troubles was this: The modern mob, he lamented, was losing its manliness.

"Now are we men? Or are we punks or rats or weasels? You tell me," he angrily asked one friend while serving a racketeering sentence.

Gotti's conversations were routinely recorded before his release from prison last year, and the tapes have played a central role in his current racketeering trial in Manhattan. A jury was to begin deliberating the case Monday.

Among other things, the son of the legendary mafia boss "Dapper Don" John Gotti is accused of ordering an attack on Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa, who was shot twice by would-be kidnappers in 1992.

Prosecutors contend that "Junior" Gotti was involved in mob affairs even after he was imprisoned in 1999.

The defense says the recordings, made at the federal prison at Ray Brook, N.Y., show that Gotti had developed a distaste for mob life and retired.

In any case, the tapes provide an inside look at the gangster's code, particularly its obsession with "being a man" at all costs.

Lesson No. 1: Men fight.

"If a guy wants to get all fancy and prancy, if he picks his hands up to you, you pick your hands up back. You're not a punk," Gotti explained in one recorded discussion.

"No hiding behind fences," he said during another conversation. "Take our coats off like gentlemen. Now, let's see. Let's see who the tough guy is. No knives. No guns. Like gentleman. ... Let's see who the real man really is."

Lesson No. 2: Men tolerate no assault on their character.

Gotti is firm on this point when he discusses two uncles who diminished his leadership role in the gang by badmouthing him to his father in 2001, a year before the elder Gotti's death from cancer in prison.

"If any of them ever come here, I'm telling you, I swear it to you, on my dead brother and my dead father, I swear to you, I will meet them by that (prison) door, with two padlocks in my hands and I will crack their skulls, I promise you that. I promise you that. This I take as a solemn oath as a man."

Lesson No. 3: Manliness is in the blood.

"You're a real man," he told longtime friend John Ruggiero. "You wanna know why, John? Not only for who you are. But for who your father was. You got his genes, you're a man."

A person who isn't a man, he added, can't simply become one by acting tough.

"These ain't men you're dealing with, you're dealing with frauds," he said. "It's like a kid who gets (unintelligible) all his life ... and he gets his milk money taken. What does he grow up to be? A cop. He's got a gun and a badge. That's, that's his equalizer. Got a gun and a badge, now he's a man. Well, that's how all these guys are, John, they're no different."

Lesson No. 4: A man spends time with family.

"Listen, I love my brother," Gotti said. "But my brother's a bum. That's all he is. No more, no less. He doesn't spend a moment with his own children. I have a hard time respecting any man who doesn't spend any time with his wife and kids."

Lesson No. 5: Men can do prison time.

"Some guys are made for this. Some guys just aren't," Gotti said of his life behind bars.

"Gravano was an example," he said, speaking of Gambino crime family turncoat Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano. "I mean he was a legendary soldier in the street. Brooklyn, he was a legend in Brooklyn. He got to jail, he fell to pieces."

Lesson No. 6: Real men don't snitch, but if they do, they don't make stuff up.

"Bottom line is, if you're gonna become a rat, become a rat: Tell the f------ truth. Don't go out of your way to hurt people," he said.

This is Gotti's third trial on the latest racketeering charges. The first two ended when jurors deadlocked on the charges, in part because of the defense argument that he became disenchanted with the mafia and retired long enough ago that the legal deadline for prosecuting him for old crimes had expired.

Which brings us to Gotti's Lesson No. 7: Mafia life stinks.

"So much treachery ... My father couldn't have loved me, to push me into this life," he lamented to friend Steve Kaplan.

"Oh ... I'd rather be a Latin King than be what I am," he said, referring to the Hispanic street gang. "I swear to you, Steve, and I, I mean it on my father's grave. I'm so ashamed. I am so ashamed."

Did Victim's Photo Prejudice A Jury? (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — For Jim Studer, wearing a button with a photo of his brother, Tom, was a simple way of bearing witness for him at the trial of Tom's accused killer, Mathew Musladin.

"He was my big brother, and he was very protective of me when I was a kid," Studer said.

Little did he think the buttons he and his parents wore to the trial in San Jose would nearly free the man convicted of Tom's murder — or put the killer's case before the Supreme Court. But he had not considered that Musladin would someday have a chance to bring his case before the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

For years, the Supreme Court has cast a critical eye on the liberal-leaning 9th Circuit, particularly in cases involving crime and the death penalty. The justices will consider two of those cases soon after they return next month.

On the first day of Musladin's trial more than a decade ago, Studer and his parents, who had traveled from Missouri, sat in the front row of the courtroom, directly behind the prosecutor. Each wore a button with a photo of Tom.

Like the jury, they heard the facts of the case: On May 13, 1994, Musladin arrived early at the home of his estranged wife, Pamela, to pick up their 3-year-old son for a weekend visit. The two exchanged angry words, and Musladin threw her to the driveway.

When she called for help, her fiance, Tom Studer, and her brother, Michael Albaugh, came running. Musladin had a .45caliber pistol in his car and began shooting. Studer was hit in the back and crawled under a truck in the garage to escape. Musladin followed him and shot again, hitting him in the head and killing him.

Musladin also followed Albaugh into the house, but he hid in a bathroom. Pamela escaped over the fence to another house. Musladin was captured after a high-speed chase on U.S. 101.

When his case came to trial, Musladin claimed self-defense, saying that Pamela and her fiance were drug users and that he had feared for his life. The jury convicted him of first-degree murder and attempted murder, and he was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison.

There matters stood until the 9th Circuit heard his appeal last year. The 26-member court hears cases — usually in three-judge panels — from California and eight other Western states. It has some decidedly liberal judges, and Musladin's case came before two of them: Stephen Reinhardt of Los Angeles and Marsha S. Berzon of San Francisco.

In a 2-1 decision, the judges reversed Musladin's conviction, saying that the buttons worn by Studer's family deprived Musladin of a fair trial.

According to Reinhardt, the photo buttons — described by the prosecutor as 2 inches in diameter and by Musladin's lawyer as 3 to 4 inches — conveyed a "specific message."

"The buttons essentially 'argue' that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty," Reinhardt said.

He continued: "A reasonable jurist would be compelled to conclude that the buttons worn by Studer's family members conveyed the message that the defendant was guilty."

That was not the view of the trial judge or the California state courts.

When a defense lawyer objected at the start of the trial and described the buttons as "inappropriate," the judge disagreed: "There is no legend on the buttons," he said. "I see no possible prejudice to the defendant."

It was noted that the prosecutor could have held up a photo of Studer for the jury to see. Had he survived the shooting, the victim could have sat in the courtroom himself.

The state appeals court also saw no harm.

"The simple photograph of Tom Studer was unlikely to have been taken as a sign of anything other than the normal grief occasioned by the loss of a family member," its judges wrote in upholding Musladin's conviction.

Seven judges of the 9th Circuit objected to Reinhardt's opinion — seven fewer than the majority needed for the full appeals court to review it.

"Musladin shall be released unless the state elects to retry him within 90 days," Reinhardt wrote in October 2005.

State prosecutors petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court, which voted to hear the case. Oral arguments are set for Oct. 11.

It is one of two Reinhardt opinions that the justices will consider in the first days of their new term.

The second reversed a death sentence handed down in 1982 for a man who broke into the home of a 21-year-old woman in the San Joaquin Valley, beat her to death with a metal dumbbell, stole her stereo and sold it for $100.

When Fernando Belmontes was caught, his accomplices testified against him. After his conviction, prosecutors told jurors of his violent past, including a recent brutal assault on his pregnant girlfriend.

Twenty-one years after the jury sentenced Belmontes to die, his federal appeal came before a three-judge panel that included Reinhardt and Richard A. Paez of Los Angeles. In a 2-1 decision, they reversed the death sentence on the grounds that jurors might not have taken into account "the defendant's potential for a positive adjustment to life in prison."

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer appealed that ruling to the Supreme Court, which set it aside in a one-line order in March 2005. The justices urged Reinhardt and Paez to reconsider their decision in light of a recent high court ruling that restored the death sentence for an Orange County murderer after it too had been reversed by the 9th Circuit.

In July 2005, the two appellate judges reaffirmed their original decision. Eight of their 9th Circuit colleagues dissented — again, short of the majority required for the full court to consider the case.

When Lockyer appealed on behalf of San Quentin State Prison Warden Steven W. Ornoski, the Supreme Court voted to hear the case of Ornoski vs. Belmontes. It will be argued Oct. 3, the first morning of oral arguments for the new term.

In the last term alone, the high court took up 18 cases from the 9th Circuit and reversed 15 of them.

In the Supreme Court, "there is almost a palpable skepticism for what comes out of the 9th Circuit," said Vikram Amar, a professor at UC Hastings College of the Law in San Francisco.

"They don't have any faith that Reinhardt calls it straight. I don't want to call him a bad judge, but a lot of these decisions are hard to understand," added Amar, who was a clerk for the 9th Circuit and the Supreme Court.

Nominated to the 9th Circuit by President Carter in 1980, Reinhardt has described himself as one of the last unabashed liberals on the federal bench. When asked once whom he most admired as a judge, he named the late Justice William J. Brennan Jr., the liberal leader of the Supreme Court during the 1970s and 1980s.

Brennan "had a broad and generous, rather than a cramped and niggardly, view of the law … and he understood that the ultimate role of the law was to serve the interests of justice," Reinhardt said in a 2004 interview on Howard J. Bashman's legal blog, "How Appealing." Asked about the current high court, Reinhardt said it was "a straight, unabashed, highly conservative institution."

Conservatives regularly point to Reinhardt, 75, as a "liberal activist" on the bench. He formed part of the 2-1 majority that ruled the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance were unconstitutional. He also wrote an opinion for the full 9th Circuit ruling that dying people had a right to lethal medication supplied by a physician. The Supreme Court reversed this opinion unanimously in 1997 and said the "right to die" issue should be decided by states and their elected legislators.

Ten years ago, complaints about the 9th Circuit spurred Congress to rein in the authority of federal judges to review state criminal convictions in cases that raised constitutional issues. The Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 says federal judges should defer to state courts and may not reverse a criminal conviction or prison term that has been upheld by a state court unless the decision obviously conflicts with "clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court."

Backers of the law said it was aimed directly at the 9th Circuit. These days, however, its supporters admit that the change has not worked as planned.

"The deference standard has not been effective. The 9th Circuit strains and goes around it," said Kent S. Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation in Sacramento. "The Musladin case is an example of just that. It reflects an egregious disregard for the limit that Congress set."

What "clearly established law" was violated when the trial judge let the Studer family wear buttons with a photo of Tom in the courtroom?

In his decision, Reinhardt pointed to the Supreme Court's 1976 ruling in Estelle vs. Williams. In that case, the justices said it would be unfair to require a criminal defendant to wear jail clothes during his trial because that could cause the jury to infer that he was guilty.

"We conclude that no significant difference exists between the circumstances of this case" involving the buttons worn by the family and putting a defendant in jail clothes, Reinhardt said.

State lawyers were quick to note a significant difference: The first involved a defendant who was on trial; the second involved spectators in a courtroom.

Victims' rights groups were disturbed when Reinhardt used quote marks around the word "victim" in his Musladin ruling. For example, he said the case posed the issue of "when spectators are permitted to wear buttons depicting the 'victim.' " (A revised version of his ruling does not include such references.)

DOJ_NMG_0063791

"That was very troubling. There is no dispute that someone was shot and died," said Meg Garvin, a program director at the National Crime Victim Law Institute in Portland, Ore. "The underlying issue is the right of the crime victim to be in the court. We don't understand how the mere image of the victim can be prejudicial."

The group filed a friend-of-the-court brief urging the high court to reverse the 9th Circuit's decision.

Jim Studer, a school administrator from Reno, Nev., said he had not come to grips with the notion that wearing a button with his brother's picture could result in a reversal of the killer's conviction.

"We wore it for the first two days only," he said. After defense lawyers objected, he said, the family decided to take off the buttons.

However, Musladin's family said the buttons were worn for the entire 14-day trial, and the appellate judges accepted that.

"I couldn't believe it when I heard about the decision" of the 9th Circuit, Studer said. "It still seems unfathomable to me that you can't have a picture of the victim in the courtroom."

More from Nation & World Capitol Crooks It started with the bribery indictment of California Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, but before it's over, a sprawling investigation into a Pentagon contractor called MZM could snare some of Washington's most powerful inside players

By Chitra Ragavan

Posted Sunday, September 17, 2006

In the fall of 2003, an influential Washington defense contractor named Mitchell Wade was shooting the bull with Haig Melkessetian, a senior executive in his company, at their elegant office not far from the White House. "Haig," Wade declared, "I have a good deal for us."

The contractor enthusiastically laid out his plan: His good friend, Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a decorated Vietnam War fighter pilot, was planning to lead a congressional delegation to Saudi Arabia on a mission to help Saudi officials improve their image in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Melkessetian, a former Army Special Forces soldier and Arabic linguist, was taken aback. "I can't be on both sides of the fence," he told Wade, noting that their company, MZM Inc., was heavily involved in major counterterrorism projects with the Defense Department.

"Don't start that ideological crap with me," Wade snapped, according to Melkessetian's account. "I'm not here for ideology. I'm here to make money."

And make money he did-a cool $150 million in government contracts since 2002. But Wade's road to riches was one that would ultimately lead him to jail and ignominy, and, along the way, to a prison term for one lawmaker and still more criminal charges, in the next few days or weeks, against some of the most influential insiders in the nation's capital. Melkessetian, now a consultant for a U.S. intelligence agency, is helping federal prosecutors in a massive corruption investigation involving Wade, MZM, and Cunningham. The former eight-term Republican congressman from California pleaded guilty last November to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes and favors from Wade; his mentor, Brent Wilkes, a San Diego-based defense contractor; and two other "unindicted coconspirators."

"A huge spider web." Cunningham "earmarked" millions of dollars in defense projects for Wade and Wilkes in a manner so brazen federal prosecutors called it "unparalleled" in the long, sordid history of congressional corruption. Cunningham now is serving an eight-year prison term, while Wade, 46, has pleaded guilty to paying Cunningham more than $1 million in bribes and is cooperating with prosecutors. Wade's sentencing has been postponed until next March. He faces a maximum prison term of 135 months. He declined to be interviewed for this account, as did his attorneys.

Prosecutors are using information from Melkessetian and his MZM colleagues to test Wade's veracity, to track cash or other assets he may be hiding, and to recommend the length of his prison sentence. The MZM employees have told investigators that they were unaware of Wade's corrupt acts, but as Melkessetian puts it, they suspected he was "up to no good."

Today, the FBI, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, and the Defense Security Service are working with prosecutors to put the finishing touches on indictments against several other defense contractors, and senior defense and intelligence officials, who helped Wade with his corrupt activities. "We have been looking at everybody that's involved," says a federal law enforcement official. "Anytime you talk about defense contracting, it's a huge spider web."

Although Wilkes has not been charged, the government alleges that he gave more than $630,000 in bribes, gifts, and favors to Cunningham, and investigators now are trying to determine whether he obtained federal contracts through a high school buddy, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the former No.3 official at the CIA. Foggo resigned in May. His attorney has said that Foggo broke no laws. Investigators are also probing whether Wilkes provided limo services, hotel suites, and prostitutes to Cunningham. Wilkes is not cooperating with investigators. "Every single allegation is false, will be fought, and my client will be vindicated," says his attorney, Nancy Luque.

Trolling For Greenbacks In Baghdad (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

In the spring 2003 issue of the MZM newsletter, the Sentinel, Mitchell Wade extended prayers to American troops around the world and thanked his employees for supporting the troops in Iraq at this "perilous juncture." But MZM may have played a role in getting troops to Iraq, according to a national commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led to the war. The commission blamed the Pentagon's National Ground Intelligence Center (where Wade had analysts on contract through earmarks) that handled much of the military's prewar analysis of whether Saddam Hussein had developed nuclear precursor capabilities. The report didn't single out the MZM analysts but said that NGIC had "in particular displayed a disturbing lack of diligence and technical expertise."

Separately, in March 2003, MZM received a $1.2 million contract to send a team of 21 Arabic linguists to Iraq to serve as interpreters and assist the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance, which later became the Coalition Provisional Authority, or CPA. Haig Melkessetian was one of the linguists and also served on the protective detail of the CPA head, Ambassador Paul Bremer. Melkessetian says that half the linguists Wade assigned to the project did not speak fluent Arabic, and one contractor was a Russian linguist who spoke no Arabic.

When Melkessetian-who has worked for U.S. military and intelligence agencies extensively in the Middle East-returned from Iraq, he talked to Wade about the growing counterinsurgency problems. "I sent you there to make money," Wade responded. "I didn't send you there to fix Iraq."

"Fantastic job." In 2004, Wade hired a prominent Iranian businessman and Canadian resident named Behrooz Behbudi, a big contributor to the Republican Party, as his director of Middle Eastern development, paying him $15,000 a month to consult on Iraq. Behbudi says Wade wanted him to help redesign the Central Bank of Iraq, destroyed in the war. The bill: $15 million. "We would have done a fantastic job finishing it," says Behbudi. "Our prices were very, very competitive." Wade, by then in a financial crunch, refused to pay.

Wade bragged about his military ties, Behbudi says: "He said he had a phone directly connected to DOD. He told me, 'My office is an extension of the Defense Department.'"

Iran was also on Wade's mind. "He came to me and said, 'I'm very interested,'" says Behbudi, "'in removing the mullahs.'" In April 2004, Wade and Behbudi formed the Iranian Democratization Foundation. Their timing was perfect. In November 2004, Congress approved $3 million for Iranian democratization efforts. But Wade and his partners eventually dissolved the foundation because of personal differences. Even right up till the end, though, Wade still had his finger on the pulse of Congress and the Bush administration. This year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice asked Congress for $75 million to promote democracy in Iran.

Leaks, Lies And The CIA Spy (TIME)

The outing of CIA operative Valerie Wilson (nÃ© Plame) consumed Washington for three years. The case received a radical reconfiguring when former State Department bigwig Richard Armitage confirmed that he was the original source for columnist Robert Novak's revelation. Novak weighed in last week, calling Armitage's contrition bogus and the leak deliberate. Police Agencies Find It Hard To Require Degrees (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Last February, the Plano, Texas, Police Department took a bold step in its police recruiting efforts: At a time when departments across the nation are desperate for new officers, Plano began requiring its recruits to have four-year college degrees.

The move was aimed at making the city's 345-member police force more like the residents of Plano, a city of about 260,000 about 18 miles north of Dallas. Plano is in one of the nation's wealthiest counties and is home to the headquarters of JC Penney, Frito Lay and Electronic Data Systems. Plano officials cited studies indicating that officers with college degrees have fewer discipline problems than those without.

In August, however, as Plano strained to find enough recruits, the city eased its hiring requirements and began accepting those with two years of college or three years in the military. The latest requirements are stiffer than those from last year, when recruits were required to have at least the equivalent of a high school education. But the episode fueled an ongoing debate over whether police departments' desire to raise recruiting standards can be realized at a time when there are thousands of openings for cops nationwide.

Since 1963, when the Multnomah County, Ore., Sheriff's Department became one of the first police agencies to impose a four-year degree requirement on recruits, only a few other local departments have followed.

Less than 5% of local police departments with more than 100 officers require four-year degrees, says Louis Mayo, executive director of the Police Association for College Education.

Most departments give higher pay to recruits with four-year degrees, he says, but have avoided requiring recruits to have them for several reasons. Among them: concerns about recruiting enough minority officers in increasingly diverse urban areas, and fears that not enough college graduates would be attracted by police salaries. The median annual salary for patrol officers nationwide was about $45,200 in 2004, according to the U.S. Department of Labor. Rookie cops usually make less.

“Everybody is gonna tell you it's difficult” to recruit only college graduates, says Plano police Sgt. Jason Christensen. That's true even in Plano, where the pay for new cops is relatively high, about $51,000.

There are about 700,000 state and local police officers across the nation. Mayo estimates that 25% to 30% have four-year degrees. He says departments have been reluctant to adopt stricter recruiting standards despite evidence suggesting that better-educated cops perform better.

In an analysis of disciplinary cases against Florida cops from 1997 to 2002, the International Association of Chiefs of Police found that officers with only high school educations were the subjects of 75% of all disciplinary actions. Officers with four-year degrees accounted for 11% of such actions.

"An average patrol officer spends most of the time on dispute resolution," Mayo says. A degree "gives (officers) a broad perspective that makes them much more effective."

Los Angeles' approach to police recruiting and pay is typical of most big cities. The 9,000-officer department pays new cops with four-year degrees about $55,200, roughly $4,000 more than those who meet the basic requirements of a high school diploma or GED.

Officials say the incentive, along with programs such as one that gives bonuses to bilingual officers, shows a commitment to training. No one's proposing, however, that Los Angeles, which wants to hire 1,000 cops in the next year, require college degrees. Doing so would deplete the pool of candidates in an already tight market, says DeeDee Lopez of the officer mentoring program.

In Plano, where there are up to 15 police vacancies, Christensen acknowledges that concerns about finding enough recruits contributed to easing the prerequisite to two years of college or three years in the military. Plano also accepts recruits who have two years of police experience.

Christensen says the department wants to match officers' education level with that of the city's population. He estimates that 37% of Plano's residents have bachelor's degrees, compared with 32% of its cops.

The need for cops has led many cities, including Los Angeles, to look well beyond their borders for recruits. As Lopez suggests, the pressure to meet hiring goals has discouraged some from making requirements too tough.

In a series of essays in The Police Chief magazine, 13 police officials and academics recently urged departments to raise education standards — and to not be deterred by concerns they make it too difficult to fill the ranks. "Police officers need the (college) degree, not only for what it brings to individual officers and their departments, but also for what the degree brings to policing," Robert Friedmann, a criminal justice professor at Georgia State University, wrote in an essay.

The police department in Lakewood, Colo., a Denver suburb, has required recruits to have college degrees since 1969. Chief Ron Burns says recruiting has been more difficult recently, but that the 247-officer department doesn't plan to ease its standards. He says the department's starting salary of $47,000 has helped, as has its reputation as a training ground for police chiefs. Sixty Lakewood officers have gone on to become chiefs, Burns says.

Burns concedes that such standards might not be practical for big departments with hundreds of vacancies a year. His current class of 25 recruits was chosen from about 140 applicants. Burns says a similar ratio of applicants to recruits is typical at larger departments.

"It would be difficult to maintain (the educational requirement) in a larger city," he says.

Witness In '95 Brutality Case Offers New Account (BOS)

By Dick Lehr, Globe Correspondent

The Boston Globe, September 18, 2006

Says he never ID'd officer at police beating

It was the most notorious Boston police brutality case of the last 10 years, and, in the end, the federal investigation hinged on what Officer Kenny Conley saw -- and what he wouldn't say.

Conley was convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice after he testified that he never saw a drug-unit officer, dressed in plainclothes, who had been pummeled by other officers who mistook him for a fleeing slaying suspect.

Conley had to be lying, prosecutors said. How could he have missed the beating of Michael Cox that January night? A witness put him just yards from the assault.

Or did he?

DOJ_NMG_0063795

A Globe reexamination of the case has found an apparent and perhaps devastating defect in the eyewitness case against Conley, one which, for some court observers, raises the possibility of government misconduct.

The key prosecution witness at the trial was Robert ``Smut'' Brown , a drug dealer whom Conley and other officers were pursuing on the night of the beating. Brown said he looked back and saw the beating in progress and a ``tall, white cop'' standing close by. Minutes later he was arrested by Conley, who is tall and white.

It seemed clearly the same guy. Prosecutors pointedly said as much at the trial. And the jury convicted Conley of crimes for which he could have spent 34 years in jail.

But Brown, in his first public comment since the beating and trial, says Conley wasn't the officer he saw, and that he tried, unsuccessfully, to alert federal authorities during the trial that they had the wrong man.

``When I seen him sitting at the defense table I didn't have no clue, like, why they were using me for that -- because I didn't recognize him,'' Brown told the Globe in two taped interviews at a prison in Maine, where he was awaiting sentencing on a drug count.

He says he recalled thinking at the time, ``They got the wrong guy.''

Indeed, he says, minutes before testifying, he spotted in the courthouse hallway the officer he had seen standing near the scene of the beating that night and pointed him out to Kimberly McAllister , the FBI agent in charge of the probe.

``She's like, `No, no, no, no, no, that's not the guy,' '' Brown said. ``I'm like, `Yo, it is the guy. I know it's him.' ''

McAllister, through an FBI spokesperson, said she does not recall Brown pointing out the officer in court that day. What she does remember is that Brown, fearful of police retaliation, didn't want to take the stand.

Had Brown provided new evidence, McAllister would have immediately told prosecutors, said FBI spokeswoman Gail A. Marcinkiewicz.

The lead prosecutor in the case, S. Theodore Merritt , said no such word was passed to him. ``That information was never told to me at trial -- I can't comment whether it happened or not,'' he said in an interview.

Conley, told about Brown's comments, said he was ``shocked. If what Robert Brown says is true, there should be an investigation -- and not by the FBI.''

Some leading members of the Boston bar agree.

``This would be explosively important evidence in favor of the defendant,'' said J. W. Carney Jr. , a defense lawyer and former state prosecutor. ``Any federal agent who received this information from a critical witness and intentionally suppressed it by not informing the federal prosecutor is, in my opinion, guilty of obstruction of justice.''

``That's a huge, huge error,'' said Robert A. George , a defense lawyer. If Brown made the statements to McAllister, ``there's a duty, and not just a legal duty, but a human duty, to put a stop to the trial at that point.''

An unsolved case It is hard to exaggerate the importance of the Cox beating, and Conley prosecution, in the recent history of the Boston Police Department. It has been the source of strife, of multiple court cases, and of racial divisions -- Cox is black. It also remains unsolved, as none of the officers who participated in the beating or witnessed it has been willing to speak candidly. In Boston, the so-called blue wall of silence has seldom closed so completely around a crime.

Cox, a member of the gang unit, had been working in plainclothes on the night of Jan. 25, 1995. It was about 2 a.m. when a man was shot at a crowded takeout restaurant on Blue Hill Avenue. Four men led police on a high-speed chase that ended at a dead-end. Cox bolted from his cruiser chasing Brown. But Cox, as he neared a fence, was hit in the head from behind and then kicked and beaten unconscious by a group of officers. When they realized he was a police officer, the assailants scattered. Initial police reports said Cox slipped on a patch of ice.

Authorities solved the slaying -- two men were convicted of first-degree murder charges , while Brown and a fourth man were acquitted in late 1996. But Cox's assailants were never charged. First, the Suffolk district attorney's office took a run at solving the assault, and then, in early 1997, the US attorney's office took over the investigation, with Merritt at the helm.

Merritt, along with McAllister, soon targeted Conley. In internal police reports, Conley described seeing a suspect run to and climb over a fence. He described how he then chased and caught the suspect. After testifying before a federal grand jury in 1997 that he had not seen Cox or Cox's beating, Conley was indicted. Merritt and the FBI began building a case around the proposition that Conley had to have seen Cox.

Brown's testimony was key. Under questioning by Merritt, Brown recounted at the trial what he had also told the grand jury -- that he scaled the fence, pausing just long enough to see the beating, and that he saw the tall, white officer nearby.

But the prosecution never asked Brown, either before or during the 1998 trial, to positively identify Conley as the officer he had seen.

There was ``no prosecutorial purpose'' in doing so, Merritt said in an interview. ``He [Brown] said, under oath, the tall white officer was the same guy who arrested him, and other evidence showed that it was Ken Conley who arrested him.''

But had Merritt asked Brown to point out in the courtroom the man he'd seen that night the course of the trial might have shifted abruptly.

``I wouldn't have pointed him [Conley] out because I couldn't point him out,'' Brown said. ``I was wondering what the heck I was there for.''

Brown said he had gotten a good look at the officer near the fence, but not of the arresting officer, and simply assumed they were the same.

Brown said he was in the courthouse hallway with his mother, Mattie, and his girlfriend, Indira Pierce, when he spotted the officer he had seen. He said he pointed the man out to McAllister, but the agent told him he was wrong.

In separate interviews, Brown's girlfriend and mother confirmed Brown's account. Pierce said the FBI agent told her boyfriend, ``Just stick to your story.''

Brown said he took the witness stand discouraged. ``I'm just . . . just get this over with. Go get the hell out of here.''

Identification oversight But while Brown never directly identified Conley in court, it quickly became part of the accepted lore of the case that he had. News accounts, including the Globe's, treated it that way. Merritt, in court filings for appeals of the case, has done so, as well.

Even Conley's lawyer, Willie Davis , came away from the trial thinking a clear identification had occurred. Davis now realizes his oversight, and he is critical of the federal investigators for not disclosing Brown's alleged comments to McAllister. The case should have been dismissed, he said.

Conley ultimately prevailed in the case. After six years of appeals, US District Court Judge William G. Young overturned the conviction in 2004. Young ruled that the government improperly withheld exculpatory evidence. In May, Conley completed retraining at the police academy. He is back on the job.

MAN Launches $12.15 Billion Offer To Buy Scania (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

MAN AG of Germany launched a cash-and-stock takeover bid for Swedish rival Scania AB that values the maker of trucks and buses at about €9.6 billion ($12.15 billion) and would potentially form Europe's largest commercial-vehicle maker.

The supervisory board of Munich-based MAN met yesterday to approve the move. Scania, of Södertälje, Sweden, hasn't approved the bid, but the German company is hopeful of the deal ultimately being friendly, said people familiar with the matter.

In a statement, MAN said Renault SA, of Boulogne-Billancourt, France, had agreed to sell its 5.6 million class-A Scania shares to the company.

Scania's biggest shareholders, Volkswagen AG and Investor AB, of Stockholm, so far haven't supported the bid, people close to the matter said. Volkswagen holds about 34% of Scania, and 29% is owned by Investor and foundations run by the Wallenberg family.

A spokeswoman for Volkswagen said the Wolfsburg, Germany, auto maker hadn't reached an agreement to sell its Scania stake but declined to elaborate. A spokesman for Investor declined to comment, and a spokesman for Scania couldn't be reached.

In its statement, MAN said it will offer Scania shareholders €38.35 cash plus 0.151 of its own shares for both the A and B shares of Scania. Based on MAN's closing share price Friday, the offer totals 442.20 Swedish kronor ($60.80) a share. Scania's B shares closed Friday at 424.50 kronor, up 1%, in Stockholm trading.

MAN said it would reap at least €500 million a year in synergies if the deal is completed. The company said no sites would be closed and management would be shared between executives from the two companies, with Scania executives joining the combined group's management board.

A combination would bring together two of the larger makers of trucks, including 18-wheelers and light-duty commercial vehicles and buses. Scania operates with one of the global industry's highest profit margins. It makes premium-priced trucks, focusing more on vehicles for long-haul cargo transport, while MAN is stronger in the market for lighter trucks used for shorter journeys. In the first half of this year, Scania reported net income of 2.83 billion kronor on revenue of 35.22 billion kronor.

Together, they would rank as the largest truck maker in Europe by market share, ahead of Volvo AB, of Göteborg, Sweden, and DaimlerChrysler AG, of Stuttgart, Germany, and third in global market share, behind Volvo and DaimlerChrysler. Volkswagen owns a Latin American truck-making business that is likely to eventually be combined with a merged company, these people said.

MAN is headed by Swedish chief executive Hakan Samuelsson, who spent more than two decades at Scania before joining the German company in 2000. Mr. Samuelsson's presence has eased concerns in Sweden that a merger would lead to job losses for Scania. MAN reported a 37% increase in operating profit in 2005 to €765 million from €557 million a year earlier, with sales rising 5% to €14.7 billion.

Several other Swedish companies have combined with European rivals, deals that subsequently led to job expansion, including AstraZeneca PLC, a pharmaceuticals company in London, and Swedish-Swiss engineering firm ABB Ltd.

That track record could help MAN and Scania.

Mr. Samuelsson has pared MAN to four main businesses, focusing on trucks, engines, production of turbines for the energy industry and services such as logistics.

Time Warner's AOL Starts Sale Of Web-Access Units In Europe (WSJ)

By Matthew Karnitschnig And Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

In the first step of a broader plan to reorganize AOL's international operations, Time Warner Inc. agreed to sell the unit's Internet-access business in Germany for €675 million ($854.7 million) to Telecom Italia.

In coming weeks, AOL is expected to also complete negotiations for the sale of its Internet-access businesses in the United Kingdom and France. Proceeds from the sale of all three businesses are expected to total about $2 billion, according to people familiar with the talks. (See related article1.)

AOL plans to retain its advertising-supported content services in all three countries and expand them elsewhere. Those services include email, instant messaging and the other content currently available on its international Web sites. The shift away from Internet-access in favor of advertising-supported content is similar to the strategy AOL is pursuing in the U.S.

Most of the revenue generated by the European operations comes from selling monthly subscriptions for Internet access, but the company says advertising has been growing. AOL Europe generated about €100 million in operating profit last year.

Though its European operations are profitable, AOL never managed to establish itself as a major player in the European Internet-access market, and Time Warner has since written off most of AOL Europe's value. The move to sell the access business, which is the core of the operation, comes as Time Warner has been paring its large portfolio of assets. It recently sold a regional cable channel for $375 million and has been negotiating to sell the Atlanta Braves baseball team, which is valued at about $460 million.

Separately, AOL and Intel Corp. are collaborating on a new online-video service, targeting specially equipped personal computers that carry a new Intel brand of chips and software called Viiv.

The partnership is the latest in a series of efforts to exploit the boom in video on the Internet, and to move such programming to the TV screen. Apple Computer Inc. last week discussed plans for a $299 device -- code-named iTV -- that can wirelessly transfer downloaded videos from a computer to TV sets.

Viiv-branded systems come with a remote control and are designed to plug directly into TV sets.

Intel and AOL said the new service allows consumers to surf through the thousands of TV shows, music videos and full-length movies available through AOL Video with their remotes, scrolling through menus as they would on a DVR or video-on-demand service. Some content can be streamed free while other videos must be purchased and downloaded before they can be viewed on TV.

Second Company Is Implicated In Outbreak Linked To Spinach (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — A second company in California has been implicated in the E. coli outbreak linked to spinach, the Food and Drug Administration said late Sunday, and the number of identified victims is still rising.

The newly identified company, River Ranch Fresh Foods, obtained salad that included spinach from the first company implicated, Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The spinach that passed through River Ranch was sold under the brand names Farmers Market, Hy-Vee, and Fresh and Easy.

The investigation is proceeding in what amounts to a rearview mirror, with state and local health officials receiving reports of illness, asking people what they ate and searching for the source. To identify the new company, officials examined Natural Selection's records and found it had supplied River Ranch.

Tracing a case of illness to its source, including the time required for DNA analysis of the E. coli, takes about two weeks, Dr. David W. K. Acheson, director of food safety at the F.D.A., said Sunday in a conference call. Dr. Acheson called the process "trace-back and trace-forward."

The investigation is in its early stages. "At this point we have not found E. coli O157 in any bags of spinach that have been tested," Dr. Acheson said. "Our link back to Natural Selection comes from the epidemiological studies."

But after questioning the victims about what they had eaten, he said, "bagged spinach has risen to the top of the list."

The federal health authorities are advising consumers not to eat fresh spinach. They said frozen spinach had not been implicated.

The number of reported cases of E. coli infection rose by seven on Sunday, to 109, but officials said that the real number was probably higher and that reporting was probably delayed because some health departments were not staffed on weekends. They also said they expected the number of states in which cases had been reported, 19 on Sunday, to rise.

"As labs come back on line tomorrow and Tuesday," Dr. Acheson said, "we can well see a surge of cases, which do not necessarily mean that things are not under control."

So far, 16 cases of hemolytic uremic syndrome, a serious kidney complication from E. coli exposure, have been reported. One death, in Wisconsin, has been linked to the outbreak.

The cause of the outbreak is still not clear. It could be irrigation water, Dr. Acheson said, or it could be a processing problem in a factory. In the humid environment of a sealed bag of spinach or salad mix, E. coli can multiply rapidly if the bag is allowed to get too warm, he said.

Some processors expose spinach to chlorine to kill E. coli, which can kill the bacteria on the leaf surface. But if the bacteria are in irrigation water they can enter the plant, and the chlorine will not reach them, Dr. Acheson said.

Spinach Probe, Recalls Expand (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, September 18, 2006

The investigation into a deadly E. coli outbreak in 19 states widened on Sunday as a second produce company was set to recall its fresh spinach products, according to federal officials.

Food and Drug Administration officials on Sunday reported 109 cases so far of infection with a deadly strain of Escherichia coli bacterium. The bacterium produces toxins than can lead to bloody diarrhea, damaged kidneys and death. Roughly half of the cases in the outbreak resulted in hospitalization, and nearly one in six have led to kidney failure. There has been one death, a 77-year-old Wisconsin woman.

"This is unquestionably a significant outbreak," said FDA official David Acheson. He said state and federal investigators will begin sampling spinach farms today in California's Salinas Valley that have been linked to the outbreak. It will take at least a week for those samples to identify the source of the outbreak, he said.

Suspicion has centered on packaged spinach sold by Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The company has recalled all of its spinach packaged in bags, either alone or blended with salads, with "best if used by dates" from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1, 2006.

A second company, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., which investigators found had bought spinach from Natural Selection, is expected to issue a recall of three packaged salad mixes, Acheson said. The "spring mix" brands containing spinach are: Farmers Market, Hy-Vee, and Fresh and Easy. River Ranch officials could not be reached for comment.

Federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention scientists began assisting state officials in the affected states in diagnosing cases, the Associated Press reported. Acheson said that he expects more cases.

As a result of the outbreak, which began with an illness reported on Aug. 23, the FDA advises people not to eat fresh spinach "until further notice."

Grocery store shelves and restaurants have been emptied of fresh spinach as a result. "The entire industry is basically shut down," said Thomas Stenzel, head of the United Fresh Produce Association.

The outbreak underlines the vulnerability of fresh produce to contamination, said food safety expert Douglas Powell of Kansas State University in Manhattan, Kan. Since August, FDA and state officials have been inspecting lettuce farms in the Salinas, Calif., region, because eight of 19 past E. coli outbreaks have originated there since 1995.

"People aren't aware that fresh fruits and vegetables are a leading source of food-borne illness," Powell said. "We don't cook them, so a lot of the safety problems start with farming practices."

E. Coli Cases From Spinach Increase To 109 (WP/AP)

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 17 -- The number of people sickened by an E. coli outbreak traced to tainted spinach rose to 109 on Sunday, as federal officials announced more brands recalling their products.

"This is unquestionably a significant outbreak in terms of E. coli," said David Acheson, chief medical officer with the Food and Drug Administration's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

Natural Selection Foods, the world's largest producer of organic produce, has been linked to the infected greens, prompting a recall of 34 brands. They include the company's labels and those of companies contracting with Natural Selection, based in San Juan Bautista, Calif., to produce or package its spinach.

On Sunday, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., added to its recall spring mixes containing spinach sold under the labels Hy Vee, Fresh and Easy, and Farmers Market, FDA officials said.

Pollution Case Centers On Contradictory Figure (NSDY)

By James Bernstein, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 18, 2006

Port Jeff. Station plant owner painted as both caring leader and insensitive boss; faces rare criminal charges

But he also had a way of making employees feel insecure. Cohen bounced paychecks, never granted a raise or a bonus, withheld pension money and was unable to develop any friendly relationships, even with those who worked for him for years.

Which was the real Gerald Cohen?

Many people who worked for him for decades at the private company he owns, Lawrence Aviation Industries Inc., an aerospace parts manufacturer in Port Jefferson Station, as well as those who considered themselves friends, are not sure. Most describe Cohen as complex.

The U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn says it has no doubt who the 72-year-old Cohen is: one of the nation's worst polluters. Earlier this month, Cohen was arrested by FBI agents and charged with failing to legally dispose of more than 11 tons of highly caustic alkaline chemicals that had been stored in two large tanks on the company's 125-acre property along Sheep Pasture Road, not far from Long Island Sound. One federal prosecutor said the site "looked like a science-fiction horror movie." In 2000, the property was designated a Superfund site, slated for cleanup. Last year, the federal government designated it an "indeterminate public hazard."

Cohen, of St. James, appeared in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, where he pleaded not guilty to two counts of violating the federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. He also pleaded not guilty to a charge of violating the Clean Air Act; he is accused of allowing two diesel power generators that produced electricity for the company to discharge as much as 440 tons of smog-producing nitrogen oxide between 2001 and 2003. If convicted, he faces up to 15 years in prison and fines of more than $300 million.

His attorney, Anthony LaPinta of Hauppauge, said Cohen would not be available for an interview for this story.

Criminal charges in environmental cases are rare, occurring only a few times a year in each state, federal law-enforcement officials said, and are usually filed when a company or an individual is egregiously in violation of the environmental laws and has been so for some time. Civil charges are much more common in pollution cases, they said.

'A bad boy'

Assemb. Steven Englebright (D-Setauket), a staunch environmentalist who represents the Port Jefferson area and has known Cohen for years, said Cohen had been "in a sort of fence-duel mode" with state and federal environmental regulators for years; he described Cohen as often dragging his feet when it came to cleanups. Englebright said Cohen had routinely been cordial and polite -- but his behavior regarding the environment left much to be desired.

"He has been a bad boy," Englebright said.

Englebright and Richard Amper, executive director of the Long Island Pine Barrens Society, say government agencies did not act quickly enough in the case of Lawrence Aviation.

"We have regulations that prohibit such activity, but very little monitoring or investigation," Amper said. "We've gotten to the point where businesses have been willing to trample the environmental laws, figuring if they're caught that's the cost of doing business."

Federal officials say such criticisms are unfair, that such cases are often highly complicated and take time to develop.

Lawrence Aviation has essentially been out of business for more than a year. In its day, the company was a powerhouse in Long Island's aerospace and defense industry, molding titanium slabs into parts for Grumman Corp.'s F-14 Tomcat and other military airplanes. At its peak in the early 1980s, the company had about 500 employees and annual revenues of about $30 million.

The company's slide began in 1984, when workers struck for four months over pay and benefits. Industry experts say Lawrence Aviation never really recovered from the strike. And when the Cold War ended in 1991, the company wasn't able to make up the lost defense business. In recent years, staffing fell to as few as a dozen employees.

The company was started in 1959 by Cohen's father, Lawrence, a no-nonsense businessman. Gerald Cohen took over when he died in 1982. "He wasn't the businessman his father was," said Bob Jensen of West Islip, who worked for the company for decades before retiring a few years ago. "He wasn't a manager."

Cohen, a 1955 graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was widely considered to be highly intelligent but short on people skills. "He's a computer nerd," said someone who knows him professionally. "He doesn't know how to deal with people."

Despite his wealth, Cohen's clothes appeared worn and he was given to driving beat-up old cars. "He didn't look like a millionaire's son," said a former employee who asked not to be identified. "He'd be sitting on the floor fixing a machine, a paperclip sticking in his teeth." But he was cocky and was known for letting everyone know he was the smartest person in a room.

A kinder face

He also could show a softer side, the former employee said.

"If something bad happened to somebody, he would be the first to send flowers," the former employee said, or grant time off for personal problems and show up at funerals. But he wasn't always welcome.

One time, she said, Cohen showed up at the funeral of one his executives, who had suffered a heart attack. The family did not welcome him; they felt Cohen had been a source of great stress.

"He was told he had a helluva nerve showing up," she said.

Cohen's behavior outside the office was described as more open, even gregarious on occasion.

Cohen was in his mid-40s when he married for the first time, and he and his wife, Nancy, were ardent skiers. They have no children.

He was a member of a number of boards and organizations, and contributed financially to several charities. He was president of the board of St. Charles Hospital in Port Jefferson for two years, beginning in 1985, and was given the Theodore Roosevelt Award for his service to the hospital.

He donated money to the Maryhaven Center of Hope, a nonprofit human resources agency; and he served as president of the Stony Brook Foundation, the nonprofit fundraising arm of the state university, from 1987 to 1989. He also was on the Brookhaven Industrial Board for five years, beginning in 1980.

"He's a man with a big heart," said LaPinta, his attorney. "He is sensitive to people in need."

But what former employees remember most are the bounced paychecks and a 401(k) plan they contributed to -- but got nothing back from.

In May, Cohen agreed to pay $1.3 million to settle a lawsuit filed by the U.S. Labor Department, which said he had treated the 401(k) as a "personal piggy bank." The suit was filed in May 2004 and alleged Cohen and Lawrence Aviation made more than $1.6 million in loans to themselves between 1993 and 1995. It said the employees never collected on the loans, "which have never been repaid."

On Fridays, employees would say, "I wonder if I'm getting paid today," recalled Jensen, the retired employee. "Sometimes the checks would bounce. In fact, quite often, they did."

Washington's Energy Failure (WP)

By Sherwood Boehlert

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

The problems BP has had recently with its Alaskan pipeline seem both an apt metaphor for the way the United States has (mis)handled its energy policy and a warning of what may await us if we stay on the wrong track.

For a long time now, politicians have handled U.S. energy policy the way BP apparently handled its pipeline: We've talked about it, we've taken some superficial actions, but we've failed to examine it closely, secure in our belief that everything seemed pretty much okay.

The result, in the case of energy policy, has been gasoline at $3 a gallon; a growing oil addiction (to use the president's well-chosen word) that threatens our national security; and an economy and populace more vulnerable than they need be to domestic and international fluctuations in oil production.

So far, the reaction in Washington has ranged from anemic to the counterproductive. The House passed a bill to streamline regulation of refinery construction, even though there is little evidence that regulation has constrained refinery capacity. The House repeatedly passed legislation to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, with proponents arguing that pollution from drilling is a thing of the past -- presumably a harder argument to make in the wake of this summer's revelations from BP.

The House also passed a bill allowing the entire U.S. coastline to be opened to oil drilling. This bill, which received surprisingly little media attention, not only would allow the lifting of current drilling moratoriums but would also significantly revise the way offshore oil drilling is permitted, weakening the ability of states and citizens to control the use of their shores.

Congress has passed some positive legislation promoting energy research and development, but the actual funding has been rather meager, and much of it has been focused on the most futuristic energy technologies, such as hydrogen and fusion -- gambles that are worth investing in but that can hardly be the foundation of a realistic near-term energy policy.

What is conspicuously missing from the energy debate is any substantial discussion or action on energy efficiency or conservation. Conservative ideologues like to equate conservation with discomfort: sweltering in under-air-conditioned buildings or driving a subcompact car. But these images are absurdly outdated, if they were ever true. Conservation means developing and deploying technologies (including deploying many that already exist) to enable Americans to live the way they want to while using less energy.

This is something that isn't likely to be accomplished by the marketplace alone, despite ideological rhetoric. Every American might desire more energy-efficient goods but still buy, say, a less efficient sport-utility vehicle if that's all that's available. Moreover, energy conservation is imperative, given the national security and economic vulnerability of our current energy path. We need government action to respond to the classic market failures that thwart individual efforts to remedy our oil addiction.

The most important, realistic and feasible step the government could take would be to require automakers to make more fuel-efficient cars by raising corporate average fuel economy (CAFE) standards. About 45 percent of the oil Americans consume is used by cars and light trucks. We simply can't get a handle on our energy use if we don't do something about mileage -- which has been stuck at the same average level for about 20 years, even as every other sector of the economy has become more energy-efficient.

Our unwillingness to address fuel economy -- the House hasn't even been willing to schedule a vote on the issue since gas prices began skyrocketing last fall -- is especially unforgivable because we already have technology that could significantly increase fuel economy without reducing safety or limiting consumer choice. Better still, consumers would save money on gasoline -- savings that would more than cover any costs for the technology. These are not my assertions; they are the conclusions of a 2002 report on fuel economy standards by the National Academy of Sciences.

The case for increasing mileage is so compelling that politicians are at least starting to give lip service to raising CAFE standards. The administration, for example, has proposed a bill that would allow the standards to be increased. But that proposal both fails to require any action and is written in a way that could actually end up reducing average mileage. (This is because it would allow mileage to be set by vehicle class, without setting standards for the overall vehicle fleet.)

Congress should take real action -- just as BP has had to do -- rather than continuing to avert its gaze until the next emergency. After a summer of high gas prices, the public ought to be fed up with Washington's kowtowing to the oil and auto industries instead of taking a hard look at effective measures.

Arellano Brother Is Sent To S.D. To Face Trial (SDUT)

By S. Lynne Walker

Copley News Service, September 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY – The oldest of four brothers accused of heading the ruthless Arellano Félix drug cartel in Tijuana was extradited by the Mexican government to the United States yesterday to face drug charges in San Diego.

Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix, 56, was escorted off a commercial fight at Lindbergh Field last night after being handed over earlier in the day to U.S. authorities in the Texas border town of Brownsville.

The extradition came just more than a month after his younger brother Javier was arrested by the U.S. Coast Guard in a dramatic operation at sea off Mexico's Pacific Coast.

Flanked by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Marshals Service, the balding, bespectacled Arellano Félix was rushed to a vehicle waiting to take him to federal prison, authorities said.

Arellano Félix's extradition surprised U.S. law enforcement officials, who have been asking the Mexican government to extradite him since 2004, when he finished a 10-year sentence on weapons and bribery charges in a maximum-security prison outside Mexico City.

"It came out of the blue," said one U.S. official, who spoke on condition on anonymity.

Although a Mexican federal judge approved the extradition request in 2004, it took two years for the Foreign Ministry to sign the order to hand him over. U.S. authorities were told two days ago that Arellano Félix was being sent to San Diego to face charges.

The decision to extradite Arellano Félix came the same day that U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza sharply criticized the Mexican government, saying, "Drug cartels, aided by corrupt officials, reign unchecked on many towns along our common border."

Garza cautioned that an alarming rise in drug violence threatens the relationship between the two countries.

Arellano Félix is accused of selling 9 ounces of cocaine to an undercover agent at a motel on San Diego's Midway Drive 26 years ago. He was charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and distribution of cocaine. He also was charged with jumping bail.

After posting bail, he fled to Mexico, where he ran a discothéque in the Pacific Coast resort of Mazatlan.

A U.S. prosecutor handling the case said last night that she believes the government will secure a conviction of Arellano Félix.

"We are prepared," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy. "The case is very much intact. The drug evidence still exists and the witnesses are still in place, so we're confident that we're ready to go forward."

Arellano Félix is scheduled to be arraigned in San Diego federal court at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Although the charges against Arellano Félix are relatively minor, U.S. law enforcement officials said his extradition "sends a very strong signal" that the Mexican government is willing to extradite drug traffickers.

"For drug dealers, particularly the Arellano Félix organization, this should be a clear signal that no matter where you are in the organization, once you serve your time in Mexico you may serve your time in the United States," said Garrison Courtney, a spokesman for the DEA in Washington.

Arellano Félix's extradition marks a high point in the delicate negotiations between the United States and Mexico on the issue of extraditing drug traffickers.

Although the Mexican Supreme Court cleared the way in January 2001 for Mexican citizens to be sent to the United States to stand trial, there has been only one extradition of a high-ranking member of the Arellano Félix cartel.

Arturo "Kitty" Páez, a young lieutenant in the cartel, was flown to San Diego in May 2001 and sentenced to 30 years in prison for smuggling cocaine.

While U.S. law enforcement said they were encouraged by Arellano Félix's extradition, they acknowledged that he did not play a key role in running the organization. He was arrested during a police raid in Tijuana in 1993, when Benjamín Arellano Félix still handled the business operations of the cartel and another brother, Ramón, was earning a reputation as the cartel's feared triggerman.

"Francisco obviously isn't the highest in the tier of the Arellano Félix organization, but he's still a player," Courtney said.

Benjamín Arellano Félix was captured in 2002 and imprisoned in a maximum-security Mexican prison. A month earlier, state police shot Ramón dead on a Mazatlan street.

The cartel's leadership then shifted to Javier, who has pleaded not guilty to racketeering, drug and money laundering charges and awaits trial in San Diego.

"We've taken out the top leadership. But we know that the organization has people who can step in right now and run it quite efficiently," Courtney said. "We still have a lot of work to do."

Francisco Arellano arrived last night on Continental Airlines Flight 429 from Houston, which landed in San Diego at 6:58 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0063804

In Houston, a man in street clothes, with his arms and legs shackled, was escorted to the back of the plane before most of the other passengers were allowed to board, passengers said. He was seated in the last row, near the bathroom. Two plainclothes law enforcement agents with badges were seated in the same row, passengers said.

The prisoner said little or nothing during the flight, and his two guards kept a close watch on the other passengers, said Pamela Hodge, 29, of Houston, who was seated a few rows in front of the trio.

"I tried not to look that way because they were very protective of him, the guards were," Hodge said.

Jerad Jurgensmier, 20, a Navy corpsman flying back to San Diego from Houston, said passengers weren't given any information about the prisoner.

"No one said anything to us," Jurgensmier said. "It was kind of weird."

A variety of law-enforcement vehicles were parked on the tarmac when the plane arrived in San Diego, passengers said, and three uniformed officers were waiting at the gate.

AP, September 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY — The U.S. ambassador praised the "courage and conviction" of Mexico's President Vicente Fox on Sunday after Mexico extradited alleged drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix to the United States.

Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter Saturday in the Mexican city of Matamoros, then flown across the border and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville after serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico.

The first major Mexican drug suspect to be extradited north, he will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

Ambassador Antonio Garza's message of praise, issued by the embassy, followed a statement last week that irritated the Fox administration by urging Americans traveling in Mexico to beware of "the rising level of brutal violence" — much related to drug trafficking — south of the Rio Grande.

"While I'm the first to point out those instances where more can be done, particularly along the border," Garza said Sunday, "I've also got to say that this administration has been aggressive about extraditions and committed to doing what they can when they can.

"President Fox has been unwavering in that regard and I recognize and appreciate both his conviction and courage," Garza added.

Fox's government said it had "discrepancies" with Garza's warning to U.S. citizens on Thursday and said it has called U.S. officials to discuss the issue this week.

U.S. officials have been pushing Mexico to overcome reluctance to extradite its citizens. When Mexico officials have tried to extradite major trafficking suspects, courts have blocked them.

Arellano Felix was arrested in December 1993 in Tijuana and was convicted under Mexico's tough weapons laws rather than for drug offenses. He was the oldest of seven brothers in a family accused of running what was throughout the 1990s one of Mexico's largest and most-violent drug smuggling gangs.

Most of the Arellano Felix brothers have been arrested or killed, weakening the cartel. But Mexican and U.S. officials said the gang still moves tons of cocaine and marijuana into the United States from its operations base in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego.

Arellano Felix's brother Francisco Javier Arellano Felix was captured on a fishing boat last month by the U.S. Coast Guard in international waters off the coast of La Paz, Mexico.

Benjamin Arellano Felix, reputedly the planning chief of the gang bearing the family's name, was arrested in March 2002 in Puebla, east of Mexico City. He is still being held in a Mexican jail.

Another brother, Ramon Arellano Felix, was shot to death a month earlier in the Pacific tourist port of Mazatlan. Police say he had been the group's feared enforcer, in charge of killing to settle scores.

Eduardo Arellano Felix is still at large.

Mexico last year extradited 41 suspected criminals to the United States, up from 34 in 2004; 31 in 2003; 25 in 2002; 17 in 2001; and 12 in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Mexico Extradites Alleged Drug Kingpin (AP)

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Mexico extradited drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix to the United States on Saturday, making him the first major Mexican drug lord to be sent north to face drug charges.

The extradition was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords.

The former head of the Arellano Felix drug clan was handed over in the Texas border town of Matamoros after serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico. He will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

U.S. authorities requested Arellano Felix's extradition on June 2, 2003. A federal judge approved that request in 2004, but it took two years for the Foreign Relations Department to send him.

Francisco Rafael was the oldest brother in a family accused of running what was one of Mexico's largest and most violent drug smuggling gangs in the 1990s.

The Arellano Felix gang developed a reputation as one of the most bloodthirsty smuggling rings.

Most of the seven Arellano Felix brothers have been arrested or killed, weakening the group. But Mexican and U.S. officials said the gang still moves tons of cocaine and marijuana into the United States from its operations base in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego.

Arellano Felix was arrested in December 1993 in Tijuana and was convicted under Mexico's tough weapons laws rather than for drug offenses.

His brother Benjamin, reputedly the planning chief of the gang, was arrested in March 2002 in Puebla, east of Mexico City.

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix was captured on a fishing boat last month by the U.S. Coast Guard in international waters off the coast of La Paz, Mexico.

DEA Finds Tunnel In Calexico Area (SDUT)

Union-tribune

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 16, 2006

The Drug Enforcement Administration announced last night that it has discovered a tunnel under the U.S.-Mexico border in Imperial County that apparently was used for smuggling drugs.

The 400-foot tunnel reaches between a residence in Calexico and a residence in Mexicali, Mexico, said John S. Fernandes, DEA special agent in charge.

It is about 20 feet underground, equipped with lighting and bolstered with wooden beams every few feet. It is accessed with a ladder.

The DEA was uncertain what group was using the tunnel, he said.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Border Patrol and the Calexico Police Department helped in the investigation.

DOWNTOWN – San Diego homicide detectives are investigating the death of a man whose body was found around noon yesterday in the bushes in a transient camp.

The camp is beside the on-ramp to Interstate 5 northbound at 11th Avenue.

The death appeared suspicious because of the body's condition, homicide Lt. Jeff Sferra said, though he did not specify the condition.

San Diego Says No To Drugs (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- This seaside city was a bystander as liberal strongholds like San Francisco and Santa Cruz created identification cards for sick patients who use marijuana and wrote regulations to permit storefront pot dispensaries.

Now, 10 years after Californians voted to decriminalize marijuana for medical purposes, conservative San Diego County is leading a backlash against the groundbreaking law.

The county is challenging California's medical marijuana law in state court, saying it should not be required to comply with a state law directing counties to issue ID cards to users. At the same time, local police, working with federal agents, have shuttered all of the nearly 30 marijuana dispensaries in the county.

San Diego's legal showdown pits state laws that permit marijuana use for medical reasons against federal laws that prohibit the drug. At stake: California's decade-old law and the industry it spawned, with potentially far-reaching consequences for other states.

"This is the first time that a county has said that the state is forcing them to do something they don't want to do," said Anjuli Verma, director of advocacy for the Drug Law Reform Project of the American Civil Liberties Union. "If they prevail, it will set a precedent that basically means medical marijuana laws are over."

Since California's Compassionate Use Act was passed in 1996, 10 other states -- Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington -- have passed laws protecting qualified patients from prosecution. Voters in South Dakota decide a medical marijuana ballot measure in November.

California's law allows people suffering AIDS, cancer, anorexia, chronic pain, arthritis and migraine and "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief" to grow or possess small amounts of marijuana with a doctor's recommendation.

In 2003, the California Legislature amended the 1996 bill to direct county health departments to issue ID cards to medical marijuana users.

Counties, which did not receive money to fulfill the requirement, have been slow to issue ID cards, but San Diego was the first to refuse on legal grounds. Under threat of a lawsuit from the local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, the county struck first and sued the organization -- and the state.

"We're trying to get the court to tell the state they've gone too far in telling the counties to do something that facilitates the ability of a person to break federal law," said John Sansone, San Diego's county counsel.

The state attorney general contends in court filings that California is entitled to pass its own state drug laws and legislate programs relating to the use of medical marijuana.

Two other California counties, San Bernardino and Merced, have joined as plaintiffs in the case, which is scheduled to be heard in November in San Diego Superior Court.

San Diego's board of supervisors entered the legal fray shortly after dispensaries with names like Legal Ease, Holistic Healers and Chronic Care Co-op began popping up in coastal enclaves, thanks to the 2003 law, which created a legal framework for the dispensaries.

California has an estimated 200 storefronts that serve about 200,000 people, according to Americans for Safe Access, a group that advocates medical marijuana laws. San Francisco, Berkeley and Los Angeles have passed guidelines regulating the shops.

San Diego prosecutors said neighbors complained about one store in the summer of 2005, prompting an investigation that culminated in joint Drug Enforcement Administration and local police raids in July.

Fifteen operators were charged with illegally selling the drug for recreational use to people who are not ill -- including one undercover agent who prosecutors said he got a doctor to give him a medical marijuana recommendation for his dog.

A lawyer for one of the men, Stephen Harding, who ran Native Sun Dispensary, expressed dismay at the charges.

"These guys were complying with the regulations as they've been laid out," said Jan Ronis. "You have people relying on what seems to be guidance from the state and then the county shoots it down. It's really frustrating."

The remaining stores and delivery services in the county closed after receiving phone calls and visits from law enforcement agents warning that they and their landlords may be prosecuted.

San Diego County District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis said the state law does not require local authorities to permit marijuana storefronts.

"It's the tolerance level in the community that rules in the end," she said. "I think in Northern California they're much more tolerant than in this part of Southern California."

Cops Credit Federal Law With Drop In Gun Crimes (LSJ)

By Kevin Grasha, Lansing State Journal

Lansing State Journal, September 18, 2006

Officials say drug dealer's conviction an example

Gun crimes in Lansing are on the decline because of a federal initiative that gives longer prison sentences to people convicted of them, authorities said Friday.

Since Project Safe Neighborhoods began in 2003, crimes such as assaults with firearms and carrying a concealed weapon have decreased, said Lansing police Lt. Larry Klaus, who heads the department's narcotics unit.

"The word is out," he said at a press conference at City Hall. "If you're caught with a gun, you're going to federal prison."

Advertisement

So far, 59 people have been convicted through the initiative, and most are serving terms of 3 1/2 to 10 years. Klaus said about 30 other cases are under investigation.

Authorities on Friday highlighted the conviction of a 31-year-old Lansing Township man involved in a multi-state drug operation. Benjamin Preston Foreman was sentenced this month to 25 years in prison; he had received five additional years because of federal gun charges. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Grand Rapids handled the case.

A raid on his home turned up three semi-automatic pistols, $7,000 in cash, and 80 grams of cocaine, said police, who believe Foreman was a significant source of cocaine for the Lansing area. His supply came from the West Coast, they said.

Penalties are more severe for gun cases in federal courts, said Ingham County Chief Assistant Prosecutor Linda Maloney.

"We know we can get more bang for our buck," she said, adding that the county prosecutor's office alerts federal authorities, who then take the cases to federal prosecutors. Local police work with the federal Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agency (ATF) and the Drug Enforcement Administration to investigate.

IMMIGRATION:

Firms Vie To Provide The Future Of Border Security (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

If Northrop Grumman Corp. gets the multibillion-dollar contract to secure America's borders, the sky above the Rio Grande would be thick with drones.

Cellphone maker Ericsson Inc. thinks drones are largely a waste and would focus instead on giving Border Patrol agents wireless devices capable of receiving live video.

Boeing Co. would build high-tech towers, lining the borders with 1,800 of them.

For Lockheed Martin Corp., blimps are a big part of the solution. And for Raytheon Co., the key is letting agents watch incidents unfold on Google Earth.

Those are the plans, anyway. The questions now are which company will win the rights to put its technology into play, and how well any of it will actually work in helping the United States gain control of its notoriously porous borders.

The Department of Homeland Security is expected within days to name a winner in a competition that could permanently change the way the United States conducts surveillance, apprehension and detention operations along its northern and southern boundaries. The choice promises to lend significant insight into how the government sees the future of border security, with firms offering rival visions of how that future looks.

All year, the nation's largest military contractors have been locked in intense competition to team with the government on a program that gives the private sector unusually wide sway over a critical national security issue. Michael P. Jackson, the deputy director of the Homeland Security Department, told the competing firms earlier this year he wanted them "to come back and tell us how to do our business."

The resulting proposals are the latest incarnation of decades' worth of attempts to use technology to create a virtual fence along the border. So far, none have been successful. Recent initiatives have ended with cameras that failed to work in extreme temperatures and millions of dollars wasted.

But with immigration legislation stalled in Congress, Homeland Security officials are gambling that this new effort -- known as the Secure Border Initiative -- will be their best hope of cutting the flow of illegal immigrants into the country.

Officials say they expect the solution to be in place within four years, but companies say they can get it done sooner. The cost has been pegged at $2 billion but is likely to be higher. No one is downplaying the stakes.

"I don't think the Department of Homeland Security can afford to fail here," said Wayne Esser, who has led Boeing's efforts to capture the contract, which is called SBInet. "This thing is so politically charged. It's very visible."

The program has already garnered heavy criticism from detractors who worry that the government does not know enough about what it is buying and that the program could amount to a costly give-away to the private sector. "It's a little bit scary when the government throws up its hands and says, 'We have no idea how to do this. Please tell us,' " said Deborah W. Meyers, senior policy analyst at the Migration Policy Institute. "It just seems like the government is putting policy in the hands of the contractors."

Homeland Security officials say they decided to contract out the job because they did not have the capacity to do it in-house. But they maintain that they will ultimately call the shots. "I don't want any mistake about who is working for who," Gregory Giddens, director of the Secure Border Initiative, told Congress on Wednesday. "The [contractor] is working for the United States government."

The decision of which contractor to choose is due by the end of the month and is expected as soon as this week. While the competing proposals are similar in their basic outlines, they differ markedly in the details.

All companies, for instance, offer an array of sensors, including infrared, motion and seismic. But they are divided over where to place them -- whether to bury them, mount them on towers, or send them airborne attached to planes, helicopters or unmanned aerial vehicles.

Overall, the proposals lean heavily on technology developed for the battlefield. "We're transferring things that are military today into a civil implementation," said Bruce Walker, a Northrop Grumman vice president who has led the California company's efforts.

Walker touted the firm's fleet of UAVs, which includes both the Global Hawk -- a plane that soars high to cover large areas -- and the KillerBee, a small, low-altitude vehicle that can be used for more-focused missions.

Both vehicles, he said, have sensors with intelligence capabilities that allow them to differentiate between false alarms and genuine threats. "It may be a herd of antelope moving across the border, and you certainly don't want to send a team after that," Walker said.

Swedish cellphone maker Ericsson, meanwhile, is positioning itself as the nonmilitary solution. Doug Smith, the company's vice president for government solutions, said that border security comes down to "a big, broadband wireless problem" and that the most important challenge is to ensure agents have access to communications and timely information.

Ericsson's plan involves giving every Border Patrol agent a personal digital assistant that's not much different from models available on the commercial market. Tall towers lining the border would fend off dead zones and provide much of the surveillance data.

While the company's plan includes some UAVs, their role is minimal. "UAVs aren't reliable enough. They can't fly in bad weather," Smith said. "We don't need a Star Wars-type solution here. We need something that will work."

Boeing's Esser said his team came to a similar conclusion. "UAVs are incredibly expensive to operate," said Esser, citing the size of the vehicles' ground-based crews. "Everybody's real hot on UAVs. But you just can't afford it. It doesn't make sense."

Instead, the Chicago aerospace company has proposed a network of towers -- ranging in height from 80 to 200 feet -- that would line the northern and southern borders. UAVs would have a more limited role, with agents deploying miniature versions of the vehicles off the back of their trucks.

The final two companies -- Lockheed Martin and Raytheon -- say they provide a balance of air- and ground-based equipment.

At Bethesda-based Lockheed, the country's largest defense contractor, the company's solution includes a UAV that can be launched by an individual agent, much like a paper airplane, as well as larger Predator drones and tethered balloons known as aerostats. On the ground, the company offers a selection of towers -- some fixed, some mobile.

Jay Dragone, the company's vice president of integrated border security solutions, said Lockheed would keep its plan flexible and adjust depending on what helps agents the most. "This is not going to work if it takes the agent a long time to figure out what they're looking at and how to use the systems," he said.

Massachusetts-based Raytheon has developed its solution based on a company-managed program to keep drug-runners and poachers out of the Amazon. Under Raytheon's plan, Border Patrol agents would be able to watch sensor activity and video feeds from their trucks on a display based on the satellite-powered mapping system Google Earth, giving them perspectives on border issues near and far. The company would also provide bar-coded bracelets that could be used to track suspects as they move through the detention system.

Like the other firms, Raytheon has proposed that contractors take over jobs now performed by Border Patrol agents -- such as transporting prisoners and mending fences -- to give agents more time to focus on their main priority. "We would leave the work of the Border Patrol to the Border Patrol," said Frank Marcinkus, Raytheon's SBInet capture manager.

Outside observers say freeing up agents' time could prove critical to the program's overall success. Additional technology will give agents more data, but won't on its own help stop the flow of people coming across the border, said John E. Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org.

"It doesn't matter how much money you spend on the sensors," Pike said. "If you don't spend a commensurate amount to put agents in Humvees to go out and catch suspects, it won't make a bit of difference. All you'll do is get a better sense of how they're coming in."

Labor Movement As U.S. Debates Guest Workers, They Are Here Now (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

CHARLES CITY, Iowa -- When he is home in Montemorelos, Mexico, Roberto Cantú earns $300 a week pouring concrete. Last month, a labor recruiter called him promising similar work in Colorado and Iowa paying five times as much.

Within hours, Mr. Cantú, his three grown sons and his brother were driving their white pickup truck 250 miles north to the U.S. border, on the way to job sites another 700 miles away. It was the Cantús' fifth trip this year to take temporary U.S. jobs, during which they have crossed 18 states.

The Cantús are among an estimated tens of thousands of Mexicans with an unusual place in the bitter debate over immigration. Thanks to quirks in the law, they have green cards enabling them to come to the U.S. for work stints. Many, like the Cantús, call themselves "subidos" from the Spanish verb for "to rise," because they do the grueling jobs of pouring concrete for tall structures such as grain silos for the ethanol plants increasingly rising across the Great Plains.

President Bush is pushing for the U.S. to adopt its first formal guest-worker program since 1964, a contentious proposal that has helped stall broader efforts at immigration-law changes in Congress. The president says the program would respond to the strong demand for Mexican labor in the U.S., and would reduce the number of undocumented workers sneaking across the border to answer it.

Employer groups and other advocates believe guest workers would boost economic growth in both the U.S. and Mexico. Labor unions and immigration foes call that employer-funded propaganda. Their view: Mexicans would steal jobs and undercut U.S. wages.

The experience of the Cantús and other Mexicans who use green cards to hop across the border provides some intriguing clues about how an official guest-worker system might play out. By quickly filling jobs and providing needed skills, such workers are a boon to employers. They rarely put a burden on social services, because they leave their school-age children and elderly relatives at home. Nonetheless, there is some evidence that the Mexicans drive down wages in the industries where they work.

Some guest workers had their status legalized under the Simpson-Rodino Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, which granted amnesty to 2.7 million undocumented workers. It offered that group, who call themselves "Rodinos," the chance at green cards that confer permanent-resident status and the right to work. The act was intended to encourage U.S. citizenship, but some preferred the guest-worker way of life, as the Cantús do, earning wages in the U.S. but keeping their families and their living costs in Mexico.

Others acquired work visas through programs that legalized imported farm workers during times of labor shortages. Still others won green cards after being sponsored by a parent who became a naturalized U.S. citizen, or by marrying a U.S. citizen. About 100,000 Mexicans also legally commute short distances across the border for day jobs in the U.S.

Mr. Cantú's father arrived in the U.S. as a relief laborer during World War II. He worked regularly in the U.S. under the Bracero program for farmhands, which ended in 1964. He became a U.S. citizen in the early 1990s. His citizenship made his children and grandchildren eligible for green cards. It took eight years to obtain them. Since 2003 they have been taking advantage by landing concrete-pouring jobs in the U.S.

The five Cantús keep a brutal pace and spend as much as eight months in the U.S. annually. One day last month, after finishing two 89-hour workweeks in Pueblo, Colo., they barreled across three states in 14 hours to start a job in Iowa. The older brothers, Daniel, 45 years old, and Roberto, 47, split the long drive and arrived just minutes before the night shift began. Daniel headed to a motel to nap; Roberto quickly started work, hoisting himself up a 30-foot scaffold he wouldn't descend until dawn.

Roberto's three sons, 18-year-old César, 20-year-old Mario and 24-year-old Roberto Jr., hopped into town to look for a Mexican restaurant, or at least a 7-Eleven store selling tortillas. They are more comfortable in the U.S. than the older men, mostly because they speak English better. They are the ones who mollify truck-stop waitresses who grow impatient waiting for the older men to order a meal or politely respond to state troopers who occasionally stop them on the road, demanding papers showing they are in the U.S. legally. "We know not everyone wants to see Mexicans in their town," Mario says.

The Cantús are skilled in the continuous-pour construction specialty of subidos, where fresh concrete is pumped nonstop for hours into wooden trenches to harden. That eliminates seams that can trap moisture and freeze during Corn Belt winters. The younger Cantús work as "finisheros," sanding down rough edges of dried concrete.

A $2.4 billion ethanol-plant construction boom is under way in the U.S., according to the Renewable Fuels Association, an industry trade group. Continuous pouring for the silos means round-the-clock work, requiring twice the number of laborers on site. Ethanol plants, situated near their raw grain supply, often are built where skilled labor is scarce.

Midwest construction firms including Fagen Engineering Inc., Granite Falls, Minn., and T.E. Ibberson Co., of Hopkins, Minn., and subcontractors Todd & Sargent and McCormick Construction Co., of Rockford, Minn., find Mexican subidos through a loose confederation of recruiters on the Texas-Mexico border. Those include Ray Maldonado, a Puerto Rico-born, transplanted New Yorker now based in the border town of Eagle Pass. A former laborer, the 52-year-old Mr. Maldonado manages a loyal pool of Mexican workers. He vets work documents of subidos referred by his network of scouts across northern Mexico. He also places some subidos in permanent jobs with U.S. employers.

On a recent Saturday in Laredo, Texas, Mr. Maldonado shepherded 20 workers with their belongings in tiny suitcases and plastic garbage bags onto vans bound for North Dakota. The chain-smoking Mr. Maldonado checked names off a list and answered cellphone calls from workers still en route. As he talked, more crews rolled out of town, two drivers in front, passengers crowded behind, for the two-day drive. Bathroom and food stops are allowed only during refueling.

Sometimes Mr. Maldonado advertises by paying disc jockey Juventino Botello $10 for a 20-second spot on his morning show, on border station XEMU in Piedras Negras. "Workers needed, heavy construction, report to Beto's place in Eagle Pass," Mr. Botello calls out over accordion-laced "ranchera" music.

Around the corner from Mr. Maldonado, rival recruiter Pepe Regosa beat the sidewalks for Younglove Construction LLC of Sioux City, Iowa, which needed 55 men for a job in Missouri. Younglove "hires local guys to do this work, but they don't last," Mr. Regosa said with a grin. "Some leave after one day."

The work isn't just difficult, it is dangerous, too. Just before dawn Friday, 67-year old Jesus Guerrero fell 120 feet to his death, slipping from a scaffold at a silo one of Mr. Regosa's crews is erecting in Underwood, N.D., for Blue Flint Ethanol. "They'll ship the body back to Laredo," Mr. Regosa said. "The company pays."

In Charles City, Iowa, the Cantús joined nearly 100 of Mr. Maldonado's workers building an ethanol-plant corn silo for VeraSun Energy Corp. of Brookings, S.D. Phil Sargent, executive vice president of Todd & Sargent, based in Ames, Iowa, is a subcontractor on the site. He says he would prefer to use local workers but can't find enough of them. "Years ago, this was a summer job for college kids," Mr. Sargent says. He finds the local labor pool has shrunk, while the work has expanded.

Todd & Sargent says it doesn't pay imported workers less than Americans. Most jobs are nonunion. The company must pay additional housing and transportation costs for the subidos.

The accommodations aren't lavish. At the Best Budget Inn in Charles City, the five Cantús were crowded into $30-a-night rooms paid for by Todd & Sargent for the two-week job. Workers on the day shift used the beds by night, while late-shifters crawled in after the shift change at 7 a.m. "I don't have the staff to change everyone's sheets," said motel manager Linda Webb. "I tell each one to show courtesy to the man he's sharing with, and shower before going to bed."

Guest-worker proponents argue that a formal program would minimize costs to U.S. schools and welfare agencies, compared with undocumented workers, because guest workers would be free to cross borders legally and would likely leave their families behind.

Agustín García, a 62-year-old subido from General Teran, Mexico, a city southeast of Monterrey, says he never brought his wife or three children with him to the U.S. during 20 years of temporary work. "A man goes from hotel to hotel, works for maybe a week or two," he says. "He really has to travel alone."

Now, he and his wife share a tidy home in Mexico by a gentle stream, surrounded by households supported by subidos' wages. Mrs. García suffers from high blood pressure and circulatory problems, and benefits from Mexico's free health-care system. Mr. García says if they lived in the U.S., he couldn't afford to pay for her care.

In the U.S., his wages are taxed -- about $25 for every $100 he earns, according to a pay stub from a job Mr. García did this summer building a flour mill in Roanoke, Va. Generally, subidos pay all state, local and federal taxes. They also are covered by workman's compensation insurance in case of on-the-job injury, paying into a fund covering all workers on the job.

Undocumented workers, by contrast, are less likely to pay taxes. They frequently pay thousands of dollars hiring guides to help evade the Border Patrol. That gives them a big incentive to stay longer periods in the U.S. and bring their families across the border, often crowding into the poor neighborhoods they can afford. "We're turning people who would otherwise be temporary workers into permanent settlers," says Wayne Cornelius, an immigration expert at the University of California at San Diego.

The subidos rarely mix with local townspeople. In four years on the road, the Cantús say they haven't attended a baseball game, gone to a movie or visited a national park in the 20 states they have motored through. "We went past that rock in South Dakota once where they have the presidents' faces carved, but it was at night and we couldn't see it," says César Cantú, Roberto's youngest son.

Immigration critics argue that a guest-worker program wouldn't stem the flow of illegal immigrants but simply legalize lawbreakers. Some have a problem with workers like the Cantús as well, contending they are subverting the intent of their visas, which are meant to establish U.S. residency, not just working rights. Technically, they should have a commuter version of the green card, though the distinction isn't strictly enforced.

The presence of so much Mexican construction labor worries union officials in Midwest and mountain states, though demand for construction appears strong enough now to support both foreign-born and local workers. The Pueblo, Colo., cement plant being built by subidos, for instance, is within sight of a massive project, Xcel Energy Corp.'s $1.3 billion Comanche-3 power plant, which employs union workers, nearly all U.S.-born. Ethanol construction tends to be divided between union shops in large towns and subidos in rural areas.

Union officials complain bitterly that competition from Mexico is driving down wages, and there is evidence to back them up. Roberto Cantú's Pueblo pay stub shows he earned $14 an hour for a 45-hour week, and $21 for every additional hour. Pete Mustacchio, business manager of Cement Masons Local 577 in Denver, says Colorado's union pourers earn twice that, including an hourly wage of $23.40, plus health-insurance and pension benefits valued at another $9 an hour. Overtime starts at $35.10 an hour.

Figures compiled by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics indicate wages in concrete work fell 16.5% in 2005 from 2000 -- to $508 a week from $604, adjusted for inflation -- despite a soaring demand for workers. Meanwhile, the proportion of cement workers described as "foreign-born Hispanic" has risen to almost 55% from around 35% in the late 1990s. Statistics suggest many are replacing African-Americans, whose employment in concrete work declined to 9,000 in 2005, from 18,000 six years ago.

David Card, a University of California at Berkeley economist, says the decline in earnings is part of a long-term trend of nonunion construction workers replacing a unionized work force. Other factors are at play besides the subidos. Illegal-immigrant labor drives down wages even more than do legal subidos, and technology has reduced the need for some skilled workers.

An expanded guest-worker program probably would deepen the wage squeeze, says Harvard University immigration economist George Borjas. "I find a 10% rise in worker supply results in a 3% decline in wages" locally.

Earl Agan, business manager of Cement Masons local 51 in Des Moines, says ethanol-plant construction should be a reason to hire more union workers, not fewer. He has 260 members qualified to pour silos, at least 50 of whom are presently without work. "Contractors have my guys traveling all over the country," Mr. Agan says, arguing that remote work sites shouldn't justify importing workers. His conclusion: Contractors want a bigger share of the profit and won't employ union labor if they don't have to.

The Cantús, who were in North Dakota last week building a grain elevator, know their work is controversial. "Our first job was in Peru, Illinois," recalls Mario Cantú, Roberto's middle son. "There was a protest at the gate of the place we were working. I remember they had a big, inflatable rat bouncing around. And people held signs: Mexicans Are Stealing Our Jobs." Nowadays, they sometimes endure the silent treatment on the jobs from other workers, even those born in Mexico. "They say, 'Our job is next,' " Mario adds.

The five Cantús estimate they each earn around $35,000 a year working in the U.S. Daniel Cantú figures it will take him just a few more years of U.S. work to save enough money for his own contracting business. Then he will compete for work year-round in Monterrey, Mexico, where construction is booming. His wife might want to open a dress shop there, he says.

"We wanted to see what working in the U.S. was like," Daniel says. "Well, we've seen it. It's not something you can do forever."

Immigration Reform Efforts Reinvigorate Support For Guest Worker Program (LAT)

By Lee Romney

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

OCEANSIDE — Gilberto Valiente Romero cringes at the memory of his 2003 journey. The long trip to the Arizona border from his village in the Mexican state of Puebla. The hike across miles of desert. Then the bruising finale, as he was captured on the U.S. side and sent back.

But since 2004, the father of three has made the seasonal trek without fear of arrest, under the auspices of Oceanside vine-ripe tomato giant Harry Singh & Sons. Each year in June, Valiente travels at company expense to the northern Mexican city of Hermosillo and is put up at a hotel to await a guest worker visa.

He then boards an air-conditioned charter bus, complete with movie entertainment, for the trip to Singh & Sons, near Camp Pendleton. For six months, he works the fields for a government-set wage, $9 an hour this year. Housing is free and his three subsidized daily meals cost $8.78. Come December, a bus takes him home.

"If I could stay I would," the 38-year-old Valiente said while lounging recently in the dormitory courtyard. "But it's better this way. It's good to be legal."

As border enforcement shrinks the labor force of undocumented field hands and immigration reform looms in Congress, growers have focused with renewed vigor on the need for a simplified federal guest worker program.

For Harry Singh & Sons, which imported nearly half the agricultural visa holders in California last year, the federal program became a necessity in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001. With half its fields on the Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base, the company suddenly came under scrutiny by immigration officials. In a mid-harvest panic, having lost three-quarters of its workers, the company turned to the federal government.

Singh & Sons' experience since then offers a close look at a program that growers and worker advocates alike agree is deeply flawed, yet crucial to comprehensive immigration reform.

The farm's general manager is Luawanna Hallstrom, whose Punjabi immigrant grandfather, Harry Singh, founded the company in 1940. Saying the guest worker program has driven her operation into the red, she estimates that her current annual costs are 28% higher than they would be without it. But the promise of reform keeps her going.

"I had always said 'I will never use the program until it's reformed,' " Hallstrom said. "But the only way we can farm now is because of it."

Still, it was a rocky start for Singh & Sons in the fall of 2001.

Growers must generally ask the U.S. Department of Labor to certify the existence of a labor shortage 90 days before foreign workers are needed. But the harvest was in full swing, so Hallstrom filed an emergency request.

Fortunate to have on-site housing, as required for the program, the company hastily recruited workers in Mexico. If all had gone well, those workers would have been vetted and approved by the State Department and then bused to Oceanside.

But the Department of Labor kicked the application back for revisions, and by mid-December, Hallstrom said, $2.5 million in tomatoes had rotted in the fields.

"We were stumbling through it," she said of the program. "Honestly, it takes a few years to get the hang of it."

Singh's second year in the program brought new difficulties. The law aims to protect U.S. workers by requiring that growers advertise the jobs widely and hire any qualified locals who respond, at the same pay and benefits as their foreign counterparts. But requirements that give domestic workers priority often collide with importing foreign ones.

Singh's application proceeded more smoothly in 2002. But in a pinch while waiting for the laborers to arrive, the company found workers in the Coachella Valley and bused them to the fields daily, paying $6.75 an hour rather than that year's required $8.02 an hour and free housing the foreign workers would receive, a lawsuit later alleged. Then, five days before the visa holders arrived, the busing stopped.

The company violated the law, a judge later ruled in a related injunction, by not offering the Coachella Valley farm hands the same deal as their imported colleagues. Singh & Sons settled out of court.

Although Hallstrom declined to discuss that and other lawsuits in more detail, she said the program's complexities have caused her to retain both immigration and labor lawyers. "We learned, and hopefully everyone else will learn from us," she said.

Still, she said, bureaucratic snafus have persisted. In 2004, the Department of Labor challenged Singh's ability to require that their workers not be color blind, something the company says is essential because the tomato crop is picked in seven shades from green to red. Although Singh eventually prevailed, the dispute resulted in a 45-day delay, which Hallstrom says caused crop damage.

This year, the company was abruptly notified there would be a five-week delay because the Department of Homeland Security, which vets company applications, had moved its processing center. Hallstrom, a Schwarzenegger appointee to the state board of Food and Agriculture and a national immigration reform advocate, enlisted help from the White House, and her applications were quickly processed. But, she asks, "how many people can do that?"

Still, experience has oiled the annual process, which begins when Hallstrom's cousin, David Singh, takes a trip through Puebla and Michoacan.

The excursions draw him away from his job as field manager and are not cheap; he once stayed a month with 150 workers in a Hermosillo hotel, waiting out a delay. But returning workers who trust the company now spread the word to friends and relatives, allowing Singh & Sons to avoid third-party recruiters and their fees.

In rural mountain communities, Singh finds men like Modesto Garcia Antonio, a diminutive farm hand with a dimpled smile from Puebla's San Jose Miahuatlan, who has never attempted an illegal crossing.

Garcia, who wires most of his pay to his wife and three small children, is on his second stint in the Singh fields. Accustomed to picking corn and tomatoes in Mexico for 70 pesos (or $7) a day, he was easily persuaded to travel north after meeting David Singh on village streets.

Workers in the U.S. with false documents have opportunities Garcia lacks, such as moving from crop to crop in search of better wages and conditions. Yet for those who have not yet crossed the border, the visa program is a rare open door.

David Singh "said it was good to come with papers because you earn a good wage," Garcia, 27, said recently, as the smell of carnitas wafted from the barracks kitchen and a lone worker played billiards. "It costs a lot of money to cross alone, and on the news they say it's very hard. Many die."

Hallstrom credits the two-story housing facility, built on company land in the 1980s for $2.5 million, for the farm's continued existence, because without it she could not use the guest worker program. Five new trailers nearby will soon house more workers, but for now Hallstrom pays for overflow employees to stay at Oceanside motels, a costly endeavor.

"We are willing to take losses now, because we are buying time," said Hallstrom, who notes that a number of colleagues have scaled down operations or moved them south of the border. "On paper, you'd look at it, and say, 'It's not making sense.' But I spent 20 years on this issue, and I'm not willing to give up."

She continues to push the federal government for a more grower-friendly program.

Government-mandated wages, she says, should be brought into line with regional averages for each commodity. And she says growers need more flexibility in housing and a shortened period during which they must hire qualified locals, because hiring them in some cases means laying off foreign workers. (Worker advocates are fighting to maintain the wage and housing requirements.)

For now, others who farm near Hallstrom's land say the program is financially out of reach for them.

"There is no housing," said Peter Mackauf, general manager of Leslie Farms, which attempted to build some in Carlsbad several years ago and met fierce neighborhood resistance.

Leslie Farms grows tomatoes, strawberries and other crops in an effort to keep a year-round workforce but pays mostly minimum wage. If strict enforcement compelled him to use the visa program, Mackauf said, he would have to raise prices.

Worker advocates concede that a $9 wage is better than $6.75 and barracks housing better than the creek beds where some San Diego County agricultural workers still camp. Yet they remain critical of the guest worker program.

California Rural Legal Assistance organizer Carlos Maldonado said his group has received reports from locally hired employees at Singh & Sons who feel outperformed by young all-male foreign workers. Imported workers, the local ones contend, have an incentive to work at excessive speeds without complaint: They want to be hired the following year.

Reforms to the program are not likely to ease all concerns. Still, a proposal known as AgJobs, part of the broader Senate immigration reform bill, would streamline Department of Labor approval and scale back the wage rate to the 2003 level while it is studied. It would also allow employers in some cases to provide a stipend instead of housing.

In return, worker advocates secured the right for guest workers to sue employers in federal court for contract violations. But their biggest coup, won by the United Farm Workers, was a program that enables the undocumented laborers to earn legal status if they commit to some continued work in agriculture.

The legislative debate is lost on Singh & Sons' visiting laborers. By 4 p.m. on a recent afternoon, they were trickling back from the fields where they had started work before dawn.

Mud-caked boots were piled in crates outside eight-man dorm rooms. Some workers tooled through the courtyard on bikes, the day's heat cut at last with a wisp of breeze. Most chatted quietly on benches and chairs or gathered in front of the 70-inch television screen.

"It isn't worth it to be a mojado," said Moises Parra, 34, referring to illegal immigrants. He learned of the program on the radio in Altepexi and has worked in it for three years. "We don't pay rent, water, lights. It's good."

Uniformed security guards patrol the compound, where alcohol is not allowed. The men are free to come and go on days off, even crossing into Mexico.

The work is hard: A handful from the Michoacan community of Rancho San Gregorio couldn't hack it and had returned home, said 20-year-old Luis Saldo Morales. But the pay and legal status are enticing.

Last year, 15 men came from the rancho. This year, word of mouth swelled the number to 30.

"None of us had ever crossed before. We never wanted to," said Morales, who is housed at a motel in town.

"It's almost like we're citizens, joked Morales' 22-year-old brother Fernando. "For a little while at least."

Migrating To Modernity (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

After the terrorist attacks of 2001, voters understood that poor failed states could hurt them. President Bush launched a smart new foreign aid program and multiplied the U.S. commitment to fighting HIV-AIDS, and rich countries around the world boosted development spending. But our approach toward poor countries remains confined, idiotically, to the debt-aid-trade box. People don't see that other policies in rich countries have a major impact on poor ones.

Consider immigration. Just about all rich countries are arguing about border enforcement, employer sanctions and so on, but nobody relates this stuff to the parallel arguments about development. Contemplating the noisy immigration politics in the United States, Gawain Kripke of Oxfam confesses, "we've been mostly bystanders in the debate, and I really regret that."

Development charities such as Oxfam certainly should feel sorry. In " Let Their People Come ," a new book published by the Center for Global Development, Lant Pritchett reports that if rich countries permitted extra immigration equivalent to 3 percent of their labor force, the citizens of poor countries would gain about $300 billion a year. That's three times more than the direct gains from abolishing all remaining trade barriers, four times more than the foreign aid given by governments and 100 times more than the value of debt relief.

It's true that there's a downside to immigration from poor countries. This isn't that it depresses wages in the United States; researchers find that this effect is small or nonexistent . Rather, it's that when doctors, nurses and other skilled people leave Africa, they hit the development process in its weak spot . A lack of trained workers is a more serious obstacle to poverty reduction than any lack of money.

Still, Pritchett's numbers show that the development gains from migration swamp the brain-drain problem. For the migrants themselves, a ticket to the rich world is the fast track out of poverty: A laborer who moves from San Salvador to Phoenix can multiply his income without altering the type of work he does or how good he is at it. And this process benefits developing countries, too. Migrants send home remittances, which exceed aid flows and are probably more effective, since the migrants ensure that their hard-earned cash is used productively by relatives. After a few years the migrants may return home armed with savings and ideas. The brain drain becomes a brain gain.

So migration ends up as a net plus for development. But a development-friendly migration debate would sound different from the current one. Immigration advocates in the rich world feel most comfortable making the case for allowing in skilled workers. Skilled migrants, however, trigger the biggest brain-drain concerns; allowing in unskilled workers does more to reduce global poverty. Equally, immigration advocates tend to want arriving workers to assimilate. But the best way to promote development is to allow a rolling cohort of poor workers to amass savings and experience -- and then return to their own countries.

Many immigration experts insist that a guest-worker program isn't feasible: As the old saying goes, there's nothing more permanent than a temporary worker. This is where Pritchett gets really interesting. Germany's Turkish guest workers have put down roots, he concedes, but Singapore, Hong Kong and the Arab Gulf states have taken in vast numbers of foreign workers who leave after a few years. Perhaps this is only possible in authoritarian states? Pritchett's answer is partly no, and partly that there are worse things than authoritarianism.

If the United States offered Mexico a million temporary work visas, it could attach conditions. It could stipulate that these workers be recruited by agencies in Mexico, which would screen candidates for criminal records, require minimal English skills -- and ensure repatriation. The agencies could do that, for example, by withholding some of the migrants' pay until they returned home. An agency that failed to bring people back could be ejected from the program.

Enforcing repatriation would still require tough government action. The United States would have to decide what to do about migrants who marry Americans, which is one obvious way in which temporary guests turn permanent. Singapore deals with this problem by denying guest workers the right to marry citizens. That is beyond the pale, you say? But if desperately poor migrants accept the no-marriage condition in exchange for a visa, who are we to second-guess them?

Pritchett is getting at a ticklish issue. Because the immigration debate is conducted without reference to development, it is couched in terms of American ideals; we don't want to let people in and then treat them harshly, for that would offend our own self-image. But if you bring development into the picture, it's obvious that extremely harsh poverty afflicts billions of people and that opportunities to alleviate this suffering are few and precious. An expanded temporary worker program is one such opportunity. If American ideals stand in its way, what does that say about them?

I.R.S. Eyes Religious Groups As More Enter Election Fray (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

With midterm elections less than two months away, Christian conservatives are enlisting churches in eight battleground states to register voters, gather crowds for rallies and distribute voters' guides comparing the candidates' stands on issues that conservatives consider "family values."

This election year, however, the religious conservatives are facing resistance from newly invigorated religious liberals and moderates who are creating their own voters' guides and are organizing events designed to challenge the conservatives' definition of "values."

Both religious flanks are looking nervously over their shoulders at the Internal Revenue Service, which this year announced a renewed effort to enforce laws that limit churches and charities from involvement in partisan political campaigns.

"We became concerned in the 2004 election cycle that we were seeing more political activity among charities, including churches," said Lois G. Lerner, the director for exempt organizations at the I.R.S. "In fact, of the organizations we looked at, we saw a very high percentage of some improper political activity, and that is really why we have ramped up the program in 2006."

The I.R.S. issued a report in February that said nearly half of the 110 tax-exempt organizations it investigated after the 2004 elections for improper political activity were churches. Of the 40 churches that the I.R.S. had finished investigating, 37 were found to have violated the law. These churches were given warnings or penalized with excise taxes and, although none lost their tax exemptions, the I.R.S. is still investigating seven more cases against churches.

Capitalizing on the crackdown, the advocacy group Americans United for Separation of Church and State plans to begin mailing letters today to 117,000 clergy members in 11 states warning them to avoid "any activity designed to influence the outcome of a partisan election," by either supporting or opposing a particular candidate.

"The stakes for these churches are higher than ever before because of the I.R.S.'s new enforcement efforts," said the Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "The I.R.S. is taking this very seriously, and I think it's because the situation was spinning out of control."

Mr. Lynn said that conservative churches in 2004 had constructed a political machine he likened to "a church-based Tammany Hall." He said he expected their voters' guides to be skewed to favor Republican candidates. "It's absolutely illegal, it's wrong and it divides churches," he said.

But a leader of Focus on the Family, a conservative Christian organization whose affiliates are distributing voters' guides in eight states, said its guides would be nonpartisan and comply with I.R.S. rules.

Tom Minnery, senior vice president for government and public policy at Focus on the Family, said, "What I see are people from the left complaining when people from the right decide they want to be citizens."

Focus on the Family, a ministry founded by James W. Dobson and based in Colorado Springs, has stepped into the vacuum left by the Christian Coalition, which pioneered the voters' guide tactic in churches in the 1990's under the leadership of Ralph Reed, but is now in disarray in many states.

Focus on the Family's state affiliates plan to register voters and distribute voters' guides in churches this year in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Michigan, Ohio, New Jersey, Minnesota, Montana and Tennessee: all states where Republican candidates favored by religious conservatives are on the ballot.

"Obviously, they're battleground states," Mr. Minnery said. "Our overall desire is for our constituency, generally conservative church people, to be involved citizens."

He said he regarded the threat of I.R.S. penalties as exaggerated, and he called Mr. Lynn of Americans United "the bully on the playground." He said the Alliance Defense Fund, a legal advocacy group, had offered to "defend for free any pastors if they're challenged" by the I.R.S.

Focus on the Family and its affiliates are holding pre-election rallies in Pittsburgh, St. Paul and Nashville, but no candidates will be invited to speak. The group also plans to send letters, Mr. Minnery said, "laying out the issues that separate the candidates in certain major races," but he refused to say which races.

Many of the most visible groups representing religious moderates and liberals are distributing materials that do not mention the candidates.

The voters' guides distributed by two such groups — Sojourners, a predominantly evangelical organization founded by Jim Wallis, and Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good — will enumerate principles that they say religious voters should use to evaluate candidates.

Among the principles are a commitment to reducing poverty and preserving the environment and caring for immigrants: in short, the left's version of "family values."

"We're not doing candidates," Mr. Wallis said. He added: "The principle comes from Martin Luther King Jr., who never endorsed a candidate, not once. He made them endorse his agenda. We want to create an agenda with a social movement behind it that holds politicians accountable."

Catholics United for the Common Good, which is affiliated with the Catholics in Alliance group, is compiling "candidate evaluations" for many of the senate races, using 25 criteria important to Catholic voters, said Chris Korzen, the group's director. But they do not plan to distribute paper copies, only to post it on the Web.

"It's a matter of resources," he said.

Pasadena Church May Fight IRS Summons (LAT)

By Scott Glover And Louis Sahagun

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

A liberal Pasadena church facing an IRS investigation over alleged politicking sounded a defiant note Sunday, with its leaders and many congregants saying the probe amounted to an assault on their constitutional rights and that they were inclined to defy the agency's request for documents.

"These people are offended," said the Rev. Ed Bacon, rector of All Saints Episcopal Church, after delivering an impassioned sermon about the investigation to a standing-room-only crowd of about 900. "Freedom of speech and freedom of religion have been assaulted by this act of the IRS, and I think my people want to be heard in court."

Bacon said he would consult with attorneys and church officials before deciding a course of action but that the vast majority of parishioners with whom he spoke Sunday thought the church should resist a summons demanding copies of newsletters, e-mails and other records.

"I believe we should respectfully decline to produce the documents," said Cathy Shearon, an All Saints parishioner "off and on" for more than 20 years. "Being passive plays into the culture of oppression."

Federal law prohibits nonprofits, including churches, from campaigning for candidates. At issue is whether an antiwar guest sermon, delivered two days before the 2004 presidential election by the Rev. George F. Regas, constituted campaigning.

Some All Saints defenders have called the IRS probe a case of selective prosecution. But conservative congregations, as well as liberal ones, have been investigated across the country by the agency over the years.

One church in upstate New York lost its tax-exempt status in 1995 after running a full-page ad in USA Today in 1992 saying that it would be "a sin to vote for [Bill] Clinton."

But at least one group familiar with the past probes called the All Saints case unusual in the breadth of the summons' request, which also seeks financial records and overhead costs related to Regas' sermon.

The probe surprised Americans United for Separation of Church and State, a watchdog group that has filed 58 complaints of improper church politicking over the last decade and a half. The grievances were roughly evenly divided between liberal and conservative religious groups.

"What perplexes me about All Saints," said Barry Lynn, a group spokesman, "is that I have never heard of a church being asked to undergo such a sweeping, broad and deep investigation on the basis of a complaint about a single sermon by a guest speaker."

All Saints came under IRS scrutiny shortly after Regas, the church's former rector, delivered a sermon that depicted Jesus in a mock debate with then-presidential candidates George W. Bush and John F. Kerry. The sermon did not endorse either candidate.

Regas' suggestion that Jesus would have told Bush his preemptive war strategy in Iraq "has led to disaster" prompted a letter from the IRS in June 2005 stating that "a reasonable belief exists that you may not be a tax-exempt church."

On Friday, an IRS agent handed Bacon a pair of summonses, one demanding that the church produce by Sept. 29 all materials with political references created in the 2004 election year, the other directing Bacon to appear before tax investigators Oct. 11.

At the pulpit Sunday, Bacon got straight to the point.

"I want to begin my sermon by once again expressing my gratitude to the Internal Revenue Service," he said, eliciting loud laughter from the congregation. "Those brothers and sisters really know how to shine a spotlight on a struggling church and swell the number of worshipers."

Bacon dedicated about half of his 20-minute sermon to the IRS issue, explaining that defiance could land the church in federal court. He asked parishioners to send him e-mails with their thoughts. He also noted that the summonses and other correspondence related to the case would be posted on the church's website, http://www.allsaints-pas.org .

Bacon told the congregation that, although he recognized that the church could not endorse or oppose a political candidate, neither could it remain silent in the face of "dehumanization, injustice and violence."

"History is shamefully littered with the moral bankruptcy of people who were Christian in name but not behavior," Bacon said, citing indifference by some Christians to slavery and the Holocaust.

"Neutrality and silence in the face of oppression always aids the oppressor," he said. When he was done, Bacon received a minutelong standing ovation.

Parishioner Sarah Letts said she was concerned that — right or wrong — defying the IRS could jeopardize the church's tax-exempt status and hamper its ability to do good.

"What I really like about this church is they don't just talk the talk, they walk the walk," Letts said. "I would hate for the IRS to be able to stifle that."

All Saints was one of several religious organizations that attracted national attention after being targeted by the IRS during the 2004 election cycle. Federal privacy rules, however, make it all but impossible to determine how those cases were resolved.

For example, Americans United for Separation of Church and State asked the IRS to investigate the Rev. Ronnie Floyd of First Baptist Church of Springdale, Ark., for endorsing Bush in an unusual July 4, 2004, televised sermon.

Floyd never mentioned Bush by name when he compared the positions of Bush and his Democratic opponent, Kerry. But as he spoke, photographs of the candidates were displayed on a screen.

DOJ_NMG_0063819

"Floyd went way beyond the pale," Lynn said. "Kerry's pictures made him look weird, and Bush's were flattering and made him look presidential."

On Sunday, Charlie Foster, a spokesman for Floyd's church, declined to comment.

Lynn's group was expected to launch an effort today to counter what he says is possible illegal campaigning coordinated by the Colorado-based Focus on the Family and its founder, James C. Dobson. Lynn said the conservative group plans various campaign-like activities, such as making political tracts available just outside church services.

IRS guidelines allow churches to publish voter guides as long as they avoid political bias.

"We believe Dobson's playing fast and loose with federal tax laws and that his intentions are to lure churches into what could be an illegal campaign," Lynn said.

In the meantime, All Saints' 3,500 active congregants are struggling to decide how best to proceed.

"It's a very tough call we have to make," said Bob Long, All Saints' senior layman and a retired attorney. "But we're at the point where they really are trampling on our constitutional rights.

"We can't just roll over, but we also don't want to spend all our resources," he added. "But beyond all that, I still can't believe we got stuck in the middle of all this after one sermon on a special occasion by a guest speaker."

Challenges Mount Against Refund-anticipation Loans (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

H&R Block CEO Mark Ernst appeared eager to turn the page on a flurry of disappointing corporate news.

Speaking at the firm's annual shareholders meeting in Kansas City, the head of the nation's largest tax preparer outlined a fee-reduction plan that implicitly responded to critics who have charged that refund-anticipation loans unfairly siphon high interest charges from millions of low-income Americans.

But any hope that the changes announced at the Sept. 7 meeting would defuse that criticism evaporated as Peter Skillern, head of a watchdog group that has assailed the loans, followed Ernst at the microphone. Skillern, concluding an unsuccessful David-vs.-Goliath bid for a seat on Block's board, commended Ernst and said he would publicly support the changes — but then resumed the pressure.

“Rather than try to dress up this pig and have the best-dressed and best-acting pig in the market, we need to get refund-anticipation loans out of the market altogether,” said Skillern, executive director of the Community Reinvestment Association of North Carolina. He urged Block to lead a reform to “change the rules of the game.”

“We appreciate that Mr. Skillern attended our shareholder meeting and said he would endorse publicly the significant reforms H&R Block has made to its refund-anticipation loan product,” the company said.

Skillern issued his call amid a recent flurry of activity in Congress, the IRS and the courts that could better educate taxpayers about refund-anticipation loans and could impose new regulations on the transactions.

Each year, an estimated 10 million Americans, frustrated by weeks-long waits for their IRS refunds, turn to tax preparers who provide checks within days. Those checks are usually refund-anticipation loans, payments that are secured by and repaid from a pending federal tax refund.

The loans often run for seven to 14 days — the interval between the date they are issued and the date the lender receives the IRS payment that satisfies the debt. Because the loans are short term, the annualized interest rates often soar to 100% or higher.

More than half of those who received the loans in 2004, or more than 5 million taxpayers, were recipients of the earned income tax credit, a major federal anti-poverty program, IRS data show.

They paid an estimated $1.24 billion in refund-anticipation loan fees for 2004, the most recent year for which the data are available, according to a January report by the National Consumer Law Center, a non-profit that focuses on issues that affect low-income Americans.

They often don't realize that they're borrowing their own money at high rates — or realize that they're signing up for a loan at all.

They are Americans such as Canieva Hood, who testified that she faced a financial crisis when she went to a Jackson Hewitt Tax Service office in Trotwood, Ohio, to get her taxes done in January 2002.

The then-29-year-old single mother of two explained in a court deposition last year that she asked Jackson Hewitt for the fastest refund possible, because she lived "from paycheck to paycheck."

"My rent was coming up, and I had a few bills that I had to pay," Hood testified. "And my daughter's birthday was going to be in a couple of weeks." She signed up for the company's Rapid Refund, which added $135 to the $155 she was already being charged in tax-preparation fees. The $290 total represented more than one-eighth of the total Hood overpaid in federal taxes for 2001, court records show.

But Hood said she never got her expected $1,954 refund. Instead, the money was transferred to help satisfy a $2,699 debt on a 1995 refund-anticipation loan she had received through H&R Block, court records show. She mistakenly received two refund checks that year, the records show.

Hood testified in her deposition that she didn't know the paperwork she signed at the Jackson Hewitt office in 2002 automatically authorized withholding of her refund to repay certain types of debt. Jackson Hewitt did not return calls seeking comment on refund-anticipation loan-related issues.

Today, Hood is the lead plaintiff in two potential class-action cases that are among recent actions posing legal and regulatory challenges to refund-anticipation loans:

•In February, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer sued H&R Block for allegedly misleading clients about the cost of the loans, a charge the firm denies. The case, which seeks several reforms, is proceeding even as H&R Block and its lending partners recently agreed to pay $101.5 million to settle other class-action cases filed over refund-anticipation loans.

•Jackson Hewitt, the nation's second-largest tax preparer, disclosed to investors in July that it is nearing a $5 million consent judgment with Lockyer's office to settle an inquiry launched in 2003 over the firm's refund-loan marketing.

•A pending U.S. Senate bill would require firms that provide refund-anticipation loans to register with the Treasury Department and comply with new public disclosure rules about the cost of the loans. The Senate also directed the IRS to produce a study on refund-anticipation loans. The report is expected soon.

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson called the loans "predatory" in a USA TODAY interview. However, he said, "What you have is a real demand on the part of approximately 10 million people who, when they come in and file their tax returns, they want their money, and they want it right away.

"And if the IRS were to step in and say, 'You can't do it,' I think there would be an uproar on this," said Everson. "I don't like these loans, but I don't have authority to stop them."

But Nina Olson, the IRS national taxpayer advocate, argued in a June report that the agency should improve its inspection oversight of electronic tax return originators, which in many cases facilitate refund-anticipation loans. The agency should also speed up refunds, reducing the need for loans, and provide refunds through a government debit card for those without bank accounts, Olson wrote.

Some members of Congress argue that the IRS has helped the refund-anticipation loan industry via the Debt Indicator, an IRS program revived in 1999. The program shows whether someone has federal or state tax debts or owes money on other government obligations. Banks considering a refund-anticipation loan application limit their financial risk by checking the Debt Indicator to determine whether the IRS is likely to withhold a tax refund.

Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, a critic of refund-anticipation loans, is a lead sponsor of proposed legislation that would block the IRS from continuing the Debt Indicator. Everson said a ban would be counterproductive.

"The people who provide these products have indicated to us if the Debt Indicator isn't there, they'll just jack up the (refund-anticipation loan) fees," he said.

Despite criticism of the loans, businesses ranging from used car dealers to furniture sellers have joined tax preparers in the market as a way to boost sales. During recent tax seasons, for instance, CarBiz, a Canadian firm now based in Florida, offered used car dealers a program called TaxMax. The program — recently sold by CarBiz — enabled customers to have their taxes done and get a refund-anticipation loan that could pay off an existing car loan or finance an upgrade to a newer car.

Everson, without addressing specific examples, voiced concern about companies involved in such arrangements, "because there is a temptation to shuttle people into (loan) products" that make money for the firms. However, he said, the IRS has no authority over "what lines of business people can be in."

What the IRS has done is propose regulations Everson said would require stronger written taxpayer warnings — "very clearly in bold letters, large size" about the legal and financial ramifications of refund-anticipation loans.

For their part, some companies that facilitate the loans have responded to the concerns of consumer groups and government officials. H&R Block and Jackson Hewitt agreed to eliminate some fees the firms previously charged for refund-anticipation loans.

At the Block shareholder meeting, Ernst announced a cut in fees on the loans for customers who open accounts with the recently established H&R Block Bank. In recent months, he has also called on competitors to avoid so-called pay-stub loans, which can be issued even before the IRS issues annual W-2 earnings statements.

Everson said Block's plan to cut loan fees "doesn't solve all the problems, but it is a step in the right direction."

North Carolina State Treasurer Richard Moore, however, said he's seeking outright elimination of the loans. In August, he teamed with New York Comptroller Alan Hevesi and Connecticut Treasurer Denise Nappier to seek a meeting with H&R Block's board of directors. The company has agreed to the request.

Moore said he plans to use the session to tell Block officials the loans are "really bad for business."

"Just because there's a market for it doesn't make it right," he said.

"We've made significant changes to our refund-anticipation loans since the last time Treasurer Moore spoke publicly about this issue. We look forward to explaining these positive developments during our meeting with him," H&R Block said in a statement.

Mark Brooks, 26, a pharmacy supervisor and police officer trainee from Dayton, Ohio, shares Moore's feelings. Brooks said he had to pay $124 in fees — $44 more than he anticipated — when he got a refund-anticipation loan in 2003 through Jackson Hewitt.

"I was mad, but I didn't have any other choice," said Brooks, who is among those who have joined a proposed class-action lawsuit against Jackson Hewitt.

"I was a full-time student then. I needed the money to pay bills."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New Supreme Court Term Promises Early Drama (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 18, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court's new term, which already offers controversial challenges involving abortion, affirmative action, punitive damages and global warming, promises to add significantly to the emerging portrait of the newly constituted Roberts court.

The justices will open the 2006-2007 term on the traditional first Monday in October -- Oct. 2 -- but in an untraditional way. There will be no oral arguments because of the Jewish holy day, Yom Kippur.

But on that day, or as has become more routine in recent years, on the Friday before the first Monday, the Court will announce new grants of review -- as well as denials -- of cases gleaned from the thousands that came into the Court throughout the summer.

The justices approach the opening day with a relatively spare argument docket, having agreed to hear arguments in 31 cases, fewer than the number granted review at this time a year ago. But there is none of the uncertainty that surrounded them last fall as they awaited the arrival of a new chief justice and dealt with the impending departure of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

But even if the high court only decided the 31 cases currently on the docket, there is plenty of potential drama and legal significance in that group, say scholars and court watchers.

"There are some stand-out cases and each of them will test whether this is a 'restrained' Court," said constitutional law scholar Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University School of Law, referring to the abortion, affirmative action and punitive damages challenges.

Each of those "headline" cases, he added, also reflects the influence of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who has played a major role or has cast the decisive vote in the precedents or doctrines underlying those challenges.

The balance of the current docket, said Kmiec, is not like those cases but is "wonderfully lawyerly," many dealing with such issues as retroactivity or administrative law.

"One trend from last term which I really hope will continue is that the chief justice seems to be oriented toward trying to find, where he can, an opportunity for consensus resolution of cases," said high court scholar Mark Rahdert of Temple University James E. Beasley School of Law. One of the weaknesses of the last chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, said Rahdert, was that he made no serious effort to achieve consensus, and that resulted in many splintered decisions and a huge increase in concurrences.

"It was really kind of messy," said Rahdert. "Roberts seems not to like that and to think the Court should speak with something more nearly approaching a single voice. That's not to say he is afraid of dispute."

FACING DISPUTE

Roberts' consensus-building efforts surely will be tested early in the new term in two of the most divisive issues for the high court -- abortion and affirmative action.

"I think the handwriting is pretty clear in both areas that the law is going to change significantly," said Rahdert. "If you just line up the votes -- replacing O'Connor with [Justice Samuel A.] Alito [Jr.] on both issues. The committed minority in the past that was opposed to affirmative action and any kind of permission for partial-birth abortion is set to become a majority."

The real question in both, added Rahdert, is how dramatically will the law change. "Will the Court announce some sort of bold, new set of principles or apply the existing framework in a different fashion and weigh the values in a different way?"

In Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382, the Bush administration seeks to overturn rulings by the 8th and 9th circuits that struck down the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

Every court to review the law has found it invalid, generally because it is overbroad and because it lacks an exception to protect the health of the woman -- a requirement established by a 5-4 high court decision in 2000 in Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, which held that Nebraska's partial-birth abortion law was unconstitutional. O'Connor was the critical fifth vote to invalidate the law. Kennedy wrote a bitter dissent.

In enacting the federal ban, Congress explicitly found that a health exception was not necessary for this type of medical procedure.

"Rather than enacting a law that conformed to Stenberg, Congress sought to overturn that ruling and made findings in the act that criticized factual findings of numerous federal district courts," wrote Priscilla J. Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights, who is high court counsel to Dr. LeRoy Carhart and three other physicians in the 8th Circuit case.

"There are two aspects to the case that are intriguing: the extent to which Congress has found the facts, and [that Congress is] owed deference under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment," said Pepperdine's Kmiec.

That has implications that extend beyond abortion, he said. "And the particular issue of the health exception, which has been, for conservatives, one of the more duplicitous aspects of the entire body of abortion jurisprudence."

Kmiec concedes that it is "very difficult at first blush" to see why a conservative, restrained court would take the abortion challenges, since there is no circuit split and there is a recent precedent.

"Maybe the answer is: It's not a fully restrained court, especially in this case where Justice Kennedy has been waiting to prevail, and justices [Clarence] Thomas and [Antonin] Scalia have not fully signed on yet to the Roberts-Alito method of decision-making," said Kmiec.

The replacement of O'Connor with Alito may also be determinative in the Court's two key affirmative action cases: Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District #1, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

Parents in both cases are challenging school integration guidelines that prevented their children from attending their school of choice because of their race or ethnicity. The Bush administration has intervened in the cases on the side of the parents, arguing that the guidelines involve "outright racial balancing" which is "patently unconstitutional."

The high court last visited the issue of affirmative action in 2003 when it upheld the affirmative-action admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School, but struck down a differently constituted admissions policy at the undergraduate school. Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003); Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003). O'Connor was the key vote and voice in the law school ruling; Kennedy was in dissent. If the school districts here lose, "It would really, in the context it is before the Court, signal the end of the Brown v. Board of Education desegregation era," said Temple's Rahdert. "What's left of school desegregation are these voluntary plans that try, at the margins, to combat the tendency of having patterns of one-race schools."

REGULATING WARMING

The high court takes up one of the most hotly debated environmental issues of the time-global warming-in a challenge to the Environmental Protection Agency's interpretation of the Clean Air Act. Massachusetts v. EPA, No. 05-1120.

The case involves whether greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks should be regulated by the EPA under the Clean Air Act because of their contribution to global warming. The agency in 2003 concluded that it had no authority to regulate air pollutants associated with climate change, regardless of the state of the scientific evidence. It also concluded that the four substances covered by a petition seeking regulatory standards were not "air pollutants" within the meaning of the Clean Air Act.

Thirty parties, including 16 states, unsuccessfully appealed the agency's decision to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

In the high court, Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas Reilly argues, "The ruling in this case is an extreme departure from this Court's precedents on statutory interpretation. To allow this decision to stand would be to sanction an enormous shift of power to administrative agencies, effectively letting them dismantle statutory regimes they simply do not like."

The Bush administration argues that petitioners have no standing and that the agency identified "a variety of sensible and appropriate reasons -- including the complex and highly uncertain nature of the scientific record" for its conclusion that even if it had authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from motor vehicles, "an endangerment finding would be inappropriate at this time."

While global warming is a "first" for the Supreme Court, a key sentencing challenge in the new term is continuation of fallout from the justices' sentencing revolution begun with Apprendi v. New Jersey, 540 U.S. 446 (2000). In Apprendi, the Court held that the Sixth Amendment prohibits judges from enhancing sentences beyond statutory maximums based on facts not found by a jury.

In Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551, the justices will examine California's three-tiered, determinate sentencing system for compliance with the Sixth Amendment and Apprendi and its progeny. Cunningham is significant for at least two reasons, said sentencing scholar Michael O'Hear of Marquette University Law School. "We're talking here about potentially devastating results for the largest state criminal justice system in the country," he said. "If the state loses, it's going to result in chaos in this enormous system."

A decision, he added, also may result in the Court saying important things about the federal system, in which, because of U.S. v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), sentencing guidelines are no longer mandatory. "The state in its brief is trying to analogize its system to the federal system," said O'Hear. "If the Court declares the state system unconstitutional, then there is a question about what has been happening in the federal system since Booker was decided and the Court may feel obliged to talk about that."

Other cases to watch include:

Burton v. Waddington, No. 05-9222: Is the sentencing decision, Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), retroactive?

Lopez v. Gonzales, No. 05-547; Toldeo-Flores v. U.S., No. 05-7664: Is the commission of a controlled substance offense that is a felony under state law, but a misdemeanor under federal law, is an "aggravated felony" under the Immigration and Nationality Act and thus a deportable offense?

Carey v. Muladin, No. 05-785: Is a defendant's right to a fair trial violated when family of the dead victim wore buttons bearing his picture during trial?

Former Reed Smith Partner Selected For 3rd Circuit (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, September 18, 2006

Two of the vacancies on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals could soon be filled now that President Bush has nominated Thomas Hardiman, a 41-year-old federal judge who has been on the bench in federal court in Pittsburgh for less than three years.

If confirmed, Hardiman, a former partner at Reed Smith, will fill the vacancy created in July 2005 when Judge Richard L. Nygaard took senior status.

Likewise, the second nominee, Judge Kent Jordan, 49, had served less than four years on the District of Delaware federal bench when he was chosen in June to replace Senior Judge Jane R. Roth.

No nominee has yet been named to replace Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who was elevated to the U.S. Supreme Court in January.

Hardiman is the former treasurer of the Republican Committee of Allegheny County, but also has strong ties to the Democratic Party by marriage. His wife is the former Lori Zappala, the niece of former Pennsylvania Supreme Court Chief Justice Stephen A. Zappala and cousin of Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen A. Zappala Jr.

Appointed to the Western District bench at age 38, Hardiman is one of the youngest 3rd Circuit nominees in recent memory -- but not the youngest.

Alito, now 56, joined the 3rd Circuit at the age of 40 and former 3rd Circuit Judge Timothy K. Lewis, who stepped down from the bench in 1999, was 38 when he joined the 3rd Circuit after just one year on the Western District bench.

The late Judge Edward R. Becker was 48 when he joined the 3rd Circuit, but had started his judicial career at age 37 on the Eastern District of Pennsylvania bench. And Judge D. Brooks Smith was also 37 when he was appointed to the district court bench in Pittsburgh, and 51 when he joined the 3rd Circuit.

The earliest start on a judicial career for a current 3rd Circuit judge is that of Senior Judge Walter K. Stapleton, who was 36 when appointed to the District of Delaware and 51 when he joined the 3rd Circuit.

Hardiman earned his bachelor's degree in 1987 at the University of Notre Dame and went on to earn a law degree in 1990 at the Georgetown University Law Center.

He spent the first two years of his career in the Washington, D.C., office of Skadden Arps Slate Meager & Flom, and in 1992 moved to Pittsburgh to join Cindrich & Titus.

In 1999, Hardiman joined Reed Smith's Pittsburgh office as a partner in the litigation department.

Sen. Arlen Specter said Hardiman is an "accomplished judge with excellent academic credentials," and that he expects Hardiman will be "an outstanding addition" to the 3rd Circuit.

Sen. Rick Santorum also praised the nomination, saying he had "enthusiastically supported" it, and that he was "pleased that President Bush nominated such an outstanding candidate to fill this vacancy."

Hardiman's colleagues on the federal bench in Pittsburgh have also sung his praises.

In the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette earlier this year when his imminent nomination was just a rumor, Western District Chief Judge Donetta W. Ambrose called Hardiman "an absolute star on our court."

And former Western District Chief Judge Donald E. Ziegler was quoted in the Post-Gazette as saying Hardiman was a "pleasant surprise" on the district court, and that he quickly earned high marks from lawyers.

Huns In The Control Tower? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

The Federal Aviation Administration earlier this month had many of its 1,500 or so supervisory personnel in St. Louis to discuss, among other things, implementation of new work rules for air traffic controllers -- a move strongly opposed by the controllers union.

DOJ_NMG_0063825

The supervisors were encouraged to focus on improving their leadership and management skills, lest there be a decline in employee morale. There was a list of books in the FAA's Center for Management and Executive Leadership Library Resource Center that might be useful.

Some of the titles are well known in the management world: "More Than a Motorcycle: The Leadership Journey at Harley-Davidson." That might come in handy, as would "Mentoring: A Practical Guide" or "Leader as Coach."

Our favorite? "Leadership Secrets of Attila the Hun ." The explanatory blurb describes this as a book about "the man who centuries ago shaped an aimless collection of nomads into rulers of the ancient world -- offers us lessons today."

Never heard air traffic controllers described as an "aimless collection of nomads," but . . .Noble Goal: 'To Leave With Dignity'

The plaudits have already begun for House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), who's leaving Congress at the end of this term.

At the end of a committee meeting Tuesday, likely one of the last Hyde will chair, his good buddy Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the panel's ranking Democrat, praised Hyde's accomplishments and asked everyone to give him a round of applause for his service.

When the applause died down, Hyde reflected on his three-plus decades in Washington: "When I came here 32 years ago, I wanted to change the world. Now I just want to leave with dignity. The committee stands adjourned."Big Brother Is Watching the Watchdogs

Good news last week from the White House briefing room -- temporarily in a Jackson Place townhouse across the street on Lafayette Park. Reporters will no longer be able to tell whether the White House is watching them. They'll just have to assume it.

CBS News White House correspondent Bill Plante spotted something odd Tuesday during press secretary Tony Snow's morning's briefing, known as the "gaggle," which generally is not televised.

A small TV camera was mounted in the ceiling, Plante noted. It was black, matched the television lights and was unobtrusive, he wrote in his news blog.

Plante observed a White House aide panning the camera from one reporter to another as they asked questions. So what was this all about? Snow said he didn't know.

Turns out it's so the White House staff can watch the informal briefings -- and see who's asking what questions. White House officials assured reporters it was not for surveillance.

On Thursday, the camera was gone. Plante heard that it was being fitted with a wide-angle lens so it wouldn't need to swing around.

By Friday, the camera was back. And it indeed looked like it had a wide-angle lens.Treasury, Back in the Game. Maybe.

There was some chatter last week in the press about how new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is restoring his department to its traditional top-tier status after six years of downward drift under largely ignored predecessors John Snow and Paul O'Neill .

Yes, we're hearing about how heavy-hitters have been filling top positions at Treasury and how Paulson talks regularly with the White House and President Bush 's innermost circle, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice .

Some White House and State Department reporters say they detect the hand of veteran Bush spinmeister Jim Wilkinson at work in all this scuttlebutt. After all, Wilkinson worked at the White House and more recently at State before becoming Paulson's chief of staff just a couple months ago.

Well, even so, still could be true.Matters of State and Style

While Paulson allegedly is quickly finding his place in the Cabinet firmament, superstar Rice, who is not running for president, was busy Friday afternoon doing a photo shoot and interview with Vogue magazine for a piece later this fall. Uncle ar, we were told, whether this was necessarily to be a cover, but there will lovely photos of Madam Secretary. Remember, she's not running.'Do-Nothing Congress,' Indeed

Low expectations award of the week. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), speaking at a gathering of the New American Foundation on Thursday night, said: "There are only six days left in this 109th Congress. It doesn't matter. We haven't done anything anyway."

Senate Struggles On Earmarks (RC)

By Tory Newmyer And Kate Ackley

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

The two Senators taking the lead on reforming their chamber's earmark rules need to come up with a measure that can sail through the Senate before GOP leaders approve it, a senior leadership aide said.

The Senate is struggling to match the reform enacted last week by their House colleagues, and with the clock ticking down to adjournment, it is unclear whether Senators will be able to produce any workable rules changes.

For now, Senate Republican leaders are deferring to Rules and Administration Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and ranking member Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a GOP leadership aide said.

Similarly imperiled is a plan that Lott and Dodd want to push to eliminate the long-standing Senate tradition of secret holds, in which Senators can block legislation without identifying themselves. Republican leadership in the chamber remains opposed to the proposal.

While the holds change and the earmark reform likely would move separately, a leadership aide said it remains to be seen whether either one will advance.

A spokeswoman for Lott did not return requests for comment, and a Dodd spokeswoman said the Senator is waiting for Republicans to step forward with a plan.

"Sen. Dodd stands ready to listen and report back to his leadership, but we've not heard of any movement or proposals from the majority," Colleen Flanagan said, adding that Dodd "was very clear that he thinks the House ought to move forward and appoint conferees in the time still left to enact comprehensive reform."

Broader lobbying reform remains stalled, because the House-passed legislation includes a provision cracking down on 527s that is opposed by a cloture-proof majority in the Senate. Despite new calls for action from outside ethics groups after the Friday's news of an expected guilty plea by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), prospects for a more comprehensive measure on lobbying laws continue to appear dim.

Meanwhile, focus has shifted to the Senate after House lawmakers approved a change to their internal rules requiring new disclosure for sponsors of earmarks on spending, tax and authorizing bills. With appropriations season in full swing, aides, lobbyists and outside watchdogs were struggling late last week to understand the House-passed language and gauge its impact on the remaining work on spending bills this year.

"It's unclear," said House Appropriations spokesman John Scofield. "Ideally it would apply to both chambers, but we lost that argument because of political expediency."

Members of the House spending panel mostly opposed the rules change. Their interpretation of the measure is that it cracks down more forcefully on appropriators than it does on taxing and authorizing committees. And while fiscally conservative Republicans hailed the reform's passage, some in their ranks were still unsure late last week exactly what it would accomplish.

"It's going to turn into the commencement of hot debates on exactly what earmarks are," one conservative House GOP aide said. "We see this as just the beginning."

For appropriations bills, the House earmark reform seems likely to have a limited impact this year. The change is only certain to apply to earmarks in the one spending measure the chamber has not yet passed — the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education bill. Other than that, only earmarks dropped into conference reports will have to include the names of their sponsors.

That means that if the Senate does not pass its own version of reform, only earmarks added in conference and in the House Labor bill will be identified.

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense said not disclosing all earmarks in this year's spending bills would be "a slap in the face."

"I can certainly say we're going to be expecting" fuller disclosure, he said. "And if they don't provide it, then the taxpayers will know this has been a sham that's been perpetrated on them, and they will demand it."

Michael Fulton, an appropriations lobbyist at GolinHarris, said he's in favor of earmark transparency. "I think it will keep lobbyists and Members of Congress more clean, and that's good," he said. "It will make it better for those people that are following the rules and being transparent about their projects."

Richard Gold, who heads the lobbying practice at the firm Holland & Knight, which has many appropriations clients, said the reforms should have little impact on the business.

"The fact that you're going to slap somebody's name next to it, that's not going to make a difference for reputable lobbyists," he said.

But one appropriations lobbyist, who would speak about earmark reform only on condition of anonymity, said the reforms could have an impact on his and his colleagues' lobbying techniques.

Currently, this lobbyist said, his strategy is to get several Members to submit his clients' requests to the Appropriations committees and hope that the flood of requests, coupled with the clout of certain Members, carries the projects across the finish line. But if only one Member gets credit for securing an earmark, this lobbyist said, some Members will not want lobbyists to urge other Members to ask for the earmark. "One Member might say, 'I'm the champion — don't go to anyone else,'" this lobbyist said.

This lobbyist added that "the thing that concerns me the most is where this is going." He said he expects it to be "a roadmap for all these watchdog groups and federal investigators to attack every earmark and to look at who's the lobbyist, how much did they contribute."

He said that already, some senior-level Congressional staffers are spreading the word that lobbyists who want earmarks should not write checks to Members who are helping them get earmarks for clients.

We're Changing The Culture (USAT)

By Brian Bilbray

USA Today, September 18, 2006

The American people believe that the accountability and transparency they expect from their leaders have been replaced by backroom deals. The practice known as "earmarking" has fostered a system that places a premium on waste and abuse.

For far too long, earmarks were added anonymously without any debate. Special interests have too much influence in the appropriations process. Decisions were made behind closed doors and out of public view.

Last week, the House of Representatives took the first step in changing the culture that has left so many Americans disillusioned with their government. With the public demanding reform, the House adopted rule changes to the practice of earmarking that will bring more transparency to the legislative and appropriations process. For the first time, earmarks will be put in the public light where everybody will be able to see how their tax dollars are being spent.

This is the first step of many in what must be an ongoing commitment from this Congress to blow away the fog of anonymity that surrounds our governing process. If we are to make a profound and lasting change in how this institution handles the taxpayers' dollars, then we must be willing to adopt changes that will enable us to be better stewards and more responsible to the taxpayers.

That is why I am calling on Congress to adopt a two-year budget cycle, so that election-year politics wouldn't influence budget and appropriations decisions. I believe that decisions about the budget process should be made after elections, not before them. The American people believe their government is broken. It is up to us to repair it.

A two-year budget process would help create more oversight, accountability and transparency. The path to reform has only begun. We must have the will and commitment to restore the public's confidence.

Rep. Brian Bilbray, R-Calif., co-sponsored the House resolution on earmarks that passed last week. (House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis declined to provide an opposing view.)

Time For A Time-Out? (WSJ)

By John H. Fund

If Republicans lose big in November, one reason will be their tardy response to public outrage over profligate spending. The guilty pleas of former GOP Rep. Duke Cunningham and lobbyist Jack Abramoff prompted demands for reform of the earmarks -- pork projects members often secure in secret -- that were prominent in both scandals.

On Thursday, the House did finally pass a rules change that will force sponsors to attach their names to projects. The Senate isn't expected to follow suit, meaning earmark reform there must wait until next year. On the plus side, both houses this month did pass the Federal Transparency Act. It creates a public Internet database that will allow Google-like searches of the $1 trillion in federal grants, contracts and loans. The "shame factor" the bill will heighten is needed, given that earmarks grew tenfold between 1990 and 2005.

As modest as it is, the transparency bill spent much of August in limbo after Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens of Alaska, chief defender of the infamous "Bridge to Nowhere," put a hold on it, using the tradition allowing any senator to secretly block a bill. These games feed the perception of an out-of-touch Congress and demoralize many GOP voters. "Every event I go to, someone complains about overspending and pork," says Rep. Chris Chocola of Indiana, one of the most embattled GOP incumbents. "They still don't think we get it."

Many members simply don't believe the political costs of pork can ever exceed the benefits. Democrats have been largely silent. After all, they get about 45% of them even as a minority. "One man's pork is another man's steak," is how many members dismiss reform.

Congressional appropriators argue that earmarks represent less than 1% of the federal budget and are often worthy projects. But earmarks have a budgetary impact far beyond their dollar cost. "They are a gateway drug on the road to spending addiction," says Republican Sen. Tom Coburn. Many members feel compelled to vote for bloated spending bills, fearing their local projects will be stripped out.

Earmarks have also dramatically expanded lobbying. "Lobbyists go client hunting, telling cities they can virtually guarantee an earmark," says Ron Utt of the Heritage Foundation. In 2005, nearly 4,000 companies or local governments hired lobbyists to pursue earmarks, up from just 1,865 five years ago. Jack Abramoff is a case in point.

Earmarks by the thousands inevitably bring scandals by the dozens. This month has already brought two. The U.S. attorney in New Jersey subpoenaed records from a deal involving Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez and a Hudson County nonprofit that starting in 1994 paid Mr. Menendez a total of $329,353 to rent a building that he owned. At the time, the nonprofit was run by a political ally of Mr. Menendez. Later, the same group was the recipient of millions in federal funding after Mr. Menendez, then in the House, broadened federal grant standards to include that nonprofit.

Meanwhile, Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Democrat from Washington state, helped arrange $11.6 million in federal earmarks in the past year for projects benefiting clients of a lobbyist who is advising her re-election campaign and still owes her between $15,000 and $50,000 from a personal loan. Both senators say they sought the funding because it benefited their states.

Republicans have their own earmark problems. The San Diego Union-Tribune reports that House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis has steered hundreds of millions in federal funds to clients of lobbyist Bill Lowery, a former congressman who is so close to Mr. Lewis that they have exchanged two key staff members, "making their offices so intermingled that they seem to be extensions of each other."

Sen. Stevens defends the earmark process, claiming "discretionary federal spending isn't out of whack," despite all evidence to the contrary. He admits a lot of the earmarks now being handed out wouldn't have passed constitutional muster before the Great Society, but no one is more tenacious in seeing his state now gets its maximum share. Humoring him has cost Republicans credibility. He has become an icon of earmark excess, starting with the fact that he's given his name to Ted Stevens Anchorage International Airport. Earmarks appear to be a family business. Bill Bittner, his brother-in-law, is a D.C. lobbyist who has hauled in dozens of earmarks for his clients. His son, Ben, is the majority leader of the Alaska Senate, and while in office has collected large consulting fees from companies that benefited from some of dad's earmarks.

Last month, federal agents raided the offices of Ben Stevens and a half-dozen other Alaska legislators, investigating ties between them and an oil-services company. Some of the legislators involved even referred to themselves as "the Corrupt Bastards Club." Alaska officials admit the perception of favoritism in local contracts and federal earmarks is embarrassing the state.

Similar embarrassment is spreading to Congress. Staffers are appalled at how members prostitute the institution by scraping the bottom of the pork barrel. Rep. Dan Lungren of California says that "members are now much more mere errand boys for local government and constituents."

Rep. Chocola supports extending the term limits that now apply to all committee chairmen to all members of the Appropriations Committee. "It's clear appropriators see the world differently from all the rest of us," he told me. Term limits would at least limit how much their vision could be warped while serving on Congress's "favor factories." The ban on gifts to members and their staff should also be extended to local governments and universities seeking earmarks.

President Bush could also do more. Republican Sen. Jim DeMint notes that the Congressional Research Service has found that 95% of recent earmarks were slipped into committee reports and not written into law. "These non-legislated earmarks are not legally binding," he says. "President Bush could ignore them. He doesn't need a line-item veto."

The federal government is now an astounding 185 times as big in real terms as it was a century ago. A general sense that Republicans have forgotten why they were sent to Washington is a big reason why only 43% of Republicans approve of Congress in this month's Fox News poll. If Republicans can't better explain how they plan to get a grip on spending, many voters will conclude they both deserve and need a time-out from power.

The Ghosts Of Corruption Present (NYT)

One of the shabbiest shell games under way in Congress is the attempt to convince voters that lawmakers are curbing their corrupt relations with power lobbyists. The cravenness was never clearer as G.O.P. House leaders passed a placebo rules change in place of honest reform — and on the very day when one of their own, Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, was plea bargaining in the corruption investigation of his old friend Jack Abramoff, the disgraced überlobbyist and influence peddler.

The political ghosts of Mr. Ney and Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, should haunt this Congress and its Republican bosses for their disgraceful refusal to end the Capitol's embrace of the lobbying industry. In the first burst of the Abramoff scandal last spring, both houses made all manner of reform vows, then cynically hung two hollow bills out to die on the vine.

Last week House leaders sanctimoniously promised an end to the "fog" and "shadows" with a rules change concocted of smoke and mirrors. The rule pretends to deal with just one part of lobbying corruption, the cramming of millions of dollars in special interest favors into must-pass budget bills.

Disclosure of these backdoor deals and their sponsors is promised. But lobbyists who have feasted on earmarks are already mapping their way around this fig leaf, just as lawmakers hungry for lobbyists' campaign money know they have once more voted for the shameless status quo.

Congress is offering this wink and a nod on earmarks only to cover its spinelessness on larger ethical issues. The Republican majority has already junked proposals to restrict the rise of lobbyists as campaign finance brokers for grateful lawmakers.

A more responsible Congress would ban lobbyists as political money bundlers, as well as the proliferation of lawmakers' relatives as lobbyists and the Capitol junkets catered by lobbyists on corporate tabs.

Playing Politics With Terror (WP)

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

"ILISTEN TO MY Democrat friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

That was House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio talking to reporters last week. He should apologize.

For five years the country has been debating how to balance aggressive action to prevent and punish terrorism with core concerns about privacy and other civil liberties. On many issues -- the treatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay and in secret prisons, warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency, prohibitions against torture -- Democrats, joined by some brave and responsible Republicans and more often than not backed up by the courts, have served as an important brake on an administration heedless of constitutional requirements, international law and national reputation. On some matters -- for instance, their overblown denunciations of the USA Patriot Act -- Democrats have been mistaken in their criticisms.

But whether one disagrees with Democrats on any particular issue, it is offensive to try to paint opponents, as Mr. Boehner did, as uninterested in "protecting the American people" -- and to dodge the implications of that statement by claiming, as Mr. Boehner did, that he was simply wondering. As the election season heats up, this is a line of argument that Republicans would do well to drop.

For Ex-Postal Service Official, Summer Scandal Heats Up (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

All summer, federal-dom has been abuzz over a steamy U.S. Postal Service Inspector General's report accusing the agency's former public affairs chief of heavy drinking, expense account chicanery and sexual harassment. But who knew that the subject of the report, Azeezaly S. Jaffer, has spent the season on vacation, courtesy of the Postal Service?

Jaffer's taxpayers' holiday bears witness, a Postal Service spokesman said, "to how hardworking he is."

The June IG report accuses Jaffer, who managed a staff of 160 and a $20 million budget, of, among other things: drinking at a work function until he passed out; running up $8,000 in extra hotel room charges so he could qualify for a suite with a bathtub for two; and following a female colleague into her hotel room, propositioning her, then passing out.

The Postmaster General's office requested the report in mid-2005, after employee complaints about Jaffer's behavior, spokesman Gerry McKiernan said. Eleven days after the IG released its report June 19, Jaffer, who denies the allegations, left the agency "to pursue other career opportunities."

His departure was announced by Postmaster General John E. Potter, who wrote in a memo to officers that Jaffer "served us well during some of the most difficult public relations challenges faced by any organization," including the 2001 anthrax attacks. His efforts, Potter wrote, "were critical to maintaining public and employee confidence in the Postal Service and the mail."

And then, despite the allegations, Jaffer went on two months' paid vacation, which ended Sept. 1. Beyond that, Jaffer's attorney, Matthew Hsu, said, his client is in line for another two months' vacation pay; at his annual salary of $160,000, the four months of vacation pay amounts to more than $50,000.

Jaffer has paid the Postal Service $3,600, mostly for bills run up by his family last year.

Late last week, the Postal Service issued new post-Jaffer expense guidelines. Dinners, they say, should not exceed $50 per person, more frugal than, for example, the $1,066.08 that the IG says Jaffer charged the Postal Service for dinner for three, including 16 drinks.

McKiernan wondered last week why anyone remains interested in this summer's scandal. But Congress aims to keep Jaffer's endless summer warm at least through autumn.

On Friday, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) who chairs the House Committee on Government Reform, and the committee's ranking minority member, Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), sent a letter to Potter requesting a pile of records linked to Jaffer's case. "The Inspector General's report of clearly unacceptable conduct by a senior postal official is troubling to all of us," the letter reads. The Postal Service has until Sept. 28 to respond.

Jaffer spent some of his summer vacation telling his side to Sidley Austin, which recently released a 42-page "white paper" denying the charges against him.

A few excerpts follow:

The IG says: "Jaffer drinks to excess at official Postal Service functions and has done so to the point of unconsciousness on at least two occasions. . . . [Name redacted] . . . recalled going to dinner with Jaffer and others at a restaurant in New York City. . . . Halfway through dinner, Jaffer fell forward, almost hitting his head on his plate, apparently losing consciousness. [Name redacted] escorted Jaffer back to his hotel room."

Sidley Austin says: "The OIG alleges that Mr. Jaffer . . . was refused boarding on flights due to intoxication and that he left his shoes in a hotel lounge due to intoxication. . . . None of these allegations are true. Mr. Jaffer freely acknowledges that he has consumed alcohol at many different Postal Service events and business dinners. However, he has never consumed alcohol to the point of incapacitation or incoherence. . . . Postal Service employees who have worked with Mr. Jaffer . . . have never seen Mr. Jaffer lose consciousness or be carried to his room because he was intoxicated."

The IG says: "[Name redacted] stated that one evening in 2000 while attending the National Postal Forum held in Nashville, Tennessee, Jaffer offered to escort her to her hotel room. She did not realize how intoxicated he was when she accepted his offer. The manager stated that he followed her into her room, tried to touch her, and propositioned her. She could not convince him to leave her room, and Jaffer finally fell asleep on the floor. . . . The next morning Jaffer woke up and immediately left her room. . . . She stated that when Jaffer sees her in the building, he compliments her appearance, tells her he loves her . . ."

Sidley Austin says: "Mr. Jaffer treats female employees of the Postal Service with respect and dignity. . . . Specifically, in 2000 or 2001 at a Postal Forum in Memphis, Tennessee, Mr. Jaffer and [name redacted] shared a brief drink at the hotel bar. . . . He offered to walk her back to her room. . . . When they got to her room, he continued to talk with [name redacted] in her room, and then he eventually fell asleep on the couch. . . . He did not make any explicitly sexual or vulgar remarks to her, nor did he attempt to touch her or make sexual advances toward her."

The IG says: "When asked about the high per-person costs of the meals he hosted at Peking Gourmet Inn, Jaffer stated that they have to be looked at in context. . . . Jaffer stated that, in regard to wine, he considers anything up to $100 a bottle to be "halfway decent and reasonable."

Sidley Austin says: Mr. Jaffer's alcohol purchases were appropriate. . . . His requests for reimbursement were never denied. The Postal Service never cautioned or counseled Mr. Jaffer regarding his alcohol purchases. . . . Mr. Jaffer has acted as someone in his position should -- he has entertained individuals who have benefited or may be in a position to benefit the Postal Service."

DOT Specialist Accused Of Fraud (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

As a specialist on fuel cell technology in the U.S. Department of Transportation, Shang Hsiung traveled the country for years to attend trade conferences to discuss alternative fuel and other agency initiatives.

But federal authorities say the 54-year-old Takoma Park man had another agenda during his out-of-town trips.

Since 2001, prosecutors say, Mr. Hsiung used counterfeit checks and stolen credit-card information -- including co-workers' card numbers -- to pay for escort services while on government travel.

Mr. Hsiung, who has been placed on leave and has declined to comment, is scheduled to appear for a hearing in federal court in the District next month. He was charged with wire fraud last week.

If convicted, Mr. Hsiung faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison.

Charging documents do not state how much money investigators think was stolen over the years. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in the District said the amount is not yet part of the public record but "is in the thousands of dollars."

The charges filed Sept. 11 state that Mr. Hsiung "stole credit card numbers and credit card information from co-workers at the Department of Transportation and from other people ... to purchase the services of escorts."

G. Allen Dale, Mr. Hsiung's attorney, said yesterday that there are "two sides" to the story.

"Often times, good people make mistakes," he said. "My job is to make sure that this person, whom I view as a good person, doesn't pay for it more than necessary."

From his office in the District, Mr. Hsiung used his government computer to find escort services in anticipation of trips, Jonathan R. Barr, assistant U.S. attorney in the fraud and public corruption section, wrote in charging documents.

Mr. Hsiung, a transportation-management specialist, also used his work telephone to contact escort services in California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Texas and Georgia, prosecutors say.

In addition, Mr. Hsiung is accused of impersonating the vice-president of an unnamed company that is traded on the New York Stock Exchange and creating counterfeit checks in the company's name.

Prosecutors said Mr. Hsiung told escort services that the company was trying to negotiate "a major deal with an Asian businessman and stressed that it was important for the businessman to be shown a good time."

According to public records, Mr. Hsiung has been a leader at the transportation agency in touting fuel-cell and hydrogen-technology initiatives to industry leaders.

He was the project manager for an agency study last year that focused on moving toward hybrid-electric technology for transit buses. He also was the point of contact in the agency for a $49 million fuel-cell, bus-technology grant program.

Report Offers 6 Keys To A More Successful Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

Federal managers looking for that road map to the future may want to check out a report, to be released today, on six trends that are keys to overhauling government operations and improving federal performance.

The trends were identified by three senior staff members at the IBM Center for the Business of Government with an eye to helping federal agencies prepare for an era in which incremental change may not be enough to meet public expectations or to address such megaproblems as terrorism.

"The challenges facing governments call for comprehensive and profound change," Jonathan D. Breul , a senior fellow at the IBM Center, writes in the report. He adds, "Those that play a waiting game, postponing these changes, will find their fiscal strength and programmatic effectiveness eroding."

For the report, Breul, Mark A. Abramson , the IBM Center's executive director, and John M. Kamensky , an IBM senior fellow, pull together themes from 150 research papers prepared for IBM since 1998. The center, a component of IBM's federal consulting practice, awards $20,000 stipends to researchers who produce papers on federal management issues.

Some of the trends have gained more traction than others and some are proving controversial. The trends, according to IBM, are:

Â· Changing the rules. The traditional personnel, procurement and financial management systems are being replaced. New organizations, such as the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, have been created to improve coordination and to determine who can be held accountable for certain activities.

With congressional approval, the departments of Defense and Homeland Security are leaving the decades-old federal pay system to set up performance-based pay systems. IBM research, however, cautions that shifting public-sector employees to performance pay is risky and may prove to be the most difficult challenge faced by many agencies.

Â· Using performance management. Strategic planning and information about agency performance and costs have increased substantially since passage of the 1993 Government Performance and Results Act.

The U.S. Postal Service and the Defense Finance and Accounting Service, for example, have created goals to reflect "the voice of the customer," "the voice of the employee" and "the voice of business," according to the IBM Center.

Â· Providing competition, choice and incentives. On taking office President Bush called for a "market-based government," but his efforts "have achieved limited success," the IBM Center says.

Bush's primary initiative has focused on job competitions to determine whether federal work should be turned over to the private sector. Research for the IBM Center found the competitions can achieve "better results at lower costs, regardless of whether the winner is the public or the private sector." But the center notes that "its future use is uncertain because of political concerns about potentially adverse effects on the federal workforce."

Â· Performing on demand. It's no longer business as usual because government must be much better at sensing and responding to economic, social, technological and health changes -- "be they terrorism, mad cow disease, or the processing of drug benefit claims," the IBM report says.

In addition to being more responsive, key agencies must find ways to maintain their service levels "no matter the impediment or threat," according to the center.

Â· Engaging citizens. Technology provides new opportunities for government to involve the public in decisions and policies. Research has found that trust in government increases when citizens are engaged, the report says.

Â· Using networks and partnerships. As society becomes more complex, agencies cannot succeed in delivering services or programs on their own any longer, the IBM report says. Agencies will probably be more successful by creating collaborative efforts that reach across agencies, across levels of government, and across the nonprofit and private sectors, according to the report.

In adapting for the future, Abramson says, agencies will need a strong career civil service and an experienced team of political appointees. If those ingredients are in place, he says, "our prediction is that we will see all six trends accelerate."

The IBM report, "Six Trends Transforming Government," can be found athttp://www.businessofgovernment.org. The authors will take questions and comments on Federal Diary Live at noon Wednesday on washingtonpost.com. My e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

A father's influence on his son can be incredible, from shaping a boy's outlook on life to the tiny, seemingly unimportant things like choosing between Bic and Sharpie. That's certainly been the case in the Bush family, where President Bush has sometimes gone Texas-big with his dad's lessons. Where the 41st president played baseball, the 43rd owned a baseball team; while Dad stopped troops short of invading Baghdad, W made it his target; and as the former prez prefers to use Sharpies, the current prez demands them-and even gives them as presents.

"He asks for them by name," says a Bush insider, "and if someone hands him something else, he barks, 'Where's the Sharpie?'" How come? "They're so easy to use," says another Bushie. "And you can see what you've written." Bush's isn't just any Sharpie. Like those famous boxes of peanut M&Ms, Bush's Sharpies carry his signature and the words The White House. He even has Camp David Sharpies. If you're an important aide, the presidential Sharpies are included with a signed golf ball, baseball, tie clip, and cuff links in the White House trinket bag each gets.

Sharpie boss Howard Heckes, president of Sanford Brands North America, says lots of celebs-like tennis star Maria Sharapova-have personalized pens, but "it's pretty cool" to supply the prez. "Sharpies are good for the president of the United States or the president of the PTA."

Can Magnum P.I. Replace Moses?

That old National Rifle Association TV ad in which Magnum P.I. actor Tom Selleck says, "I am the NRA" might be making a comeback. That's because he's being talked about as the replacement for former five-term NRA President Charlton Heston, the Moses portrayer who is afflicted with Alzheimer's disease. NRA insiders like the idea of promoting Selleck, an off-and-on NRA-er since he was a kid and now one of 76 board members, to the top job. But some suggest that while it will eventually happen, it won't happen soon. Emilie Raymond, author of the new book From My Cold, Dead Hands: Charlton Heston and American Politics, agrees. "Maybe when Selleck hits a point in his career when he's doing less leading roles and more cameo spots," she tells us, "he'll have time to devote to the NRA in a fashion similar to Heston's presidency."

He Saw 9/11, Now He Sees 'the End'

Joel Rosenberg, the New York Times bestselling author whose books have eerily predicted bad things like 9/11, has a new one coming out, and in it he takes on the superbig question: Is the end near? Seems many think so. For Epicenter, a book on the Middle East crisis, Rosenberg had the polling firm McLaughlin & Associates ask 1,000 adults if they agreed that current events were evidence of what the Bible calls the last days. In the poll, provided exclusively to Whispers, a remarkable 42 percent agreed. The breakdown is even more startling: Half of women agree, 75 percent of blacks agree, and 57 percent of those ages 18 to 25 agree.

Country Before Politics (WT)

By Stephen Herbits

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Next week, the US Senate has yet another opportunity to choose between self-serving superficiality or a willingness to put country before politics.

Tomorrow, the Senate Armed Services Committee will hold hearings on two important military promotions and assignments. The two General Officer nominees served in succession between 2002 and 2006 as senior military assistants to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Obviously, it will be tempting for some senators to use the occasion to play "let's beat up on Rumsfeld" instead of truly considering the merits of the officers before them. It will be easy for these senators to take another temporal stab for small political gain, while ignoring the damage they are doing to the process of attracting and retaining the best to serve our country in uniform.

General officer promotions and assignment of three- and four-star officers require Senate confirmation. Prior to recommendation, a potential nominee's military records are scrutinized for performance, moral and ethical standards and superiors' recommendations. After full vetting by military and civilian leaders of an officer's military branch, the Office of the Secretary of Defense and subsequently the White House, nominations are then submitted to the Senate for its consent.

The Senate has every right -- even a clear obligation -- to review candidates for the most senior positions of our armed forces. Today, more than any time in recent history, our military is faced with dangerous threats coming from nationalistic and theocratic enemies, asymmetrical tactical and technological warfare, and demands for new strategies, capabilities and organizational approaches. We are at war and need the very best and brightest to lead our military. And so the Senate must scrutinize.

But the Senate role decidedly does not extend to punishment for serving in an assignment close to a political appointee. Worse, using a Senate hearing meant to judge qualifications for advancement to create a circus of criticism for policies for which these individuals were not responsible will tarnish the reputation of some of our most talented and honorable public servants. It risks deteriorating the quality of senior officers willing to seek such advancement.

A disturbing trend has emerged over the past several decades. Our federal government is less and less able to attract the best and the brightest of America to serve in positions requiring Senate confirmation. Many studies written by panels of experts analyze the discouraging and adversarial confirmation process facing Presidential nominees. We now face an even further deterioration of the process -- extending to the highest ranks of the military. In many ways, it will be the process that is on trial next week, and not the candidates.

Two exceptional officers will be testifying tomorrow. Both have served their country to an extraordinary degree. Both have earned the highest level of respect from civilian leaders and military peers as they have executed their responsibilities. And both Gen. John Craddock and Vice Adm. James Stavridis have served brilliantly as senior military assistants to the secretary of defense.

Two other great military leaders, Gen. James Jones, current Supreme Allied Commander Europe, and Adm. Edmund Giambastiani, current vice chairman of the Joints Chief of Staff, both also served as senior military assistants to secretaries of defense and gained invaluable experience by witnessing the civilianpolicy-making process up close. Only the best are given such an opportunity to gain this invaluable perspective and this experience serves the nation well.

How Senate committee members treat the two gentlemen before them next week will convey to other military officers in line behind them the degree of the futility of sacrificing financial gain and family stability, in order to hold challenging positions for our country's well-being.

Yes, the Senate should study the candidates closely. But the Senate has no place pillorying them for decisions they don't make or policies they don't construct. And as difficult as it may be for some, it wouldn't hurt if diligent questioning was also relevant and respectful.

We expect our military officers to sacrifice self-interest for country. We should accept no less from our senators.

A Vote For A Smarter Census (NYT)

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

The Census Bureau has stubbornly rebuffed critics who argue that the nation's prison inmates should be counted at their homes instead of where they are serving time. But a persuasive new report from the National Research Council makes the current method difficult to defend. The Census Bureau commissioned the report, which deals with residency rules in general. In one of its most important findings, the report says that the practice of counting inmates at prisons sometimes distorts the political process and "raises legitimate concerns'' about "equity and fairness in the census."

Prison inmates are stripped of the right to vote in all but two states. But state lawmakers often treat them as "residents" of their prisons when drawing legislative maps, to help underpopulated districts raise their numbers. That shifts political influence from the densely populated urban districts where inmates actually live to the sparsely settled rural areas where prisons are typically built.

The report says that the question of residency should be decided on a case by case basis. It recommends that the Census Bureau gather information on time spent in prison and expected date of release. The bureau could then differentiate between a prisoner serving a lengthy sentence and one who is due to return home within a few years.

Questionable and incomplete state and prison records are a clear obstacle to this fairer system, and the report proposes that the Census Bureau undertake a research program to unravel those problems. It also suggests a sensible interim remedy. The bureau could make it easier for lawmakers to remove inmates from the count altogether, by publishing detailed, block-level counts of prison populations. That would also allow voters to keep watch on redistricting committees that now deliberately draw legislative districts around prisons, thus masking population shortfalls and cheating voters in other parts of the state.

Markets Shift Into Record-setting Gear (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 18, 2006

NEW YORK — Round up those rally caps. Chill the champagne. Glue your eyes to the ticker tape. Blue-chip stocks may soon slay the bear.

Six years, eight months and three days after etching a record close of 11,722.98 into the history books, the Dow Jones industrial average starts the week just 162 points shy of topping that.

If it succeeds, it will erase all of the 37.8% loss it suffered during the 2000-2002 bear market, a painful period on Wall Street that shook investors' faith in stocks.

"We can break out to new '06 highs and even to new all-time highs," says Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management.

In May, the Dow came within 81 points of a new, post-crash peak but was thwarted by a nasty global sell-off caused by fears of interest rates tightening around the globe. But in recent weeks, the "twin worries" of a potential recession and runaway inflation have receded, says John Forelli, portfolio manager at Independence Investments. That angst has been replaced by a growing belief among investors that the Federal Reserve will succeed in slowing the economy without killing it.

The idea of a not-so-hot, not so-cold economy favored by investors is gaining traction, he says.

The mood shift on Wall Street is being driven by a few key trends, including:

•A belief that the Fed chairman's forecast is playing out. When the Fed decided not to raise its target for short-term rates in August after 17 boosts, Fed chief Ben Bernanke based that decision on the belief that a slowing economy would relieve inflationary pressures. He also noted that if energy prices retreated, it would also help abate price pressures.

He's been right. A barrel of crude has dropped to $63.33, or 17.8% from its July 14 high of $77.03. Readings on inflation have also stabilized after spikes earlier in the year. Friday, an inflation gauge that tracks consumer prices rose 0.2% in August, below forecasts. "What the chairman told us would happen," Paulsen says, "is coming to pass."

•Relief that consumers are still shopping. Fears of a severe consumer slowdown due to $3 gas have yet to materialize, helped in part by relief at the pump. Retail sales numbers out last week show a customer still willing to spend, says Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader.

•A feeling that the Fed is done. Odds for a post-pause rate increase by the Fed are falling. "The Fed is out of the way for a while. That is our thinking," says Forelli. Still, Forelli says, a new Dow record "is not the new buy signal." The real time to buy, he says, will be three months before the Fed starts lowering rates. "But," he says, "we are not sure when that will be."

Day Of The Dow? Blue Chips Again Close In On Record (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

As fall officially begins this week, investors are hoping they won't see a repeat of the spring.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average in May pulled within about 80 points of its record high, only to tumble. It was off more than 936 points, or 8%, by the time it bottomed a month later. Many shareholders took the spring peak as a chance to book profits rather than stick around for even heftier gains to top the Dow's all-time high reached in January 2000.

After a solid rise last week, the blue-chip average is once again within striking distance of the high now just 162 points away. The Dow gained 168.66 points last week, or 1.5%, to 11560.77, leaving it up 7.9% on the year. A pullback in energy prices and fresh data showing little inflation in the U.S. economy helped spur the rally.

Given the Dow industrials' earlier miss, most Wall Street pros aren't touting the prospects for a record too loudly this time around. But while risks remain, many are upbeat about the type of big-name companies included in the 30-stock average. They also see signs that investors have become a little more willing to take risks, which could bode well for avoiding another sharp selloff.

"I don't think [a Dow record] is that tough an obstacle at this point," says Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco. "If we continue to get encouraging inflation news, that would go a long way toward making it happen."

Friday, the Labor Department reported that consumer prices, excluding volatile food and energy prices, inched up 0.2% in August, in line with analysts' expectations. The data buoyed hopes that Federal Reserve policy makers will leave their key interest-rate target unchanged when they meet Wednesday.

Crude-oil prices have plunged recently amid robust inventory data and easing geopolitical worries in major producing countries. Crude futures are off about 18% from summer highs, at $63.33 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday. That has pushed the average retail price of regular-grade gasoline down about 14% over the past month, to $2.554 a gallon, according to the drivers' organization AAA. This means consumers will have more money to spend on other things, which could boost corporate profits.

Helped by such developments, other stock indicators also have rallied, although they remain further from their records, all set in 2000. The technology-stock heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 3.2%, or 69.80 points last week, to end at 2235.59, up 1.4% on the year. It still would have to more than double from its current level to reach its record 5048.62, which was fueled by dot-com mania. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index last week rose 1.6%, or 20.95 points, to 1319.87. It is up 5.7% on the year and 16% away from its record.

Compared with its lows this summer, the Nasdaq index is up nearly 11%, beating the Dow's and S&P's gains of less than 8% from their recent troughs. So has the small-stock Russell 2000, up 8.5%.

Many investing pros interpret the relative strength of the Nasdaq and Russell 2000 as a sign that stock investors are again willing to pile into riskier stocks that aren't necessarily household names. "It's a fairly rational response to this notion of a slowing economy," says Mr. Koesterich of Barclays. "If growth is generally getting harder to come by, investors are going to be willing to pay more for the stocks where they can find it."

It isn't clear how long that trend will continue, but in the short term, a higher tolerance for risk could have some positive effect on the Dow industrials as well. At least for now, investors don't appear to be making what Wall Street calls a "rotation" from large caps into small caps, dumping one for the other.

The Dow's rise has been fueled by big gains in just a handful of stocks with company-specific news. Shares in Dow component General Motors have soared 63% so far this year, based largely on its restructuring plans. Altria Group, which accounts for the greatest chunk of the price-weighted Dow, is up 11% based on the mostly favorable outcome of some tobacco litigation and rumors of a spinoff involving its Kraft Foods unit. (Altria officials have declined to comment on specific steps it might take.)

AT&T is up 30% this year, but that is after declining nearly 50% over the previous five years. And Hewlett-Packard shares are up 26% but have been hindered recently by a scandal involving the way a subcontractor obtained telephone records in an investigation of leaks from the company's board of directors.

Strategist Jack Caffrey of J.P. Morgan Private Bank believes investors are still mostly in a defensive mode, which means they will continue to buy shares in big, multinational firms that are perceived as safe. He says the Dow could head higher, although he steers clear of calling for a record.

"If I'm right in terms of why these names go up, then I'm happy," he says. "If it hits a record, well, then double kudos. But that's not my focus."

One risk facing the Dow is that some unexpected economic development -- perhaps a steeper selloff in energy -- could upset the gradual economic slowdown that much of Wall Street is hoping for.

Most strategists believe a so-called Goldilocks economy -- one that's not too hot, not too cold -- would be the best scenario, offering ample room for stocks to head higher. But if inflation gets out of control, or if the economy teeters into recession, such an outcome could be upset.

Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management, thinks the dollars consumers are saving at the fuel pump will flow toward other purchases. In turn, he thinks that will spur the Fed to increase rates again to slow the economy, perhaps spooking stock investors. Higher interest rates can crimp corporate profits by boosting borrowing costs and also deter consumer spending.

Dow Nudges Peak Of Six Years Ago (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

The US stock market is finally nearing the peak levels it reached in 2000 - before a recession, terrorist attacks, and surging oil prices exacted a toll on American financial wealth.

As bull markets go, this one has been slow and faltering, but the comeback is nearly complete.

In the past two months, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has jumped about 8 percent. It's welcome news for investors, but more broadly it reflects a vote of confidence for America's economy at a delicate time.

Some economists worry about a possible recession, especially if the housing market stumbles badly. Others fear that inflation will persist. But the stock market is riding on hope of a more moderate outcome: that the economy can continue growing, if perhaps more slowly, as a housing boom fades and inflationary forces diminish. A recent drop in oil and gasoline prices has bouyed those hopes.

"The background in the economy is pretty good," says Michael Cosgrove, who publishes the Econoclast, a market newsletter based in Dallas. If it stays that way, he says stocks could hit new highs and "we could have a pretty good run in 2007."

If this week's performance matches last week's, the Dow Jones Industrial Average will push through a kind of millennial milestone - the 11722.98 peak reached on Jan. 14, 2000.

The widely watched index of 30 major stocks closed last week at 11560.77, just 162 points or 1.4 percent away from matching its old record. The broader Standard & Poor's 500 stock index was still about 10 percent off its early-2000 level.

Analysts are divided over just how far the current bull run might go. Some say a string of record corporate profits is bound to end as the economy cools. Others say the presence of such bearish sentiment could provide a backdrop for some good gains.

"There's a pretty well-rehearsed bearish story out there," says Max Bublitz, chief strategist of Seneca Capital Management, an investment firm in San Francisco. But that story, he says, is "a little shopworn."

His forecast is for solid but unexciting gains in the short term and next year.

"What we are is kind of defensively bullish," he says. He reckons the S&P 500 index could end this year at around 1360 and next year at 1450, for a price gain of about 9 percent in 15 months.

The bearish view points to a range of challenges: a likely slowdown in corporate profits, uncertainty about the economy and inflation, past history of market declines during the fall months, and concern about US elections or flash points in the Middle East.

Factors such as those have been holding investor sentiment in check. In one way, that could be good news. Stock prices often "climb a wall of worry," in Wall Street- jargon, when investors gradually overcome a pessimistic trading environment to generate marked gains.

By contrast, strong bullish sentiment can be a sign of a market reaching its upper limit.

There's certainly been no such frenzy in this bull market, which will celebrate its fourth birthday in October, according to Standard & Poor's. The bull began its upward climb late in 2002 as the economy was struggling to find its feet after the dotc om stock bust and the Sept. 11 attacks. After a sharp initial rise of nearly 30 percent in 2003, US stocks have risen slowly even as corporate profits have soared.

Normally, over the long term, share price gains are closely related to corporate profits, which in turn depend heavily on the performance of the US and world economy.

But stocks hit such a high peak in 2000 that it has taken a long time to reestablish equilibrium.

"We think that the market's fairly valued," says Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at S&P in New York. "In this period of increased risk, investors are not willing to pay up for stocks."

Standard & Poor's forecasters predict that the S&P 500 will end the year at 1315, slightly below its Friday close.

At that level, the stocks will be valued at about 15 times their actual earnings for the calendar year.

S&P expects its index, which covers 500 of America's largest companies, to gain about 9 percent in price next year.

"I'm a single-digit bull," not a raging bull, says Mr. Stovall.

Indeed, he acknowledges that a record string of 17 quarters of double-digit earnings growth by the companies in the S&P index may be nearing its end. Perhaps two more quarters of such gains remain.

Richard Bernstein, chief strategist at the investment house Merrill Lynch, talks of an outright "profits recession" next year, with earnings growth turning negative for a time as companies face a cooler economy.

The firm recommends that investors devote a bit less of their money to stocks than usual - 50 percent instead of 60 percent - with the remainder in bonds and cash. Mr. Bublitz, by contrast, recommends putting more like 65 percent in stocks.

Amid the debate over where the market will head next, some recent economic news has been reassuring. An inflation report on Friday was subdued, offering hope that the Federal Reserve won't have to raise interest rates when it meets this week - and that the Fed's rate-tightening may have ended.

But Mr. Cosgrove, the Dallas economist, cautions that when the S&P 500 index is adjusted for inflation, it is still only halfway back to its 2000 peak. Stocks remain the best place to invest, he says, but the decade may be done before the S&P's price is again at its inflation-adjusted 2000 level.

Rates Not Expected To Go Up This Week (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve is expected to leave short-term interest rates unchanged when it meets Wednesday, given recent signs of moderating inflation and growth.

A market that bets on future Fed moves was pricing a 90% chance that the central bank will stand pat this week for the second straight meeting. But there is less agreement about the Fed's long-term strategy.

John Silvia, Wachovia's chief economist, says that while inflation is higher than the Fed would prefer, recent signs of moderating prices give the Fed room to sit tight on rates to get a better sense of where the economy is headed.

“If housing deteriorates faster, they may (cut rates) in the first quarter,” Silvia says. “If housing stabilizes and the rest of the economy picks up, they may raise rates. … It's that open.”

After 17 quarter-point rate increases from June 2004 to June 2006, the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee voted in August to stand pat, leaving its target for short-term rates at 5.25%.

Though core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy prices, has been running above the Fed's informal comfort zone of 1% to 2%, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and other officials have said in speeches and statements they expect a slowing economy to reduce price pressures.

There is some evidence that's happening. On Friday, the Labor Department said consumer inflation was 0.2% in August, down from July's 0.4% jump. Excluding food and energy, prices rose 0.2%, the same as in July, and are up 2.8% in the past 12 months. Light, sweet crude has fallen sharply from its July high of $77.03 a barrel, easing inflationary pressure from energy prices. U.S. crude prices settled at $63.33 Friday in New York trading.

"So far, it looks like everything is playing according to the script that (Bernanke) laid forth," says Dan Jester, economist at Economy.com.

Jester predicts the Fed will hold pat into next year but adds there are big risks to the outlook.

Those risks have economists and Fed officials divided about the course of policy down the line. Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker voted against the August pause and warns that inflation, mainly from wage pressure, is building.

But Roger Kubarych of international bank HVB says declining factory output could mean the slowdown is broader than expected. The Fed reported Friday that industrial output fell 0.1% in August, with manufacturing activity flat and declines in mines and utilities.

How Stock Options Muddle The Relationship Among Wages, Corporate Profits And Inflation (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Scorekeepers at the Commerce Department last month discovered that American workers were earning far more than previously estimated -- and that created an economic puzzle.

The new data were out of step with other measures showing sluggish wage growth, a factor in widespread worker dissatisfaction turning up in the polls. And the increased income wasn't matched by more production -- that is, in gross domestic product -- as it should have been.

Solving this puzzle is important for understanding how well American workers and companies are doing and whether rising wages pose an inflation threat.

The answer appears to be stock options, a growing part of compensation for top-end workers. Accounting for them properly has been a major source of controversy for companies. Now it is complicating the government's economic accounting, as well.

The Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis, which keeps the nation's GDP books, treats profits from the exercise of options as labor income. But options aren't counted in most other measures of wages. So the BEA reports -- which are important both to markets and the Federal Reserve -- may be overstating the extent of wage pressure, and, for related reasons, at least temporarily understating profits.

Here is what's going on:

Last month, the BEA declared that labor income for all Americans in the first half was an annualized $95 billion, or 1.3%, more than it had estimated just a month earlier. This suggested Americans were flush with cash, welcome news for those worried about a slowing economy, but it also raised inflation alarm bells.

From 2001 to 2004, the productivity of American workers -- the amount they produced for each hour on the job -- rose enough so that companies could pay somewhat higher wages without raising prices. The new data changed that benign picture. They showed that business compensation per employee-hour soared almost 8% in the year through June. Adjusted for higher productivity, labor costs jumped 5%, a near six-year high.

But something didn't seem right. That jump in labor costs should have squeezed profit margins, yet margins are at a 40-year high. Plus, the 8% rise in hourly compensation far outstripped better-known measures of labor costs. The Labor Department's employment-cost index -- which includes hourly wages, benefits and bonuses -- rose just 3% in the same period. The weekly wage of workers at the statistical middle rose only 2.5%.

Adding to the mystery was the economic-textbook fact that Americans' income -- wages, benefits, profits, etc. -- is supposed to equal the value of what they produce. But after the revisions, gross domestic income was rising much faster than GDP. The two seldom match perfectly, but the divergence was striking.

The likely explanation: stock options. The income earned when employees cash in stock options is counted in both gross domestic income and the Labor Department's productivity-adjusted labor-cost measures, but not in most of the other wage measures.

"The stock market was strong in the first quarter, so that suggests probably quite a bit of stock-option exercise," says Brent Moulton, associate BEA director for national economic accounts. Because higher-paid employees are more likely to have stock options, this helps explain why the advance in labor income doesn't reflect the average worker's experience.

Stock options also might have led the BEA to overstate profits, and thus gross domestic income. Here's why: Corporations keep separate books for shareholders and for the Internal Revenue Service. The BEA uses the latter to measure profits.

The two treat stock options differently. When reporting profits to shareholders, companies must expense only the fair value of the option on the day it was granted. That's usually quite low (unless the option was backdated, but that's another story).

But when reporting profits to the IRS, the company may expense the (usually) far-higher value of the option the day it was exercised. So in periods of heavy options exercise, shareholder profits will be higher than taxable profits.

"For wages and salaries, we now have very accurate data," Mr. Moulton says, thanks to speedier access to unemployment-insurance data, which track both regular wages and options. For corporate profits, though, the agency relies a lot on reports to shareholders. Because these generally exclude full options expense, the BEA must estimate it. The BEA must wait as long as a year for the annual reports for the details on option expense, and two years for comprehensive IRS tabulations.

"We sometimes can get quite large revisions when we get the IRS data," Mr. Moulton says. It is "a possibility" that profits will be revised down when BEA gets the complete detail, he says.

If options expense has squeezed profits, is that a problem for inflation? Probably not. Corporations don't think of stock-option expense as ordinary labor compensation, says Robert Willens, a tax-and-accounting expert at Lehman Brothers. Option expense is "dependent on how the stock does, which is sort of out of the company's or the employee's control."

Thus, investors and the Fed are likely to discount swings in the BEA labor-cost measures once they figure out they have more to do with swings in the stock market than anything else. The bottom line: Wage increases, while accelerating, aren't flashing a warning sign.

Democrats Bolster Economic Message (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

Forced to play defense on national security for the third election year in a row, Congressional Democrats have been huddling in recent days to try to sharpen their attacks on the one issue they believe puts Republicans on the run: the economy.

“We’ve been aggressively pushing back on these national security issues that we know are on their turf,” said a senior Democratic aide. “Now we want to go on our turf.

“We’ve got to go on the offensive and keep our eye on the ball — and that’s the economy.”

While the economy has long been a central focus of both the Democratic and Republican election-year platforms, Democrats in both the House and Senate have been working behind the scenes to redouble their efforts to draw attention to the issue.

Democrats in both chambers say they cannot sideline their economic message, even as they attempt to battle a powerful GOP political machine that’s trying to paint them as weak on terrorism.

Privately, Democrats say they believe they can tap into voters’s anxieties about economic security just as effectively as the Republicans play into Americans’ fears about their safety at home.

“Bush and the Republicans have clearly tried to keep us focused on national security, and while Democrats are going to hit back hard, we also have to make sure we get them to play on a field that’s favorable to us,” said a high-level House Democratic staffer. “We have to be able to walk and chew gum at the same time.”

Sen. Ron Wyden (Ore.) said Democrats have been talking about the economy “every step of the way” but acknowledged that Republicans, armed with the megaphone of the White House, recently have been able to define “the entire agenda” around the issue of fighting terrorism.

But, Wyden added, "we don't take a back seat to anybody" on national security, and will fight "strenuously" to further the Democratic agenda on the economic front.

"Yes, they have the bully pulpit to talk about security, but that's the only issue they have," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.). "In all other areas, they have essentially been failures."

Democratic lawmakers and aides say they believe the 2006 elections will turn on several factors, but in many of the top competitive races across the country — including contests in states such as Michigan, Ohio, New York, Indiana and Kentucky — the economy is likely to be the driving issue. And internal and external polling suggests that the economy remains the No. 1 concern on most voters' minds this cycle, even behind the Iraq War, those Democratic sources said.

The Democratic House aide said while the party may be able to make gains on Nov. 7 on the GOP's handling of the war by itself, the Democrats' stance on the economy is the issue that will bring the party across the goal line.

"We're not going to win 15 seats on the war in Iraq," the staffer said.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), running for her second Senate term, said the economy is the issue atop Michigan voters' minds, calling it "the No. 1 focus of everyone in my state." And while national security is important to her constituents, she said, the 2006 election "is all about jobs."

Democrats acknowledge they aren't inventing a new economic message, nor are they laying out new proposals with just seven weeks until Election Day. But they are planning to once again ramp up the number of media events, floor speeches and legislative maneuvers where they press key economic issues, including a minimum-wage increase, Social Security protection, college affordability, Medicare prescription drug coverage, the extension of certain tax provisions beneficial to the middle class and energy policy reform.

The latter has lost much of its urgency now that gas prices have started to fall in recent weeks, something Democrats acknowledge does neutralize one of their top selling points to voters. Democrats plan to modify their message, however, with an argument that gas prices remain unstable because the United States remains too dependent on foreign oil and hasn't done enough to invest in alternative energy supplies.

Wyden added that concerns about the price at the pump haven't gone away, saying, "It's clear that gas prices are going to be on a roller coaster" for sometime to come, and Democrats effectively can argue that the GOP has "made no progress" addressing the cause.

Senate and House Democrats, in session for about two more weeks, are calling their final push a "dual track" that counters the GOP on national security while holding a series of events to drive home an argument that Republicans have stretched the middle class too thin with failed economic policies.

"We've got to talk about it," Hoyer said. "Our folks are focused on our [election platform], 'Six for '06,' many of which are involved with real security, but the rest are focused on jobs, health care, energy independence. We'll do it in the near term. We'll engage immediately."

Republicans remain comfortable using national security as the key issue this fall, and they don't think the Democrats can stop that momentum, no matter what strategy they use.

"Wait, is the economy yet another 'new direction' for the Democrat leadership?" asked one senior Republican staffer, poking fun at the minority's election-year slogan. "Good luck. Gas prices are down, jobs and wages are up and security is still the top concern."

Still, Democrats are pressing ahead. The plan is to devote this week's House Democratic Caucus session to the party's two-track economic and national security strategy and message, and the party is organizing a series of upcoming events on the economy, including a Member-driven "wage forum" at the end of this week.

Senate Democratic leaders, in the meantime, have called on their Caucus to put the economy back in full focus, telling Senators in a memo Friday that they cannot waste any time pushing the Democrats' two-part battle plan on national security and the economy.

The leadership memo, sent to Senate Democratic staff, said that "while Iraq may be high among the concerns of the American people, it is a distant reality in comparison to the day to day challenges many families face filing their gas tanks, paying for college, saving for retirement and securing a job."

"Given Republican failures, it would be a mistake for us to shift the economy to the back burner as we continue our offensive on terrorism and security," the letter stated.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) took to the floor Friday to set the tone for his Caucus on the upcoming economic offensive, chastising the Republican Congress "for blocking middle-class tax relief" and making the case for extending a series of tax provisions designed to help different segments of the country.

Democrats are hoping that on Election Day, the public will view them as the protector of the middle class and agree with their argument that the GOP is to blame for job losses, wage stagnation, rising health care costs and fluctuating gas prices. But Democratic lawmakers emphasize they have to keep reminding voters of that.

"Most people understand this economy is Bush's economy," said Sen. Byron Dorgan (N.D.). "We have to defend ourselves on security, regrettably, but we are very intent on making certain America knows the series of things we have proposed with respect to the economy is very different than [what] the Republicans" have proposed.

Republicans Gain In Midterm Polls (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Republicans appear to be gaining on the Democrats in the 2006 midterm campaign because of growing confidence in the economy, falling gas prices and President Bush's sustained political offensive on the terrorist threat, according to pollsters and campaign strategists.

The most significant political movement in the past week or two has been in the battle for control of Congress. National preference polls on the so-called "generic ballot" question -- which party's candidate voters say they would choose -- show Republicans have narrowed the once-substantial lead Democrats held and are now trailing them by three percentage points, independent pollster John Zogby said Friday.

Mr. Zogby credited the Republican Party's sudden political turnaround to "the president's focus on the war on terrorism, a rebound among his own base," and the Democrats' failure to lay out a clear plan of their own on "how are we're going to get out of Iraq and what they would do about terrorism that's better than the Republicans."

Democrats "are not giving their Democratic base what it needs to hear on those issues," Mr. Zogby said. "Republicans are severely wounded. The Democrats should be crushing them, and they are not."

Top election forecasters have pointed to an anti-Bush and anti-Republican "wave" that they predict will return the Democrats to majority power in the House, but Mr. Zogby said, "I don't see the landslide that others are seeing. That doesn't mean it can't materialize, but as of today, it's not happening and this is mid-September."

Some pollsters, such as Gallup, still show the Democrats enjoying larger, 12-point leads in the generic surveys. But Mr. Zogby's numbers mirror a tightening in several other voter-preference polls, including a Fox News poll of likely voters, and what campaign strategists and political reporters say they are seeing in the battleground states.

The Republican Party's improving polls coincide with a number of positive developments on the economic front that Republicans hope will further lift their political prospects in November. The price of oil dropped to nearly $62 a barrel Friday from a high of $77 last month, as gasoline prices continued their descent to a national average of $2.62 per gallon, though many battleground states were reporting lower prices for regular.

Some of the lowest averages included Iowa, $2.32; Indiana, $2.36; Missouri and Ohio, $2.25; Minnesota, $2.35; Michigan $2.37; and Kentucky, $2.34.

As gas prices fell, the stock market was rising, with the Dow Jones industrial average soaring to 11,560 Friday, 162 points from its all-time high, that boosted worker pensions -- and a consumer confidence survey showed Americans were "in a decidedly more optimistic mood," the Ipsos poll reported Friday.

The Republicans' improving poll numbers were also reflected in a number of tighter House and Senate races, while a separate Zogby poll showed that Republicans in three high-profile Senate races -- in New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Ohio -- had improved their poll numbers significantly in just the past week or two.

Much of the party's gain was the result of Republicans coming home to their party as Mr. Bush focused on the issues that most deeply divide the country -- Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"The base is finally coming around. Democratic intensity has been strong for the last year, but Republican intensity all of a sudden has increased," said Republican campaign strategist John Brabender, who is advising Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania in his re-election campaign.

"Some of the positive things that are happening in the economy are starting to cause some excitement among Republicans," Mr. Brabender said.

"We're seeing a tightening up in the congressional races, too, in the last 10 days. The president is putting out a much more targeted message, talking about the security of the country. For the first time, he's playing more offense than defense and that's helping Republicans," he said.

Get over it

"Stop apologizing, already," wrote John Hinderaker of Power Line yesterday.

"Now Pope Benedict says he's 'deeply sorry' that he offended Muslims. Meanwhile, no Muslim leader has been reported apologizing, or even expressing regret over, the murder of an Italian nun in Somalia. Witnesses to the murder say it 'appeared to be linked' to Muslim hysteria over the Pope's speech; those witnesses spoke 'on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals.' Reprisals? From members of the Religion of Peace? Why on earth would they be worried about reprisals?"

"The Pope has nothing to apologize for, and the last thing he should do is chase after Muslim spokesman with an ever-more-abject series of apologies. They can't be satisfied ... . There is a fundamental conflict here between many Muslim leaders, who demand that no one say anything about Islam except as approved by them, and the West, which recognizes freedom of speech. Pope Benedict serves neither himself nor the West when he appears to recognize as legitimate Muslim demands for a veto on all discussion of their religion and their place in the world. The Pope's message to Muslims should not be an apology; it should be: Get over it."

Self-absorbed affairs

"Why is the left afraid to face up to the threat of radical Islam?" asked Bret Stephens of the Wall Street Journal Online yesterday.

"Here's a puzzle: Why is it so frequently the case that the people who have the most at stake in the battle against Islamic extremism and the most to lose when Islamism gains -- namely, liberals -- are typically the most reluctant to fight it?" Mr. Stephens added. "An instinct for pacifism surely goes some way toward explaining the left's curious unwillingness to sign up for a war to defend its core values."

Mr. Stephens later concludes: "Whatever else distinguishes Islamism from liberalism, both are remarkably self-absorbed affairs, obsessed with maintaining the purity of their own values no matter what the cost ... Liberal beliefs deserve to be protected and fought for. A liberalism that abandons its own defense to others does not, something liberals everywhere might usefully dwell on during this season of sad remembrance."

Tsk-tsk, tut-tut

Heavy-duty Democratic donor George Soros conceded on CNN yesterday that his claim made in his new book "The Age of Fallibility: Consequences of the War on Terror" -- that "the Bush administration and the Nazi and communist regimes all engaged in the politics of fear" -- was dicey, at best.

"Maybe I did go over the line. But I think that on the whole, my assessment is balanced," Mr. Soros insisted to host Wolf Blitzer, later saying, "But I should have probably kept it to myself."

Mr. Blitzer observed, "I guess you acknowledge you went over the top."

Not too shabby

"President Bush is receiving his highest job-performance numbers in a few months," according to a Harris poll of 1,004 adults surveyed between Sept. 8 and 11 that was released yesterday.

According to the respondents, 12 percent said Mr. Bush's job performance was "excellent," 27 percent felt it was "pretty good" and 22 percent deemed it "fair." Thirty-eight percent said it was "poor."

Tending the fires

The America of yesterday has vanished and the America of tomorrow holds promise of becoming a land our parents would not recognize," cautions Pat Buchanan in the September edition of the American Conservative magazine, declaring that the nation "rose from kin and culture, not an abstract proposition."

Mr. Buchanan later continues, "Before Americans ever adopted a creed, Americans were a people and a nation. Those who equate that creed with the nation rewrite that history to convert America into something she never was: an imperial democracy imposing her ideology on a resisting world, to the ruin of the Republic she was meant to be. And they will turn America into something she cannot survive becoming: a multicultural, multiethnic, multilingual Tower of Babel."

"If we are a creedal nation, united by a commitment to democracy, equality and liberty, with a mandate and a mission to impose those ideas and ideals on mankind, we shall have a foreign policy like that of George W. Bush. But if we are a traditional nation, our national interests will be traditional: the defense of the land and the preservations of the lives and liberty of our people."

Fit to print?

Beginning today, the New York Times begins a campaign to convince the public that it's still the newspaper of record, even in the post-Jayson Blair era. The paper has inaugurated a new "branding campaign" for itself which it calls "These times demand the Times."

The marketing blitz will use 30- and 60-second TV spots to highlight how the news is reported while showcasing select reporters and columnists with "vignettes of their personal stories."

"Journalism is everything to the New York Times," observed spokeswoman Alyse Myers.

Bubba yes, Scooter no

Some conservatives wonder if they should defend the honor of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby in charges related to the Valerie Plame matter when they previously called for the impeachment of President Clinton on charges of perjury.

"Unlike Libby, Clinton was not indicted despite overwhelming evidence of his actionable lies and obstructions. Indeed, Clinton's offenses went so far as lying under oath during a deposition overseen by a federal judge, who later held him in contempt of court," pointed out Mark Levin on National Review Online yesterday.

"Clinton never challenged the judge's holding. During the course of that sworn deposition, he also knowingly lied to his attorney and knowingly allowed his lawyer to submit an affidavit at the deposition he knew to be false and, in fact, helped to concoct," he wrote.

"Clinton's lies had nothing to do with issues of recollection or confusion, but were both overt and conspiratorial -- including suborning perjury. Clinton led the cover-up, and Clinton sought to fix the sexual-harassment lawsuit filed against him," Levin continued.

"Unlike Libby, Clinton was the subject of the investigation. Libby was a bit player. Clinton had every reason to lie and cover-up his conduct as both the Paula Jones and Monica Lewinsky matters would be politically devastating and expose him to civil liability. Libby had no reason to conceal anything about his discussions with reporters as those discussions were not criminal and, as we now know for certain, he was not part of some White House cabal to destroy Valerie Plame, as critics have long (and falsely) asserted."

What To Expect Over The Next Seven Weeks (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

It's a good idea to try to anticipate the ups and downs of this election cycle's stretch run, so when the inevitable stories about a Republican "surge" hit the newspapers, you won't be taken completely by surprise.

DOJ_NMG_0063845

First, this is the kind of cycle when long-shot challengers suddenly appear, even as late as mid-October. If the national environment doesn't change, Republican seats previously taken for granted could show up as vulnerable in late polling, as the Democrats experienced with then-Rep. Dan Rostenkowski's Illinois district in 1994.

But since polling across the country shows that Democratic voters already have rallied to Democratic candidates, some of these surprisingly close polls simply may reflect the Democratic generic vote in the district rather than a Democratic challenger's strength.

Democrat Charlie Brown, for example, who is challenging Rep. John Doolittle in California's 4th district, has a poll showing him running virtually even with the GOP incumbent. But while Doolittle has loads of personal problems, his district is heavily Republican.

More important, Brown, a career military man, has the warmth of a second-degree frostbite. And that's before you get to the contradictory and confusing way he talks about issues and his personal philosophy. So once Doolittle starts to spend his substantial resources on beating up Brown, the challenger's prospects are likely to dim.

I'm certainly not suggesting that all of the late-developing races will be mirages, only that it's wise not to overreact to news of "surprises." Take a deep breath, check them out and look for reasons not to take them at face value (especially if you want them to be true). If, after being as skeptical as you can be, you still think a "surprise" looks interesting, then you can start getting excited.

Second, beware of all national surges. And remember: Journalists always want a horse race, not a blowout.

I've been doing this long enough to know that in pretty much every election cycle, there is talk, invariably sometime in October, that one party or the other is "surging." In 1994, for example, the last time a truly significant partisan wave hit, there were reports in October of a Democratic surge.

Back then, Democrats expected to hold control of the House of Representatives until the Earth fell into the sun, so they waited throughout the summer and fall for the inevitable point at which Democratic candidates strengthened in the polls. That point never came, but it didn't stop a flurry of media reports in October that a Democratic surge was under way.

An article in the Oct. 28, 1994, Los Angeles Times, for example, asserted that "there are signs of subtle shifts in public sentiment and political strategy that suggest Democratic Party loss[es] on Nov. 8 might not be as severe as many experts predicted."

The reports of a Democratic rebound were so widespread that the lead in my own pre-election newsletter that year asserted that I could find no surge in my reporting. I wouldn't have done that if I hadn't been forced to address the "surge" hysteria.

The likeliest culprit for starting a premature, or totally incorrect, surge panic this year is a national poll that reports on a dramatic closing of the generic ballot or a spike in the president's job ratings. That's likely to lead the Republican National Committee and the two federal campaign committees to send out a flurry of buoyant e-mails.

Mind you, I'm not ruling out improved prospects for Republicans. Maybe the White House's efforts to redefine the elections as a choice on national security will prove at least partially successful, or maybe an event or a news story will change the political discussion. But I'd be wary about buying talk of a "surge" until I saw multiple national polls showing a fundamental shift in opinion or until district-level and state-level polls in competitive contests show Republican candidates doing better.

I know this will be hard to believe, but some of the people who talk about politics or conduct polls want to grab as many headlines as they can, and they may create a surge frenzy, or jump on a surge bandwagon, merely to promote themselves and get quoted.

Third — and this doesn't contradict my last warning — don't be surprised if there is some normal "firming" of the GOP base in the next six weeks that helps GOP candidates in Republican-leaning districts. In fact, I'm expecting it.

I've been struck by the unusually early firming of the Democratic vote, which has resulted in some Democratic candidates for Congress exceeding their name identification in the ballot test by 10 points or even 20 points.

Early polls showed independent voters so disproportionately Democratic that it's likely some of them, who usually vote Republican, will slide back into the GOP column. And some Republican and conservative voters remain undecided, as in the Tennessee Senate race I wrote about recently. Certainly some of those voters are likely to rally behind Republican candidates as Election Day nears and the prospects of dramatic Democratic gains seem more real.

No, I don't really expect most in the national media or the blogs to heed these warnings. Overreaction is a way of life for many of them. But now is exactly the time to be cautious about rumors and news. It's better to get it right than to get it first.

Niall Ferguson: The GOP Will Hang On (LAT)

Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

All those predictions of an autumn of discontent will likely go up in smoke.

WILL IT ONLY be the leaves that descend this fall? Or could some Republican legislators also end up being swept into piles and incinerated?

At first sight, the omens are good for the Dems in November's midterm elections. Gallup's national poll of voting intentions has given them a 10-point lead over the Republicans for most of the last year. The obvious explanation is gloom about Iraq, which remains the No. 1 issue in voters' minds. President Bush defended his policy trenchantly in the run-up to the fifth anniversary of 9/11, but his approval rating has improved only slightly as a result.

Then there's the economy. If that proves to be the key issue of this campaign, the Democrats look unstoppable. Voters give them a 12-point advantage when it comes to handling the economy, and twice as big a lead on Social Security. Small wonder so many of my liberal colleagues have a spring in their step.

Asked if they feel more enthusiastic than usual about voting, 56% of Democrats say they do, compared with just 43% of Republicans. For three good reasons, however, I expect the Dems to be disappointed — just as they were two years ago.

First, on closer inspection, Iraq is still far from being a vote winner for Democrats. Many Americans still believe that invading Iraq was a rational response to 9/11, even if evidence to link Saddam Hussein to the perpetrators is conspicuous by its absence. So they buy Bush's notion of Iraq as the "central front" in the war on terror. Moreover, when asked which party they trust to wage that war, they prefer the Republicans to the Democrats by a margin of 14%.

Crucially, if asked to choose between a Republican who wants to maintain troop levels in Iraq and a Democrat seeking "immediate and orderly withdrawal," 48% of voters plump for the Republican and just 41% for the Democrat. Americans may want troop reductions; they are not ready to cut and run. If the Republicans can portray their opponents as favoring withdrawal, they win the Iraq argument.

Second, despite widespread fears over the summer, the U.S. economy looks to be landing softly. Growth has slowed, not stopped. Consumption is still growing, as are earnings. Sure, inflation is up, but unemployment is down (4.7% compared with 4.9% a year ago), and crude oil prices have dropped sharply since August, easing the pain Americans feel when they fill up their cars. The stock market has bounced back since the dog days of July. The threatened real estate crash has failed to materialize, though house prices have certainly cooled.

And to appease those Americans who blame their economic difficulties on immigration, squabbling Republicans in Congress have sidelined the president's plan for a partial amnesty for illegal immigrants.

In most democratic systems, of course, that kind of internal dissension causes parties to lose credibility. But thanks to the constitutional separation of powers, party unity matters less here. Indeed, under Karl Rove's direction, the Republican Party is adopting its own strategy of separation, allowing legislators to do whatever it takes — including, if necessary, criticizing their own president — to ensure their own political survival. This is the third and most important reason to expect a non-event in November.

IT'S AN OLD ADAGE that in the United States all politics are local. That's even more true today than it was a generation ago. Gerrymandering has tended to increase the political homogeneity of most electoral districts. This in turn increases the chances that incumbents will be reelected. Once a district has a critical mass of either Republicans or Democrats, the key to victory is to mobilize the "base" of active voters. There's much less need to woo floating voters from the center, who may in any case fail to turn out on election day. This trend explains why there's less bipartisan cooperation in Congress than there used to be. It also explains why legislators don't hesitate to badmouth the president if they feel he's out of tune with local sentiment.

In one of last week's primary contests, Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee of Rhode Island comfortably saw off a conservative challenger in a primary. Chafee, deemed more palatable to general election voters in November, was backed by the national party despite being one of the party's inveterate Bush bashers.

The big question is whether or not the strategy of separation can work in two years' time, when voters have to elect a new president. It's a challenge. Separation is one thing; a split personality is another.

For the Republican candidate in '08, it might actually be better if the Democrats did well in the midterms, because a brief return to power on the Hill would expose their chronic incoherence, making the case for a Republican comeback two years down the line. That scenario, however, is not on the cards. The leaves may be falling in George Bush's America, but the Republicans look like they're hanging on.

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

Seven weeks before Election Day, roughly a dozen Senate races-a full third of this year's matches-are hotly contested. Most of the tightest races are for seats now held by Republicans, putting control of Congress's upper chamber within reach for Democrats, if everything goes their way. Here are three races that got more interesting last week:

Maryland: In a close contest, Rep. Ben Cardin beat ex-Congressman and former NAACP chief Kweisi Mfume in last week's Democratic primary. Maryland has long been dependably Democratic, but GOP Senate nominee Michael Steele, an African-American, is courting the state's sizable black community. Because the white Democratic establishment backed Cardin over Mfume, the telegenic Steele may have an opening.

Virginia: Sen. George Allen's "macaca" gaffe has cost him, with a double-digit lead over challenger Jim Webb all but evaporating, according to new polling. A navy secretary under President Reagan, Webb launched a TV ad that featured Reagan praising him. The spot provoked Allen into attack mode, with an ad spotlighting Nancy Reagan's request for Webb to pull the footage.

Pennsylvania: After debating on Meet the Press, Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is closing in on Bob Casey Jr., who once held a commanding lead. Casey is catching flak for his low-energy style-including in the nationally televised debate-and for being more anti-Santorum than pro-anything. Santorum is campaigning like a proud Republican, calling President Bush "terrific" and insisting weapons of mass destruction have been found in Iraq.

What Bush's Body Language Means (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, September 18, 2006

The President is standing face to face with NBC's Matt Lauer by the immaculate oak desk in the Oval Office, jabbing emphatically toward the Today anchorman's chest and insisting, "My job is to protect this country, Matt. And it gets second-guessed all the time by people who don't live in the United States." Lauer has interviewed Bush several times, and they have a convivial relationship, bonding about golf and bikes during breaks in the taping. But at the moment, Lauer is pressing the President on the legality of the CIA's secret detention program for accused terrorists. Lauer holds his ground on the big rug as the Commander in Chief edges forward, encroaching on his space to the point that Lauer finally puts a hand on Bush's forearm to prevent a collision. When the cameras are turned off, according to a witness, Lauer tells the President, "Whoa! I thought you were coming after me there." Aides to both men laugh. The President lightens too, but adds, "I feel really strongly about this subject."

Friends and staff members have maintained that Bush has been a Steady Eddie through the nearly ceaseless storms since his re-election, confident that history will treat him right and disinclined to sweat the day's headlines or chatter. But as he stares down one last campaign, the President suddenly seems to be all adrenaline and testosterone. It shows in his frenetic schedule and in his assertive choice of words but perhaps most especially in his body language as he tries to win over midterm voters by looking and sounding commanding--he's practically shaking voters by their lapels.

With the press, the President has been brimming over with restless energy. Rich Lowry of National Review, who was in a group of conservatives ushered onto the Oval Office couches and found the President to be "utterly self-assured," says the President nearly leaped out of his chair when he made some points. Lowry wrote that Bush untwisted what looked like a paper clip as he talked, "then twisted it around his finger until it was in a little bow." During a Rose Garden press conference, the President thrilled photographers with so many two-handed gestures--now up high, now out wide--that their motor drives could barely keep up.

During a day of chats just before the fifth anniversary of 9/11, ABC's Charles Gibson asked the President whether the nation's security would be harmed if Democrats carried the House this fall. "In my mind," Bush said, stabbing the air word by word with his pointer finger, "the Republican Party and its members are much better suited to defending this country." Then the two of them jumped into the armored Caddy. Bush leaned deeply against the Presidential Seal in the middle of the backseat as he handicapped the '06 races.

It was revealing that when Bush eulogized former Texas Governor Ann Richards last week, he saluted not just the ability of his home state's legendary political characters to "talk Texan" but also their physical presence--"people larger than life, people that could fill the stage." The President has been on just about every imaginable stage lately. He went to Capitol Hill; gave a prime-time address; held the Rose Garden news conference; invited an anchorman into his limo, an editorialist onto Air Force One and a columnist into the Oval; held an off-the-record session for conservative radio hosts; and sat down chummily with a clutch of conservative opinion writers who had favored the war in Iraq but now think more troops are needed. That was all in nine days. He's so determined to be everywhere that he even did a White House interview with CBS's Katie Couric, despite his rough history with the network and the view among many Republican operatives that she's too liberal. It was a reserved, wintry performance. When they were about to take a break and Couric joked that he had a country to run, he offered, "I've got more than one thing to do on a regular basis, on a daily basis." But this time he did not jab his finger.

2000 Redistricting Shields GOP Seats (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

One of the last lines of defense that Republicans hope will repel the Democrats' attempts to win back the House are the thicker "fire walls" they installed in their congressional districts under reapportionment.

Although Republican campaign officials think other factors will help them maintain control of the House -- including what even some Democrats say is the Republicans' stronger voter-turnout operation -- they say their earlier efforts to redraw congressional districts to account for population changes after the 2000 census will thwart many challenges on Election Day.

Three top Democratic takeover opportunities are in Republican-leaning Ohio, where a gloomy political climate has raised Democratic hopes of a major comeback in the state.

They are:

•The 15th Congressional District, where Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, a Democrat, is aggressively challenging Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce.

•The 18th Congressional District currently held by Republican Rep. Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty Friday to federal corruption charges and will not seek re-election. Republican state Sen. Joy Padgett is running against Democratic lawyer Zack Space.

All of them are on elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg's list of "pure tossups," but Republican officials said the districts have been redrawn to withstand just the kind of aggressive Democratic offensive they expect in November.

"Both the 15th and 18th district lines were changed and strengthened after the 2000 census, as was the 1st district," Ohio Republican state Chairman Bob Bennett said.

"I feel good about where we are and feel we've turned the corner, though it doesn't mean we don't have a battleground here. We do," he said.

Election analysts compare the political environment this year to that of 1974, when Democrats gained 49 House seats, or to 1994, when Republicans won 52 congressional seats and took control of the House.

But election analysts who have studied the changing political makeup of congressional districts and the increasing power of incumbency say sophisticated redistricting technology has made many more districts virtually invulnerable to all but the strongest anti-incumbent wave.

"All the available evidence in the 2002 and 2004 elections is [the Republicans] have created a fire wall, because very little moved from one side to the other. It was almost static," said Rhodes Cook, a nonpartisan election analyst.

"Democrats only have to win 15 seats to take control, but the playing field is smaller now than it was, fewer races are in play, incumbents are safer, and because of the way they've drawn the district lines, they are more fortified," he said.

"I can see powerful factors rubbing up against each other of nearly equal size, but I'm reluctant to predict a Democratic takeover, because I appreciate the Republicans' successes," Mr. Cook said. "They know how to win of late, and the Democrats don't."

Obama: Dems Need Tough Security Stance (AP-Y)

By Mike Glover, Ap Political Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., warned Democratic activists Sunday that the party must take a tougher stance on national security if it wants to succeed in the November elections.

"What Democrats have to do is to close the deal," said Obama, the keynote speaker at Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's 29th annual steak fry. "We have got to show we have a serious agenda for change."

Obama's appearance in Iowa, where precinct caucuses launch the presidential season, has raised a number of eyebrows about his intentions for a presidential run in 2008. Though only a first-term senator, Obama has burst onto the national scene.

But he wouldn't say Sunday whether he was considering a run at the White House.

"My only attentions right now are focused on '06," said Obama. "Whoever is looking toward 2008 without focusing on 2006 makes a mistake."

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner also spent Sunday afternoon at the steak fry, and left little doubt that he is looking ahead to 2008.

"You know and I know that it all starts in Iowa," Warner told the audience. "Do your part. We're going to take back the Congress this year and then we're going to take back our nation."

Warner accused President Bush of using the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to inject the issue of terrorism into the 2006 race. Warner said the strategy is proof that the GOP is nervous and trying to scare voters.

"I think Americans feel President Bush missed an opportunity on the fifth anniversary of 9/11 to bring our country together, to call us to some level of common cause and shared sacrifice," Warner told The Associated Press.

Obama said he and other Democrats want to take the nation in a different direction, but he vowed not to "demonize" Republicans. He said a carefully cast message could lure moderate Republicans who are uncomfortable with the White House's hard-line conservative stance.

"The American people are ready for change," he said. "The American people recognize the path (of) the last five years has not made us more competitive, has not opened more opportunities and has not made us safer."

Obama called the attention he has received "flattering," recalling how he was treated like a hero when he traveled to Kenya this summer to visit his father's home village. He also noted that rumors of his presidential ambitions began the day after he was elected to the Senate in 2004, when someone asked him about his plans for 2008.

"I said you'll have to wait a little while," he said.

In his speech to more than 2,000 activists gathered in a county park, Obama also warned that many voters are losing hope that the government is on their side.

"Even those of us in public life get a certain cynicism," he said. "We've got a lot of self-important leaders who are long on rhetoric and short on ideas.

For This Red Meat Crowd, Obama's '08 Choice Is Clear (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

INDIANOLA, Iowa, Sept. 17 — Senator Barack Obama insists, as always, that he is not running for president. But there are compelling clues that he is not exactly not running, either.

The most obvious was his keynote appearance here on Sunday at Senator Tom Harkin's legendary steak fry, a popular Democratic ritual in Iowa — and a prominent staging ground in this first presidential caucus state. The crowd rushed Mr. Obama when he arrived, then mobbed him for hours as other politicians wandered the fairgrounds introducing themselves and shaking hands.

But beyond his first trip to Iowa — a visit that was guaranteed to set off new speculation about his presidential ambitions — Mr. Obama is in the midst of an unconventional publicity tour of sorts. Fresh off a closely watched journey through Africa, including a stop at the home of his Kenyan-born father, Mr. Obama is about to publish a second book that supporters believe will outpace his best-seller from 1995.

With the book, titled "The Audacity of Hope," will come an October appearance on "The Oprah Winfrey Show," magazine profiles and a national speaking tour. Throughout, Mr. Obama is keeping up a full schedule of political speeches on behalf of Democrats nationwide; his fame has made him one of the most requested fund-raising guests in the party.

All of which means that, despite his efforts to coolly play down expectations for his future, Mr. Obama has allowed his already stratospheric profile to grow a little higher of late and has done less to tamp down the celebrity buzz than he did when he first arrived in the Senate last year.

"What a wonderful reception; I'm going to have to come to Iowa again," Mr. Obama said as he took the podium under a sunny sky here on Sunday afternoon in front of an estimated 3,500 people. In response, someone in the audience shouted, "Obama '08," a sentiment reflected in T-shirts and buttons featuring his name throughout the crowd in defiance of his repeated claim that he is focused on his duties as a first-term senator.

His 40-minute speech was punctuated by applause and standing ovations but also, at its most serious moments, brought the audience to a silence hushed enough for rustling trees to be heard. It focused on the importance of a Democratic victory in the 2006 midterm elections. Characteristically, he spoke in mostly moderate language.

"I don't think that George Bush is a bad man," he said. Referring to Republicans, he said, "They believe in different things."

But he touched on core Democratic themes, praising labor unions, defending the role of government and excoriating the Bush administration over the war in Iraq, the politicization of the threat of terrorism and the so-called ownership society.

If it was not a presidential stump speech, it certainly had the underpinnings of one. "Our parents and our grandparents faced greater challenges than we face, and yet somehow they were able to overcome it," Mr. Obama said. "That's the essence of America."

The trip, which had been hyped for weeks, took on greater significance when news leaked that Mr. Obama had invited along Steve Hildebrand, a political strategist who ran Vice President Al Gore's campaign in Iowa in 2000. (Advisers to Mr. Obama insisted he merely wanted an old Iowa hand at his side.) In a frenetic question-and-answer session in front of dozens of camera crews before his speech, Mr. Obama got nearly a dozen questions about the presidential campaign and only one about national security.

Tom Vilsack, the governor of Iowa, chatted easily with constituents, watching the news media crush from afar. Mr. Vilsack, who is also considering a presidential bid and recently came in fourth place in a poll of Iowa caucusgoers, played down the response to Mr. Obama, describing it as "certainly predictable." Asked whether the senator should run, Mr. Vilsack replied, "That's a question you're going to have to ask the voters," and walked away.

Mark Warner, the former Virginia governor, who is also testing the waters for a presidential campaign, made brief remarks at the start of the event, although he was barely audible from the back of the crowd amid the frenzy over Mr. Obama.

Mr. Harkin, a legendary political figure and the sponsor of the event, seemed amused by the Obama phenomenon. “Honestly, tell you the truth — I really tried to get Bono this weekend,” Mr. Harkin said in his introduction. “I couldn’t get him, so I settled for the second biggest rock star in America today.”

For all of Mr. Obama’s star appeal — a recent Newsweek article compared his arrival in Kenya to the second coming of the Messiah — he has earned a reputation for persuasive rhetoric about the role of religion in politics, which is one strand of his new book, due out Oct. 17. Unlike his original memoir, “Dreams From My Father,” an autobiographical reflection on his African father and his Kansas-born mother, the new book is a series of meditations on matters like race and family.

Books have generated speculation about a presidential race in the past. In 1995, when Colin L. Powell published “My American Journey,” it spurred months of urging for him to run for higher office. He ultimately declined.

Whether Mr. Obama decides to take his own shot at becoming the first black president, the paraphernalia, and the popular movement, designed to persuade him to do so is already in full development. His fellow senator from Illinois, Richard J. Durbin, has urged him to consider running; so has the state comptroller, Dan Hynes, who in recent weeks said that Mr. Obama “alone can restore the hope and optimism that has made this country great.”

Several people in the crowd on Sunday expressed a similar sentiment. Matt Hawkins, a 38-year-old wearing a blue “Illinois for Obama in 2008” T-shirt, pushed his way through the mass of people to meet the senator. Mr. Obama’s response left him undaunted.

“He’s telling us he’s got to pay his dues,” Mr. Hawkins said, “and we’re telling him, ‘Learn as you go.’ ”

Webb, Allen Spar Over Iraq (RTD)

By Peter Hardin

Richmond Times-Dispatch, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democratic challenger Jim Webb and Republican Sen. George Allen went to the mat over Iraq today as the increasingly unpopular war dominated their national TV debate.

"If we had the right people in the Senate there would have been more questions asked and a better policy in place in order to defeat international terrorism," Webb, a former Navy secretary, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism, we have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there," Webb said.

"I think the world's better off with Saddam Hussein not in power," Allen said, defending his vote in favor of authorizing the use of military force in Iraq.

"You can't be constantly second-guessing, Monday-morning-quarterbacking," Allen added, saying Webb had made opposition to the Iraq war -- opposition Webb voiced in advance of the war -- "the whole theme of his campaign."

Allen tried to deflect, or sidestepped, a number of pointed questions from moderator Tim Russert on the war. They included whether Allen would have voted the same way if the Senate had known Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction.

Allen also refused to take sides with either President Bush or Sen. John W. Warner, R-Va., and Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, in a GOP split over rules for CIA interrogations of terror suspects. The junior senator said he hoped to serve as a "bridge" on the issue.

"I'm with Senator Warner on this," Webb said. Warner and several Republican allies favor greater legal protections for terror suspects.

A decorated Marine combat veteran of Vietnam, Webb said the issue splits the "theorists who have never been on a battlefield" with those who have had to worry about the fate of their troops. Allen did not serve in the military.

Regarding the future U.S. role in Iraq, Webb again urged collaboration with other countries in the area who have a stake in the outcome, and said the United States has not talked to Syria or Iran.

After the debate, Allen blasted what he called "kind of a strange idea from my opponent, that we're going to count on Iran, that's also on a nuclear weapons program, to somehow be our key allies in Iraq."

With some of his questions, Russert showered embarrassment on both sides, bringing up Allen's gaffe when the Republican used an alleged racial slur to address a Webb campaign volunteer last month, and also Webb's writing in 1979 an article about women in the military, entitled, "Women Can't Fight." Both politicians have apologized.

Political scientist Robert Holsworth of Virginia Commonwealth University said both men did fairly well, and that Allen is faced with defending a position on Iraq that a majority of Americans don't support.

Webb is seeking to make the campaign a referendum on the national direction under Bush, "and Allen is simply his instrument," Holsworth said. Contact staff writer

Va. Hopefuls Spar On Terror Legislation (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Virginia Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb said Sunday that President Bush's terror-detainee legislation would weaken the Geneva Conventions and potentially subject captured U.S. soldiers to torture.

"We have to stay on the moral high ground," Webb said during a debate with his opponent, Republican Sen. George Allen, on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Allen said he has not decided whether to back Bush's plan to detain, question and prosecute suspected terrorists or another measure supported by Republican Sen. John Warner, Virginia's senior senator.

The president's measure would allow classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials and use coerced testimony.

The legislation also would revise the law that interprets the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, the treaty that sets the standard for treatment of war prisoners, so that harsh interrogations of detainees would not be questioned in c ourt.

The Senate bill requires a judge to dismiss charges if evidence cannot be shared and excludes any testimony obtained by cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

"I don't want to stop these interrogations. I'm not for torture, I'm not for waterboarding. But some of these techniques have been very helpful to us, whether they are sleep deprivation or whether it's loud music," Allen said.

"I need to be absolutely certain that what the interrogators are doing now — which is completely fine as far as I'm concerned — will not be harmed," Allen said.

Allen, who last year voted with the White House 96 percent of the time, said he needs more facts before making a decision and hopes to be "a bridge" between the rival GOP plans.

Webb said he sided with fellow war veterans — Warner, Republican Sen. John McCain and former secretary of state Colin Powell — on the issue.

Powell put himself at odds with Bush last week when he wrote in a letter to McCain: "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

In siding with his fellow combat veterans, Webb, a decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War, sharpened their differences with Allen, who has no military experience, and Bush, who served stateside in the National Guard during Vietnam.

"What you see here is a split between the theorists who have never been on a battlefield or never worn the uniform" and those who have, Webb told host Tim Russert.

Russert asked Webb about a 1979 Washingtonian magazine article, in which Webb wrote that women can't lead men in battle, and criticism from five female Naval Academy graduates who blasted Webb for it at an Allen-sponsored news conference last week.

Though Webb had issued a statement expressing regret, one of the women, Kathleen Murray, said it fell short of an apology. Russert asked Webb if a fuller apology was in order.

"I don't think it was wrong to participate in the debate at that time. It's been 27 years, it was a magazine article, and, if I may say, I am fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today," Webb said.

Russert pressed Allen on why last month he called a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent "Macaca," considered a racist slight in some cultures.

DOJ_NMG_0063853

"Tim, I made a mistake. I said things thoughtlessly. I've apologized for it, as well I should. But there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone," Allen said.

When asked about his fondness for Confederate flags and other Old South icons, Allen said, "There are a lot of things I wish I had learned earlier in life."

"The Confederate flag — as a kid, I was rebellious, antiestablishment, I still am. And I looked at the flag as a symbol of that."

Allen and Webb meet again Monday for a luncheon debate before the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce.

Allen, Webb Quarrel Over War In Iraq, Bush Policies (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

Virginia's U.S. Senate candidates clashed on national television yesterday over the war in Iraq and President Bush's leadership, offering the sharpest contrast yet in a campaign that has become central to the partisan struggle for control of Congress this fall.

Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," Republican Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger James Webb also confronted issues of race and gender and debated the use of torture in the war on terror. But the exchange largely centered on a controversial war that has become the defining issue of the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

Webb, a decorated Marine and former Navy Secretary, called the Iraq war an "incredible strategic blunder of historic proportions" and said he has lost confidence in Bush's foreign policy. He repeatedly reminded viewers that neither Bush nor Allen, a former governor, had served in combat.

"Very few people who have brought us this war have served, and very, very few of the children of these people who have brought us this war have served," said Webb, whose Marine son began a tour in Iraq this month.

Allen steadfastly defended Bush's Middle East policies, telling moderator Tim Russert that "staying the course" in Iraq means "that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender." Asked whether more U.S. troops should be sent, Allen said, "We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed."

The outcome of Virginia's contest could be critical to GOP hopes of retaining control of the Senate in a year when anger toward incumbents -- fueled in part by the Iraq war -- is tangible.

Webb, a former Republican and early critic of the war, was persuaded to challenge Allen by national Democrats and activists who believed his military background would make him the ideal candidate to tap into antiwar sentiment.

But questions about character -- including Allen's comment to a Webb campaign volunteer and allegations about Webb's view of women in combat -- have dominated a race that polls indicate has tightened.

Russert devoted his entire Sunday show to the Virginia debate and focused nearly a half-hour on the Iraq war. He grilled Allen repeatedly on the vote he and other lawmakers made authorizing the president to go to war.

"If you knew Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction, was it still worth going to war?" Russert asked.

"I stand by my vote," Allen said. "We had a choice whether to listen to the critics and do nothing and then have this world more dangerous if we were right."

Russert asked both candidates whether the $300 billion spent on the war in Iraq could have been better spent on homeland security and the war on terror.

"We have spent money on all those things," Allen said. "You can't be constantly second-guessing, Monday-morning quarterbacking."

Webb said the money would have been better spent on security. He criticized Allen and others in Congress for failing to ask tough questions about the ultimate effect of deposing Saddam Hussein.

"If we had the right people in the Senate, there would have been more questions asked," Webb said. "We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism. We have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there."

Allen said the United States should continue to consolidate its forces into four large military bases in Iraq, a proposal Webb criticized.

DOJ_NMG_0063854

Webb said the United States should begin moving troops to friendly Arab countries and seek the help of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. That drew derision from Allen, who said to reporters after the debate that the United States should not be working with "sponsors of terrorism."

Allen also lashed out at Webb, accusing him of failing to support the first Iraq war. "Heck, the French were even in favor of military action in 1991," Allen said.

Webb responded aggressively, often returning to his experience as a Marine in Vietnam. Using a line from his son, Webb said, "George Allen didn't fight in Vietnam. Even the French fought in Vietnam."

The candidates also clashed over Bush's proposed interpretation of the Geneva Conventions' provisions on interrogating enemy prisoners. Webb sided with Virginia's other Republican senator, John W. Warner, who said the president's plan would be an invitation to other countries to reinterpret the Geneva rules if they ever held U.S. soldiers.

"I'm with Senator Warner on this," said Webb, saying Bush's view is dictated by "theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on . . . who have never had to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands."

Allen declined to say how he will vote on the issue when it comes up in the Senate. But he said the United States needs to interrogate terrorism suspects effectively. "I don't want to stop these interrogations," he said. "I'm not for torture . . . but some of these techniques have been very helpful to us."

Russert devoted the second half of the show to character issues that have bedeviled both candidates in recent weeks.

His first target was Webb, who last week was assailed over an article he penned in 1979 that critics say was demeaning to women. Several female U.S. Naval Academy graduates said Webb's article arguing against women in combat helped lead to harassment against women at the school.

Webb repeated a statement he had made earlier in the week, in which he expressed regret "to the extent that my writing subjected women . . . to undue hardship." On the show, he said he regretted writing that the Naval Academy is "a horny woman's dream," adding that "if I were a, you know, a more mature individual, I wouldn't have written" that.

But he declined to go further, even after Russert said he had received a letter from one of the women indicating that Webb's statement was not good enough.

Russert then turned his attention to Allen, quizzing him on his opposition to allowing women as cadets at Virginia Military Institute and later turning to the senator's comments to a Webb volunteer of Indian descent on the campaign trail last month.

Russert aired the video of Allen calling Webb volunteer S.R. Sidarth "macaca" and of welcoming him "to the real world of Virginia."

Allen again apologized, calling the comments "a mistake." He said the word "macaca" was "just made up" and added, "There was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone."

Russert also asked Allen about having once displayed a Confederate flag and a noose. Allen said he had once seen the Confederate flag as a symbol of heritage and regional pride but now sees it as hateful.

"Through the years, I've learned and I've grown," he said.

The candidates will meet again today at a luncheon debate hosted by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce.

Russert closed the show on a light note, asking both men whether they thought their habit of chewing tobacco made them good role models for children.

Allen conceded that it probably did not. Webb noted that he doesn't chew at public events and added, "We all have our vices."

Allen, Webb Face Off On NBC (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, and his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., used a national TV debate yesterday to spar over U.S. interrogation policy and the Iraq war, part of a high-profile U.S. Senate race with issues that have come to define midterm elections across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0063855

Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. Allen said he has not decided whether to support President Bush's push to revise Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which regulates the interrogation standards of military prisoners.

Mr. Webb, 60, agreed with Republican Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia and John McCain of Arizona, two former Marines who are concerned that the president's plan to redefine the provision to deal with terror suspects would open the door to torture of U.S. troops.

"What you're seeing is a split between the theorists who have controlled so much of the policy in this administration, theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on, and who are looking at this thing in a totally different way from people who have had to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands," Mr. Webb said in the second debate between the two front-runners.

Most of the debate centered on the link between the Iraq war and the fight against international terrorism.

Mr. Allen, 54, reiterated Mr. Bush's push for the United States "to stay the course" in Iraq.

When asked what "stay the course" means, Mr. Allen said, "Staying the course is meaning we don't tuck tail and run. ... This is a central battlefront in the war on terror."

Mr. Webb disagreed, saying the United States did not go into Iraq because of terrorism, and that decision has drained the military resources needed to fight terrorism.

"We have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there," he said.

Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary, cited a report released last week by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, saying, "Saddam Hussein was not an aligned with al Qaeda -- they were natural enemies."

He said the administration must work with Iraq's neighbors on a plan that allows U.S. troops to leave without jeopardizing the region's stability.

"There are limits to what the military can do," said Mr. Webb, a Vietnam veteran. "Eventually this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment, and that's where this administration seems to have blinders."

The candidates offered separate apologies -- Mr. Allen for a statement he made in August that has raised questions about his racial sensitivity, and Mr. Webb for an article he wrote 27 years ago that has called into question his views on the role of women in the military.

Mr. Allen apologized again for calling one of Mr. Webb's staffers "macaca," the name of an Eastern Hemisphere monkey. The word is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

"I made a mistake," he said. "I said things thoughtlessly, but there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone."

His remark also led to the resurfacing of his opposition as a Virginia legislator to a state holiday for Martin Luther King and his proclamation honoring Confederate History Month.

Mr. Webb expressed regret for his 1979 article titled "Women Can't Fight," in which he described the hard-core conditions of life as an infantryman in Vietnam and said he had never met a woman "whom I could trust to provide those men with combat leadership."

Five women who graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in the 1980s said at a press conference last week that the article led to harassment of women, who were admitted to the academy for the first time in 1976.

"I don't think it was wrong to participate in the debate at that time," Mr. Webb said. "It's been 27 years. I am fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today."

Last week, Mr. Webb said he was "profoundly sorry."

After the debate, Mr. Allen's campaign e-mailed reporters a letter sent to host Tim Russert from retired Cmdr. Kathleen Murray, a 1984 graduate of the Naval Academy, in which she said Mr. Webb's apology "comes too late."

As Senator Falters, A Democrat Rises In Virginia (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — From the start, the Virginia Senate race was an emblematic campaign for 2006: combat boots vs. cowboy boots, in the inevitable shorthand.

DOJ_NMG_0063856

A highly decorated Vietnam veteran and former secretary of the Navy who opposed the war in Iraq (James Webb, Democrat) in an uphill battle against a paragon of sunbelt conservatism with national ambitions (Senator George Allen, Republican.)

But in the past month, ever since Mr. Allen's demeaning reference to a young man of Indian descent at a campaign event, this race has become more than an intriguing clash of symbols; according to the polls, it is now truly competitive.

Increasingly, Democratic strategists see Virginia as a prime target for one of the six seats they need to regain a majority. Perhaps most important for Mr. Webb, whose late-starting campaign has lagged far behind Mr. Allen's in fund-raising, the Democrat's contributions have begun to climb, advisers say. "He's got George Allen on the run in the Commonwealth of Virginia," said Bob Kerrey, former Democratic senator from Nebraska, who was rallying donors at a reception for Mr. Webb last week in New York.

In one of the sharpest exchanges of the campaign, Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen squared off on the war in Iraq on "Meet the Press" on NBC on Sunday, with Mr. Allen defending the Bush administration's policy and denouncing the "second-guessing and Monday-morning quarterbacking" of the critics. "We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed," Mr. Allen said, when asked if he would support additional troops in Iraq, "because it's essential to the security of the United States of America."

Mr. Webb responded: "I know what it's like to be on the ground. I know what it's like to fight a war like this, and either — there are limits to what the military can do. Eventually, this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment, and that's where this administration seems to have blinders. They are not talking to Syria, they are not talking to Iran, and there are ways that we can do this, move this forward."

Mr. Webb also took several digs at what he called theorists in the administration and among its allies who know combat only in the abstract. Mr. Allen, like the majority of the current Congress, did not serve in the military.

In recent days, the Allen campaign, acknowledging a newly competitive race, has gone on the attack. A Mason-Dixon poll conducted this month found Mr. Allen's lead, once in the double-digits, had shrunk, with 46 percent for Mr. Allen, 42 percent for Mr. Webb, and a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

For his part, Mr. Webb, 60, a writer and former marine who served four years in the Reagan administration, was rolling through Virginia in a camouflaged Jeep last week, driven by a buddy from Vietnam, reflecting on his long, strange political journey.

He entered the race, his first for elected office, early this year, starting with "zero dollars and no staff." He eventually won the support of national Democrats, who saw him as a compelling voice for their party on national security. He was propelled into the race, Mr. Webb said, in large part by the war in Iraq.

As he is quick to remind his audiences, Mr. Webb spoke out against an invasion early on, arguing that containment had worked in the cold war and would work, again, against Saddam Hussein. American occupation forces in Iraq would "quickly become 50,000 terrorist targets," he warned in an op-ed article in The Washington Post in September 2002. He went to see Mr. Allen to voice his concerns, and said Mr. Allen's position, essentially, was "you're asking me to be disloyal to my president."

Mr. Webb, who had voted for Mr. Allen, said he left that meeting thinking, "Boy, did I make a mistake." Mr. Allen has said he cast his vote for the war out of loyalty to the country, not the president.

The war is not an abstract issue for Mr. Webb. His son, Jimmy, 24, a lance corporal in the Marines, shipped out to Iraq this month. He wears his son's old combat boots on the campaign trail, in tribute to him and "all the people sent into harm's way."

Mr. Webb tells his audiences that the idea came from his son, who noted that Mr. Allen always wore cowboy boots, though "there are no cowboys in Virginia."

Asked at a news conference last week if he felt torn about his son heading to Iraq, given his views on the war, Mr. Webb replied: "My son is doing what our family has always done. I'm very proud of his service. Like most people in the military, we separate politics out from service to country."

Mr. Webb has not only lived but chronicled the American military tradition in novels like "Fields of Fire," films like "Rules of Engagement" and in nonfiction works like "Born Fighting," an exploration of his Scotch-Irish roots. A graduate of the Naval Academy, Mr. Webb served as a rifle platoon and company commander in Vietnam, where he was badly injured and awarded the Navy Cross and the Silver Star.

He said he was drawn to the Republicans, 30 years ago, because of their stance on national security. “Those were real issues to me, and I cared a lot about them,” he said. He worked on Capitol Hill and joined the Reagan administration in 1984 as an assistant secretary of defense, becoming Navy secretary in 1987. He resigned in a fight with his superiors over budget cuts and other issues, saying at the time, “It’s no secret that I’m not a person who wears a bridle well.”

He said he was ultimately drawn to the Democratic Party because of the tradition of Andrew Jackson and his commitment to giving average people a voice. On the campaign trail, he talks about the growth of inequality and the pressures on the middle class.

Mr. Allen, 54, a former governor and the son of a legendary coach for the Washington Redskins, has been running as an experienced leader strong on national security, focused on innovation and education and committed to what he calls Virginia values and Reaganesque conservatism on issues like cutting taxes.

His record as governor from 1993 to 1997 included tougher education standards, welfare legislation with time limits on benefits and parental notification requirements for abortions. In 2000, he defeated the Democratic incumbent, Charles S. Robb, for a Senate seat. Mr. Allen has proved a loyal ally of President Bush, a point Democrats hope to use to their advantage, given Mr. Bush’s decline in popularity. Mr. Allen is considered to be a potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, and refused to rule it out in Sunday’s debate.

But Mr. Allen was thrown badly off stride by the reaction to his comments to the college student and Webb volunteer who attended an Allen rally in southwestern Virginia. Mr. Allen has insisted that his use of the term “macaca” had no racial connotations.

Dick Wadhams, the Allen campaign manager, said the race was competitive, “no doubt about it,” but said Mr. Webb’s political inexperience, fuzziness on the issues and lack of enthusiasm for campaigning — Mr. Webb does not appear to have a high comfort level on the campaign trail — would all work in the Allen campaign’s favor. “We still have a financial advantage,” Mr. Wadhams said. “And we still have an incumbent who’s won two tough elections.”

In the past week, the Allen campaign has taken aim at Mr. Webb on two counts: highlighting his opposition, in an article he wrote 27 years ago, to women in combat and at the Naval Academy, and asserting that Mr. Webb has no right to use videotape of President Ronald Reagan praising him in a new television advertisement.

On women in combat, Mr. Webb said that he was sorry for any pain his writing had caused, that times had changed, and that he should be judged by what he did in the intervening years to expand opportunities for women.

Some Republicans worry that the growth of Northern Virginia, with its increasingly urban voters and what some pollsters say is discontent with the status quo in Washington, poses a real challenge to their party. Mr. Webb’s allies, for their part, worry he will not have enough money to hold his own against Mr. Allen on television.

The anxieties on both sides point to a central truth: Virginia, at the moment, is a very competitive race.

Straight Shooters (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, September 25, 2006

MISSOULA, MONT.-Jon Tester, the Democratic U.S. Senate candidate, fits right in amid the sea of barbecue grills and beer at this tailgating party outside the opening University of Montana football game. A burly farmer wearing a Grizzlies team T-shirt and his signature flattop haircut, Tester doesn't resemble most politicians. He's probably the only Senate candidate who took six days off from campaigning recently to harvest grain-on his farm near Big Sandy. Political observers thought it was a little crazy to give up prime campaigning time against three-term incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in one of the country's premier Senate races. But Tester just shrugs: "I'm a farmer, not a politician. I'm running to get honest representation back in Washington, D.C."

That down-home attitude is clearly appealing to many Big Sky Country voters and has Burns facing the toughest test of his career. Burns's job is also one the national Democratic Party is eyeing hungrily in its quest to gain six seats and win back the Senate. The most recent polling put Tester, president of the Montana state Senate, slightly ahead-a shocking turnabout for the incumbent.

Those poll numbers probably reflect the generally sour mood of voters nationwide, as well as the particular ethics problems facing Burns because of his relationship to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Burns thought he could count on the fact that Montana likes Republicans-especially those who bring home federal dollars. President George W. Bush carried the state 59 to 39 percent over John Kerry in 2004, and Burns has brought back billions to a state dependent on ranching and farming aid. And that still makes for a substantial advantage: Burns's campaign war chest-which is more than four times Tester's-will enable him to flood the airwaves with ads against his challenger. "A lot of this race is about who Tester is and which campaign will be successful in defining him," says Christopher Muste, a political science professor at the University of Montana in Missoula. "Everyone already knows who Burns is at this point."

Tainted money. Which may or may not be a good thing. The publicity over Burns's relationship with Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to corruption-related charges, knocked him off a clear path to an easy re-election victory. Burns received $150,000 in contributions from Abramoff and his Indian tribe clients. Burns later said he would return the money, but he's had a rough time explaining why Abramoff told Vanity Fair, "Every appropriation we wanted [from Burns's committee] we got."

Ethics issues took center stage at the most recent Burns-Tester debate in Hamilton, Mont., in the heart of the Bitterroot Valley in the western part of the state. When Burns asked a rhetorical question about who was holding up a bill in Congress, a Tester supporter shouted out: "Abramoff!" Burns laughed with the audience, but later Tester said to raucous applause, "It is well documented what's gone on with my opponent in relationship to lobbyists back in Washington, D.C. Senator Burns has changed. He's not the same guy he was in 1988 ... Washington has changed him."

Corruption That Shook Capitol Isn't Rattling Elections (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

HAMILTON, Mont. -- Sen. Conrad Burns gazed at a debate audience and asked if anyone could guess who was blocking efforts in Washington to control health-care costs.

"Abramoff?" shouted a heckler. The crowd at a packed high school auditorium here in Montana's Bitterroot Valley erupted in hoots and jeers.

Visibly angered, Burns, 71, shot the audience a don't-mock-me glare. But his debating point (blaming Democrats for health-care costs) and his senatorial dignity were swamped by the contempt of constituents who for nearly a year have been lapping up revelations about his ties to disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Burns, though, soldiered on through the catcalls and sneers -- and not without reason. He may be carrying Abramoff on his back, but in this thinly populated, Republican-leaning state, he continues to run neck and neck with his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, president of the Montana Senate. Poll numbers have not moved much in months.

For all the influence-peddling that has been exposed in the run-up to the midterm election, corruption on Capitol Hill has not become a decisive issue -- here or in much of the country. The Abramoff scandal, having ended the careers of a few lawmakers and stained the reputations of several others, can certainly rile up ardent Democrats, as the debate here demonstrated. But it is not making fundamental changes in the nation's partisan landscape, especially in races, as with Burns in Montana, in which candidates are facing only unsavory stories rather than indictments or guilty pleas.

In an interview, the senator said his polling shows that most voters regard the "Abramoff deal" as merely a political liability and not a damning verdict on his character. Several pollsters and observers of politics in this state agreed with that assessment. The controversy is almost certainly the main reason Burns is in a competitive race this year, but by no means is it a guaranteed career-ender.

"The Democrats started way early with baseless allegations, and now a majority of people are saying, 'Oh, well,' " Burns said. "We are just moving on."

What, then, are the consequences of the oiliest congressional scandal in a generation as it percolates into races far from Washington? There are, of course, some early goners:

Tom Delay (R-Tex.), once the most powerful man in the House, resigned as majority leader and quit Congress, with Abramoff favors and an indictment for improper fundraising hanging over his head.

DOJ_NMG_0063859

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) decided not to run for reelection and pleaded guilty Friday to conspiracy and making a false statement as part of his admission that he traded official acts for campaign contributions and lavish meals in the Abramoff affair.

And Ralph Reed, the telegenic former Christian Coalition executive director, lost the Republican primary for Georgia's lieutenant governor after being tarred by his ties with the lobbyist.

The hand-me-down taint of scandal could still hurt Republicans trying to win the House seats abandoned by DeLay and Ney. "Bob Ney's transgressions resonate despite his departure," said Zack Space, a Democrat running for Ney's seat. "People are very hungry for change."

But in strongly Republican areas, scandal-driven change is far from a sure thing. In a special election to fill the California congressional seat vacated by Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R), now in prison after he admitted taking bribes from defense contractors, a well-funded Republican beat a Democratic challenger in June.

"Democrats ran on a corruption message in a district where a sitting member went to jail, and they didn't win, so how the heck are they going to use that message somewhere else?" asked Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

With Burns, though, the taint is not left over from someone else: He pressured the Interior Department to award a $3 million grant to a wealthy Indian tribe that was an Abramoff client, according to news accounts. A former top Burns aide worked with Abramoff's firm, and Abramoff himself told Vanity Fair that he and his clients received "every appropriation we wanted" from a subcommittee chaired by Burns. The senator is apparently not under investigation, but he did accept $150,000 in campaign donations from Abramoff, his lobbying team and his clients -- donations that Burns later returned.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who is leading the Democrats' campaign committee in the Senate, acknowledged that the corruption issue is just one bullet, and hardly a silver one. Ethical controversies such as those Burns has weathered in Montana, he said, send a message to voters: "He's gotten too comfortable, we need a change." The general backlash is what endangers incumbents, "rather than corruption itself," said Schumer.

"Making Abramoff stick as a campaign issue is going to be hard for Democrats with a well-known Republican incumbent, but with Sen. Burns, who has such a direct link, it is pretty powerful stuff," said Fred Yang, a Washington-based Democratic pollster whose firm has worked on Montana races for decades.

Montana is a critical piece in the Democratic strategy to gain the six seats necessary to take control of the Senate. And the scandal, it seems, has shaped every aspect of the race here, beginning half a year before Democrats even had a candidate. Statewide television ads, paid for by the Democratic Party, pounded away last fall at Burns's ties to Abramoff. In the senator's first television ad of the 2006 campaign, he had to play defense, declaring that the lobbyist "never influenced me."

The Abramoff issue even seems to have dictated who would run against Burns. Tester said in an interview that the scandal was responsible, in part, for his easy primary victory in June over a better-known, better-financed rival, two-term state Auditor John Morrison. The Billings Gazette disclosed last spring that Morrison had an affair with a woman who later married a man investigated by Morrison's office.

The scandal apparently spooked Democrats longing for a candidate who could rail righteously about Abramoff without having to defend what was in his own closet.

"I think voters went into that primary saying to themselves, 'Who is the best candidate to beat Burns?'" said Tester, 50, a farmer and former schoolteacher from Big Sandy, population 703.

Tester, who has criticized the conduct of the Iraq war and promised health insurance for every family, has tried to introduce himself to voters statewide as the kind of real Montanan that he says Burns (a former auctioneer, football referee and radio announcer) no longer is.

Tester's campaign flaunts his authentic big-country look: NFL lineman shoulders, a belly that's headed south and a flattop haircut. His left hand is particularly authentic, missing three fingers that were gnawed off by a meat grinder when he was 9. "Still have that same grinder," Tester said, when asked about the hand.

"I don't look like the other senators," Tester boasts in a TV ad. "But isn't it time the Senate looked a little bit more like Montana?"

Another ad has Tester driving across Montana and talking about his pickup: "You see, special interests have a tight grip on Washington, leaving us out. It doesn't have to be that way. Special interests will never hitch a ride on this truck."

In recent weeks, Burns has damaged his own cause with a series of gaffes. He has insulted local firefighters (by observing in July that they did a "piss-poor job" of fighting a wildfire east of Billings), suggested that all taxi drivers are terrorists and joked about the immigration status of the "nice little Guatemalan man" who works on his house.

Still, Burns remains viable among many Montanans, according to pollsters. As Tester said, "This thing is far from over."

The senator's shield against Abramoff and his own rhetorical blunders may well be the state's extraordinarily strong economy. As growth slows in much of the country, Montana is bulling ahead, on track for its fourth consecutive year of 4 percent growth. Consumer sentiment in the state is at an all-time high, and the annual rise in per-capita income -- measured last year at 6.3 percent -- ranks third in the country. At 3.7 percent, the unemployment rate is about a percentage point below the national average.

"We are in the midst of a natural resource boom of historic proportions," said Paul Polzin, director of economic research at the University of Montana. "At the same time, all other industries are holding their own. This is benefiting exactly those counties where Burns has been strong."

Burns argues that the federal money he has sent Montana's way over the past 18 years helped ignite the boom -- and his argument resonates. It "matters a lot" for a state with just 935,000 residents, said Craig Wilson, a political science professor at Montana State University in Billings.

"Burns has been extraordinary in his ability to bring money to poor little old Montana," said Tom Britz, a consultant to the credit card industry who lives in the booming northwest Montana town of Whitefish. "When it is time to vote, the many people who have been touched by that money know where their bread is buttered."

What may also matter in the Senate contest here is the atypical optimism of many Montanans, as compared with voters' attitudes in most states.

"This is one of the few places in the country right now where people are not hankering for change," said John Russonello, a Washington pollster who works for Democrats and liberal nonprofit groups and who has led focus groups on social issues across Montana this year.

Unlike some Republican incumbents facing reelection, Burns has embraced the war -- and Bush's conduct of it -- as essential to the country's fight against terrorism. Betting that most Montanans see Iraq as he does, Burns has launched blistering TV and radio attacks on Tester, accusing him of taking money from "extreme liberal groups that mocked American deaths."

"Tester's not tough," one ad says. "He is deceitful, and he'll say anything to get elected."

In the recent debate, Tester responded to those accusations by saying that Burns, whom he described as bought and paid for by lobbyists such as Abramoff, is just not honest.

"Washington has changed him," said Tester, pointing at Burns. "The fact is we have to have people back there who have Montana values."

Burns smiled and said he had not changed and never would: "I have the same wife, the same kids; got the same principles, same values."

As pro-Tester hecklers booed, hissed, cursed and at one point called the senator "psycho," Burns spent much of the 90-minute debate reminding the crowd that he -- not Tester -- is a specialist in funneling federal money back home. By these lights, a candidate who knows the corridors of insider Washington might have an advantage. "It is going to take a guy who has got a little seniority and a little position to get it done," he said.

GOP Eyes Washington State Seat (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Washington state voters tomorrow will formally choose their nominees for the U.S. Senate, setting the stage for a West Coast showdown that Republicans hope will help them capture a Democratic seat.

DOJ_NMG_0063861

Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Democrat, faces anti-war candidate Hong Tran in a primary that serves as the opening act for a race with Republican Mike McGavick, who is expected to easily win his own primary contest today.

Republicans and some pollsters think Mr. McGavick, a business executive who casts himself as an independent, has a good shot at ousting the freshman senator this fall.

Miss Tran, a nonprofit lawyer who fled Vietnam as a young girl, spent yesterday at a Seattle Peace concert wooing last-minute voters.

Miss Cantwell is not considered in danger of losing tomorrow's primary as did her Democratic colleague Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut. Mr. Lieberman lost his primary to Ned Lamont last month, largely because of his support of President Bush on the Iraq war, and will run as an independent in November.

Initially, Miss Cantwell faced opposition from several Democrats critical of her stance on the Iraq war.

Mark Wilson, who announced that he would challenge Miss Cantwell more than a year ago, was hired by the senator's campaign this summer. He became an outreach director with an $8,000 monthly salary, prompting accusations that she was trying to buy off her critics.

Miss Tran has accused state Democratic Party officials of withholding voter databases from her campaign, saying they don't want voters to know about her candidacy.

Miss Cantwell voted in favor of the Iraq war in October 2002, but recently supported a Democratic effort to initiate a "phased redeployment" of troops from Iraq by Dec. 31.

Miss Cantwell and Mr. McGavick were closely matched earlier in the race, but recent revelations that the Republican was arrested for driving under the influence in 1993 have contributed to his sagging poll numbers. Mr. McGavick, a millionaire who was chief executive at insurance giant Safeco, characterizes the event as "embarrassing" and "one of my biggest mistakes in life."

"Candidates shouldn't be afraid to admit that they are human and to talk about lessons they've learned," Mr. McGavick told supporters in an e-mail recently.

He first told voters that he had coasted through a yellow light, prompting a DUI citation. However, news reports based on the police report show that he ran a red light and was both cited and arrested.

A Sept. 6 Rasmussen Reports poll showed Miss Cantwell with a 17-point lead, but others had her with an eight-point advantage. A poll from the previous month had the senator with a six-point lead.

However, the Associated Press reported last week that Miss Cantwell secured more than $11 million in federal projects for a lobbyist who advises her campaign.

The accusations involve Ron Dotzauer, her former campaign manager who still owes her between $15,000 and $50,000 from a loan she gave him in the 1990s.

The loan was still listed as outstanding on Miss Cantwell's May financial-disclosure report, the AP reported. The senator's office told the AP that the federal projects helped Washingtonians.

Support For Electronic Filing Of Senate Candidates' Campaign-Finance Records Gains Momentum (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

In the next few weeks leading up to Election Day, money will pour into candidates' coffers and voters will be able to see which lobby groups are trying hardest to buy their lawmakers' favor.

Except if the candidates happen to be running for Senate.

In one of the most controversial quirks in election law, candidates for Senate are not required to file their campaign-finance reports electronically. That means voters can't effectively find out how much and from whom their would-be senators have collected money until long after the election -- too late for them to act.

A growing number of senators and public-interest groups have been working for years to change this rule. They contend that it's only reasonable that senators should be required to file their disclosures electronically -- just as candidates for the House and the presidency do. In that way voters can easily see within 24 hours via the Internet what the candidates are spending and from whom they are getting their funds.

As it is, almost all senators and Senate candidates deliver their reports on paper (even though those reports are written on computers). The paper filings are laboriously scanned and then key-punched into an electronic system, a procedure that often takes six weeks to finish and costs hundreds of thousands of dollars.

After the reports are submitted to the Secretary of the Senate (often well past published deadlines), they are placed onto the Federal Election Commission's Web site in a page-by-page format. The listings are not searchable, which makes it almost impossible for anyone to glean useful information. Think of the process like rummaging through thousands of disorderly papers in a very large box.

The net result: Senators have insolated themselves from criticism that stems from their very important, end-of-campaign donations because they have denied voters accessible information when it would be most useful.

"The Senate has repeatedly voted to mandate timely electronic disclosure and Web searchability for House and presidential candidates, non-Senate party committees, political action committees, Section 527 political organizations and lobbyists," said Stephen R. Weissman, associate director for policy at the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. "The level of hypocrisy is unbelievable, and the American voter pays a heavy price."

The Senate's Committee on Rules and Administration is in charge of deciding what to do about the issue and, despite pleas from a bipartisan group of senators, has done nothing. I tried many times in the past two weeks to get the spokeswoman for the committee's chairman, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), to return my phone calls and to answer questions on the topic. But she did not respond.

In fact, it's hard to find anyone who will defend the current law. On the other hand, lots of folks have problems with the situation and are eager to say so, including the Federal Election Commission. The FEC has recommended that the Senate move to electronic filing on "multiple occasions," said Michael E. Toner, the FEC's chairman. "Senate campaigns are the only ones that don't file electronically," he said, "even though there's widespread agreement that electronic filing works well and allows data to be publicly available within hours of it being received."

Senators from both sides of the aisle agree. Eleven senators (seven Republicans and four Democrats) sent a letter to Lott in July urging him to approve legislation that would mandate electronic filing. "We believe there is consensus among our colleagues to move to electronic filing and online disclosure of campaign finance reports," said the letter, which was primarily authored by the political odd couple of Sens. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.). "The next step in this process is Senate action."

Voters surely would have been better off if such a law been in effect in prior elections. When the polls opened in November 2004, voters were in the dark about $53 million in individual Senate contributions of $200 or more dating all the way back to July, according to the Campaign Finance Institute. If you were a South Dakotan choosing between Tom Daschle, the Senate's Democratic leader, and Republican challenger John Thune, you were almost certainly unaware of large donations totaling $24,000 from employees of the mortgage finance giant Fannie Mae to Daschle, as well as large contributions to Thune from employees of Coastview Capital and L.E. Lehrman and Co. ($12,000 each).

The only way you might have known about these and other major gifts would have been to leaf through the candidates' reports, each of which was about 3,400 pages long. North Carolina voters had it slightly better, but not much; the reports of major party candidates there were only 1,100 pages long.

The House started to make its disclosures simpler to obtain more than a decade ago. In 1995, the House began filing its reports directly with the FEC, and two years later it allowed the reports to be filed electronically. But the Senate took neither step, standing firm on the principle that it should control its own reports, a notion that one Senate aide summarized as "senatorial prerogative."

How this makes sense in an information age is hard to fathom.

Good Deed Bounty Hunting

DOJ_NMG_0063863

The Sunlight Network is offering cash to citizens who do what it thinks is the "right thing." The nonprofit group is advertising that it will pay up to a total of $680,000 to people who persuade members of Congress, or prospective members, to agree to put their daily schedules on the Internet for all to see.

The Sunlight Network, which is affiliated with the Sunlight Foundation, thinks that it is well past time that voters knew who their elected representatives were meeting with and how often. But there's no way to find out short of publishing their schedules, something that is not required and, in fact, is never done.

So the network says that it will pay a cash fee of $1,000 to anyone who persuades a lawmaker to sign an agreement to disclose his or her daily calendar, and $250 to anyone who gets a candidate for Congress to do the same. The Sunlight Foundation is underwritten by securities lawyer and entrepreneur Michael R. Klein and headed by Ellen S. Miller, a longtime advocate for disclosure of campaign finances.

The organization takes its name from a quotation by former Supreme Court justice Louis D. Brandeis: "Sunlight is said to be the best of disinfectants." Its goal is to shed light, or public attention, on candidates' big donors and lobbying contacts as a way to change government. But so far no one has taken advantage of this latest gimmick.

Face Of His Campaign Isn't Bush's (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash. — A funny thing happened Friday when Karl Rove, the White House advisor, came to the Seattle suburbs to headline a fundraiser for freshman Republican Rep. Dave Reichert: The congressman did nothing to publicize the visit, and his challenger drew every bit of attention to it she could.

On the day Rove was in town, Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft Corp. executive who is Reichert's Democratic opponent, issued her fifth news release of the week casting the visit in a negative light, and while Rove and Reichert were attending a round-table briefing for Republican donors, about 60 Burner supporters mugged for cameras outside.

But both of Rove's appearances — at the fundraiser and at the round table — were private and closed to the media, so there were no news photographs of Reichert, 56, with campaign mastermind Rove.

For Burner, 35, who is making her first run for public office, there was an obvious strategy in focusing attention on a reliable Republican bogeyman in what state pollster Stuart Elway described as a "classic swing district." The 8th District has voted Democratic in the last four presidential elections yet consistently has sent a Republican to the House.

The Reichert-Burner race in Seattle's suburbs east of Lake Washington shows up on nearly every national list of competitive races, and the Rove fundraiser comes on the heels of campaign filings showing that the challenger has raised more money this year than the incumbent.

According to federal disclosure reports filed this month, Burner has raised about $1.2 million this year, Reichert $1 million — which Burner cites as evidence of her campaign's momentum and of a sense she gets in the district that "people are very disturbed about the direction of this country."

On the other hand, Reichert campaign officials point out that the congressman has raised $2.2 million overall, much more than Burner, and that he has more cash on hand — $1.1 million to Burner's $728,000 — an indicator of each side's ability to buy ads going into the stretch run of the campaign.

"It's very clear that the Democrats are building a war chest for a negative campaign that they really have already started," said Reichert spokeswoman Carol Beaudu. "But we are right where we want to be, and it will go a long ways toward telling 8th District voters about Dave's independent voting record."

Reichert highlights his support for stem-cell research, and his opposition to drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and to federal interference in the Terri Schiavo feeding-tube case, as examples of his willingness to buck party leaders.

Pollster Elway said that was a telling dynamic of the campaign: Democrats seem to be doing everything they can to tie Reichert to the Bush White House, and especially to the war in Iraq, whereas Reichert is taking pains to show that he's willing to disagree with the president.

In a district like the 8th, Elway said, Burner is almost certain to benefit from a general discontent with President Bush. The question is how much.

"If the national tide is running strong with the Democrats, this is exactly the kind of race they could win," he said. "If it's not such a strong tide, then it's a pretty good example of a place where a Republican could hang on, by emphasizing that he's shown some independence from the administration."

Some voters here indeed seem potentially swayed by the incumbent's assertions of independence. "I like Reichert; he's his own man," said Dave Purdy, 39, an imaging-equipment salesman in Bellevue who voted for Reichert in 2004 and said he would probably do so again. But Purdy added that he wanted to learn more about Burner and would probably focus more on the race after the candidates' debate next month.

Still, it is also clear there is a deep vein of discontent, especially over the Iraq war. Though Reichert appears more popular personally than Bush here, the discontent could hurt Reichert in November.

Reichert flew to Seattle from Washington, D.C., on Friday for the Rove events and to see his family (he and his wife of 36 years, Julie, have three children and six grandchildren), but he had no campaign appearances over the weekend and was not available for an interview, his spokeswoman said.

Burner, in an interview after a fundraising event of her own Thursday, said the war in Iraq had been an "incredible drain on [the nation's] resources and our spirit" and that many voters "simply don't believe that the war in Iraq is the same thing as the war on terror."

But she stopped short of calling for an immediate withdrawal. Instead, she said, Bush "needs to go to the military leaders and say, 'What is the plan for giving Iraq back to the Iraqis and bringing our troops home with honor?' "

Burner graduated from Harvard University, majoring in economics and computer science. She and her husband, Mike, have a 3-year-old son, Henry. She worked in software in Boston and Silicon Valley, Calif., before moving to the Seattle area in 1998.

She said she had strong ties to Washington state dating to childhood summers spent with her grandparents in Rochester, south of Olympia.

In campaign appearances, she mixes emotion and humor, saying public service is a calling in her family — one brother served in Iraq with the 101st Airborne, a sister is a nurse, and another brother, she said, performs a vital duty too: He drives a delivery truck for Miller Brewing Co.

An Arizona Win Puts Immigration Back In Play (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, September 17, 2006

A few weeks ago, it was became suddenly clear that the Republican free-for-all primary in the southeastern corner of Arizona was anything but ordinary. Randy Graf--a former golf pro, state representative and cowboy-boots-clad founding member of the Minutemen border group--had vaulted into the lead with his focus on fixing what he called the "security crisis" at the border. Opponents attacked him as extreme, and the national Republican party Party went so far as to buy at least $122,000 worth of ads for Graf's most formidable moderate challenger, state Rep. Steve Huffman.

It didn't work. Graf won last week, roiling some Republican circles and raising questions about the wisdom of the party's floundering immigration strategy. It has also put in jeopardy a precious House seat in a mostly moderate district that has been represented since 1984 by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe, an abortion-rights centrist and the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

Fizzled rallies. In some ways, Graf's victory came at a moment that seems ripe for immigration restrictionists. After this spring's May Day rallies drew thousands of protesters in cities all over the country, efforts to duplicate that momentum this fall have largely fizzled. There were puny numbers at a September march on Washington that activists said would draw hundreds of thousands. A large coalition of advocacy groups that had vowed to register 1 million new immigrant voters now widely acknowledges they it won't meet that goal.

In this atmosphere, Graf's win was electrifying--at least in some corners. "I think it shows people are furious about immigration," says Ira Mehlman, a communications director with the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group advocating restricting immigration. "And it's not just Arizona." Vulnerable incumbents like Sen. Rick Santorum, Rep. Chris Shays, and Sen. Jim Talent, who weren't vociferous on immigration a year ago, have already taken a hard line on border security. With Graf's win, Mehlman says the trend could easily grow stronger.

That tough rhetoric stands in contrast to what the Republicans in Washington didn't get done this year. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist announced two weeks ago that he won't try to reconcile a punitive House immigration bill with a more moderate Senate measure that includes a guest-worker program before November. In an atmosphere where people talk about "a do-nothing Congress," that move was probably a mistake, says GOP strategist Whit Ayers. Last week, the House seemed to scramble to do something: Republicans passed a bill that would build 700 miles of double-layered steel fencing on the southern border, basically resurrecting one of the controversial aspects of their stalled bill.

Still, some observers of the Graf race urged caution. "I'm still waiting, for someone to show me the races where the [hard-line immigration] approach actually wins our party something," says Rep. Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican. He said Graf benefited from a five-man race. "This isn't," Flake says, "the uprising some think it is."

Graf, however, tapped right into the frustration that's very alive in the Eighth District, which includes about 100 miles of the U.S.-Mexican border and runs up to the some prosperous suburbs near Tucson. "Down here," Graf he says, "illegal immigrants are killing cows, trashing people's ranches, and putting families near violent criminals, and Congress hasn't done anything about it." He also hopes his desire to slash bloated spending will spark Arizona's famed mile-wide independent streak.

Graf faces stiff competition from former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat who says she fits the district's moderate profile: She was a Republican until 1999. "I jumped into this," she says from her volunteer-filled Tucson office," because I think the country is in trouble." Giffords emphasized healthcare and education in her primary, but as a Fulbright scholar who studied in Mexico in the early 1990s, she's credible on immigration and plans a push for more sanctions for illegal-alien employers and reform that includes a guest-worker program.

But many experts say if Republicans want to keep the seat, they'll have to unite behind Graf and convince Arizonan swing voters to do so too as well. Graf did a victory lap through Washington last week and picked up the endorsement--and a $5,000 check--from his former foes at the Republican congressional committee. Though Kolbe has refused his support, that didn't deter a delighted Republican Rep. Tom Tancredo, the toughest immigration reformer in Congress. "I don't just want to work with Randy," Tancredo told U.S. News; "I want to someday pass the baton to him." And if Graf and the other hard-liners win, it will surely be an even bigger baton.

Ken Mehlman (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

Even Democrats acknowledge the prowess of the political machine Ken Mehlman oversees as chairman of the Republican National Committee (RNC).

When Mehlman came to a Monitor-sponsored breakfast with national reporters on Friday, the policy-oriented National Journal magazine had just released a poll of political insiders ranking the performance of the RNC and the Democratic National Committee (DNC).

As National Journal reporter Jim Barnes notes, it is no surprise that 94 percent of Republican insiders think the RNC is doing a better job than the Democratic National Committee in the run-up to the midterm elections. The surprise is that 68 percent of the Democratic insiders agree that the RNC is out-performing the DNC.

Mehlman, a Harvard-trained lawyer who delivers his points in rapid-fire fashion, downplayed the role of organization in elections. "The reason I am confident we are going to keep our majority is not because of our operations. It is because of the candidates on the ballot," he said. "We won in '04 because of George W. Bush, not because we had a smart turnout operation. 80 percent of politics is motivating voters based on ideas, based on ideology, and based on the candidate that expresses ideas and ideology. I think what has hurt Democrats is the fact that for so long you've had uncertain trumpets leading the party. And that makes it very hard to do the rest."

The RNC chair came to visit in a week when polling data showed a change in the public's view on the issue of terrorism, which could tend to help the president and candidates tied to him. The ABC News political blog "The Note" quoted ABC polling director Gary Langer as saying, "Terrorism has inched up in importance in the 2006 midterm elections and Republicans have regained an edge in trust to handle it, helping George W. Bush's party move closer to the Democrats in congressional vote preference."

Langer noted that Republicans lead Democrats in trust to handle terrorism by a 48-41 percent margin among registered voters in the latest ABC News poll. That is a flip from a seven-point Democratic advantage last month. Part of the change came from independent voters, the key to winning elections.

Mehlman attributes a bump in the president's job approval numbers to "a combination of speeches and realities in the world that have reminded people that a lot of what he is saying makes sense."

The GOP chief did not want to make a specific numerical forecast for the Congressional elections. He declined to confirm press reports citing unnamed senior White House officials predicting Republicans would hold the Senate by a 52-48 or 53-47 margin and lose ground in the House but still maintain control there as well.

While voicing optimism about maintaining control of Congress, Mehlman cited a number of factors that add up to what he called an overall environment that is "very challenging" for Republicans.

"We've got a headwind," he said. "We've got a headwind because we are in the sixth year of a presidency. We have a headwind because voters clearly are in a sour mood. We've got a headwind because we are in a tough war. I have acknowledged that from the beginning. So people who say it is another status quo election, race by race, I don't necessarily agree with that either. My point is it is actually a combination of factors. You do have a headwind at the same time we have certain assets we bring to the table...."

Money is a key GOP asset, Mehlman noted. "We will spend at least $60 million just on ads and turnout. In these congressional elections, Howard Dean will spend $12 million. If you add together the ... national parties on each side, if you add together the state parties around the country, in the competitive states, and if you add together the competitive congressional House and Senate campaigns, all together, when you look at cash, we have a $47 million cash advantage."

While it may be ahead on cash, the GOP last week was less than unified. The Senate Armed Services Committee rebuffed the president, after he had made a rare personal visit to the Hill, and voted for legislation that assures those on trial for terrorism receive Geneva Convention protections. The move came after former Secretary of State Colin Powell released a letter saying, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Mehlman downplayed the political impact of the committee vote on how to treat terrorism suspects. "The average American is not paying attention to committee mark-ups. The average American is looking at the overall picture. And what the average American is seeing and they are saying is 'ok, what are the tools we need to win?' ... I am hopeful and confident the president is going to have the ability to have the kind of program he talked about last week, which is a program [that] is critical to defending America."

While the RNC chairman's presentation accentuated the positive, it was clear Mehlman is concerned about the outcome of the 2006 elections. "I am never comfortable. I am always concerned. I am always watching. I think we've got good efforts.... The fact that [the Democrats] have the resources they do, the fact that the environment is tough, that all worries me a lot. This is a very challenging environment."

In an earlier life, the Mehlman was campaign manager for Bush-Cheney '04. Prior to moving to the campaign, he was director of Political Affairs at the White House, and deputy to Karl Rove. He is a trustee of Franklin and Marshall College, his undergraduate (Class of 1988) alma mater.

The Democratic Entourage (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

It is getting late in the season, but John Yarmuth still wants in—into the club, the entourage. He is the Democratic candidate for Congress in Louisville, Ky., hoping to oust Republican incumbent Anne Northup. The club is the Democrats' Red to Blue

Program. If you are a member—there will be about 40 of them—donations from strangers across the country will blow through your campaign mail slot like letters from Hogwarts. All you have to do is convince Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Chicago that you are worthy and that you can win. But that is the hard part. Under Emanuel, the program runs like a cross between a Chicago political clubhouse and a movie studio with too many way-over-budget projects. "I made my case to him when he was down here a couple of weeks ago," Yarmuth says. A friend of Yarmuth's flew to Washington last week to make the pitch to an Emanuel deputy. "We've got a good chance," says Yarmuth.

Most politicians hate to say no; Emanuel can't say it enough. He is a one-man pecking order. "All right, what's going, whaddya got?" he impatiently asks a reporter who stops by. Perched behind a clean desk in his campaign office, he talks while thumbing his BlackBerry as though it contained the secrets of the universe. Aides appear in the doorway with bulletins from the front; he glances up now and again at news on a flat-panel TV; someone hands him a personal cell phone (it's a call from his wife); he tries to put on a Norah Jones CD—loud—until the reporter objects. "For us to win we have to focus," he says. "It's all about picking, making good judgments about priorities." The Red to Blue Program is a Good Housekeeping Seal, he says. "It means a lot of things: campaign well run, campaign well financed, good candidate. It means a good opportunity to pick up a seat." Donors know whom they should give to—and Emanuel easily can check later to see if they do. "Candidates want to be on [the list] and donors want the clarity," he says.

If the man, the scene and the rope-line mentality remind you of something you have seen on television—say, "Entourage" on HBO or "The West Wing" on NBC—it is no accident. In a "life imitates art imitates life" moment, the Democrats' hopes for winning control of the House rest on whether real people can be as effective as they have been portrayed as being on TV. Consider: the hard-charging character of Josh Lyman on "The West Wing" was modeled on Emanuel. How did that happen? Because the part was created and written by Aaron Sorkin (who created the whole show) and played by Bradley Whitford. Both men are clients of Emanuel's younger brother, Hollywood agent Ari Emanuel. The maniacally in-your-face character of agent Ari Gold on "Entourage" is modeled on Ari Emanuel, who represents Steve Tompkins and Mark Wahlberg, executive producers of the show. In real life, Ari Emanuel is fast becoming a political networking force in Los Angeles, issuing his clients and partners invitations to fund-raising events, including one for Rahm himself and for his House campaign committee. "Ari's a definite player and very strategic," says Robin Bronk, who heads the nonpartisan Creative Coalition, an arts lobbying group.

It will take all the hard-charging that Democrats can muster if they are going to assemble an entourage that can take back the House of Representatives. A switch of just 15 seats would give them their first foothold in Washington since George W. Bush became president. But at a time when political divisions are so entrenched and opinions are so fixed—on the war in Iraq, on terrorism, on economic security, on pretty much everything—the outcome could well depend (again) on money and get-out-the-vote machinery.

As has been the case since Bill Clinton left town, the Republicans have the organizational and financial advantage. However beleaguered and angry the president is—and however at odds he is with GOP senators over issues such as the treatment of terrorism suspects—the campaign apparatus Karl Rove built is intact and internally disciplined. It's a "cohesive unit," says Ken Mehlman, Republican Party chairman. "Every decision, we've all talked about it," he says.

Among Democrats, by contrast, national, Senate and House campaign units maintain their independence—and often behave like rival homies in an "Entourage" bar scene. Emanuel has clashed repeatedly with Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, whose "50-state" approach to organizing strikes Emanuel as disastrously unfocused. Only in the Democratic Party would campaign officials need to sign a written peace treaty, which Dean and Emanuel did last week. The national committee agreed to funnel $12 million of its cash into congressional get-out-the-vote efforts; Emanuel basically agreed (though not in writing) to shut up. He did so in an interview. "They want me to take my beta blockers," he says with a somewhat defiant shrug. "So I'm going to take my beta blockers, OK?" The disputes, he says, "have not hampered us."

Meaning his own clubhouse. A native of Chicago, Emanuel learned his politics from the legendary Daley family, with whom he remains close. The family lesson: take care of your own. While Republicans as a whole have $30 million more in the bank than Democrats do now, Emanuel's own Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is now roughly even with its GOP counterpart—a position it hasn't enjoyed for a decade. And there is evidence that the Red to Blue Program is working: Democratic candidates are even or ahead in fund-raising in most of the races that neutral observers regard as competitive.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, Emanuel teamed with Senate campaign chair Chuck Schumer to tap uncharted donor fields in the financial industry. "We're working outside of traditional banks," he says proudly, "into the private-equity world, the hedge-fund world, the distressed-debt world." These "worlds" know they are talking to a guy who not only runs the campaign committee, but who could be in the majority of the key financial committee—and maybe even majority leader.

The entertainment industry remains a major source of cash for the Democrats, who get two out of every three dollars given to federal candidates. It has been a tough sell. Donors felt tapped out and depressed after what they regarded as Sen. John Kerry's badly run 2004 campaign. The mood changed after the Democrats' congressional prospects improved, and some fund-raisers developed a novel, typically self-doubting pitch for selling into a down market. It goes this way, explains a screenwriter who declined to speak on the record for fear of angering big machers such as Ari Emanuel: "Hillary Clinton is going to be nominated in 2008, John McCain is going to be president, so the House is our only chance to get in the game."

Whatever the pitch, it's working. The industry has given about $10 million to Democrats so far. And while Ari Emanuel is hardly the key moneyman, he is emerging as a leader of a newer generation of Hollywood fund-raisers, who rely less on their own wallets than their networks' and who are willing to become public political figures, not just backroom types. Famously abrasive (Jerry Seinfeld reportedly once had a bumper sticker printed that read: I HATE ARI EMANUEL, TOO), he can also be charmingly insistent. He phoned one client who left his fold on friendly terms to ask, "Why are you ruining your career?" Ari called him the following week, and the next—for a year.

Persistence pays. Ari cosponsored a $220,000 fund-raiser for his brother's personal PAC in June; in the days before and after the event, the PAC received $30,000 in checks from employees of the Endeavor Agency, the firm Ari founded. Other contributors included Ari's celebrity clients, among them Sorkin and Michael Douglas. (Rahm's PAC, in turn, has donated some of that cash to members of the Red to Blue Program.) Endeavor employees have given more than $50,000 to the House campaign committee; clients such as Sorkin have given generously, too. "He can pick up the phone and get anyone—anyone—on the line," says a friend who deals with Ari on a daily basis but who is still afraid to talk about him on the record.

In Washington, meanwhile, brother Rahm is turning his attention to turnout operations. Focused like a laser beam, not so much in a hurry as in a controlled frenzy, he is almost literally driven crazy by professional ineptitude and sloth. In one legendary incident from the 1988 cycle (he was a top staffer then of the committee he now runs), he sent a dead fish to a pollster whose work he disliked. He has carefully studied the GOP's expensive, cutting-edge voter "outreach" program. Using huge databases, it connects like-minded people by using market research to develop profiles of their interests and concerns. The aim is to re-create an over-the-back-fence digital/personal endorsement.

The Democrats' system isn't nearly as robust, but perhaps one of their best GOTV masterminds—Harold Ickes—last week announced an independent effort (they hope to raise $25 million) to target key voters. "People are really beginning to understand that the House is really competitive and Democrats have a real chance to win," says Ickes. Maybe so, but Emanuel isn't making grand predictions. Privately, he's telling friends that the current number is a pickup of 15 to 19 seats—too close to call, in other words, for the Red to Blue crew to start breaking out the champagne.

Emanuel is releasing what probably is his final Red to Blue list this week. He and his team considered Yarmuth's case. The district is a tough one to win, even though Kerry carried it in 2004. Yarmuth owned a local magazine in which he published articles that might cause controversy. ("Rahm had read all of those articles before last December, when I first met him," Yarmuth says.) Perhaps most important, Yarmuth is independently wealthy. Scorn does not begin to describe Emanuel's response to the idea, as he put it, "of giving money to a multimillionaire." Yarmuth was not invited to join the entourage.

UCLA Attracts Retired General Wesley Clark (LAT)

By Rebecca Trounson

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

Wesley K. Clark, a former NATO commander and 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, will join the University of California, Los Angeles, this fall as a senior fellow, university officials are set to announce Monday.

Clark, who is expected to arrive on campus about the first of October, will teach occasional seminars, publish policy papers and organize and hold an annual conference on national security, officials said. He will be affiliated with the university's Ronald W. Burkle Center for International Relations.

The retired general's wide-ranging military, political and teaching background will serve UCLA and its students well, said Patricia O'Brien, executive dean of the university's College of Letters and Science. "I am especially pleased that our students at UCLA will benefit from General Clark's extraordinary experience, as well as his dynamic leadership and teaching credentials," O'Brien said in a statement.

Clark, who taught economics and political philosophy at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in the early 1970s, said in a brief phone interview Friday that he was looking forward to returning to the classroom, although initially he will be a guest lecturer in other professors' courses and not teach his own.

"I'll be looking at U.S. national security in the broadest terms, including military, diplomatic, energy, environmental and trade issues," said Clark, who served as NATO's commander during the 1999 Kosovo conflict. "There's never been a time in American history when Americans have been more impacted by events abroad, and we need a strategy that touches all those areas."

Clark also said he was looking forward to living and working in the Los Angeles area, where he has a son. The appointment is open-ended, he said.

Previous lecturers and scholars at the Burkle Center have included former Presidents Clinton and Carter and other U.S. and foreign officials.

Early Admissions (WP)

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

HARVARD UNIVERSITY'S much-applauded decision no longer to allow the early acceptance of students should help ensure a more equitable admissions process and attract a more diverse group of students. Before other universities and colleges conclude they can't follow Harvard's example, they need to take a hard look at how they admit.

Starting next year, Harvard said, it will abolish the practice of early admissions of undergraduates because the program, attracting mainly the white and well-off, places minorities and the poor at a disadvantage. Early-admission programs vary but generally guarantee acceptance to students who promise in advance that they will attend. (Harvard's program hasn't required this promise.) Colleges get to lock in top students while also boosting yield (the number of offers accepted and a figure widely seen as a measure of a school's desirability). For the student, early admission increases the chance of acceptance and takes some tension out of senior year, but it prevents the offer of one college (including financial aid) being weighed against another.

It's true that Harvard -- with its prestige and billions in endowment funds -- risks little; it will enroll a strong class with or without the early-admission tool. In that sense, the University of Delaware took a bigger chance last spring when it eliminated early admissions to ensure a fairer process for both student and school. "Why," asked University of Delaware Admissions Director Louis L. Hirsh, "should applying for college be about strategizing rather than finding which of the 4,000 colleges and universities in this country is the best fit for you?"

It's a good question, but not the only one that needs to be asked in the effort to make higher education more accessible. Are standardized tests being used correctly in the admissions process? Is financial aid being distributed fairly -- the balance between merit and need-based scholarships, for instance? Do college ranking systems really make any sense? How about college marketing?

As other schools ponder whether they can afford to follow the example of Harvard and Delaware, they would do well to note the widespread reaction of parents, teachers and guidance counselors who see the decision as a step toward easing the anxiety, tension and premature pressure that has come to permeate the process for too many students.

What Would War Look Like? (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, September 25, 2006

The first message was routine enough: a "Prepare to Deploy" order sent through naval communications channels to a submarine, an Aegis-class cruiser, two minesweepers and two mine hunters. The orders didn't actually command the ships out of port; they just said to be ready to move by Oct. 1. But inside the Navy those messages generated more buzz than usual last week when a second request, from the Chief of Naval Operations (CNO), asked for fresh eyes on long-standing U.S. plans to blockade two Iranian oil ports on the Persian Gulf. The CNO had asked for a rundown on how a blockade of those strategic targets might work. When he didn't like the analysis he received, he ordered his troops to work the lash up once again.

What's going on? The two orders offered tantalizing clues. There are only a few places in the world where minesweepers top the list of U.S. naval requirements. And every sailor, petroleum engineer and hedge-fund manager knows the name of the most important: the Strait of Hormuz, the 20-mile-wide bottleneck in the Persian Gulf through which roughly 40% of the world's oil needs to pass each day. Coupled with the CNO's request for a blockade review, a deployment of minesweepers to the west coast of Iran would seem to suggest that a much discussed--but until now largely theoretical--prospect has become real: that the U.S. may be preparing for war with Iran.

No one knows whether--let alone when--a military confrontation with Tehran will come to pass. The fact that admirals are reviewing plans for blockades is hardly proof of their intentions. The U.S. military routinely makes plans for scores of scenarios, the vast majority of which will never be put into practice. "Planners always plan," says a Pentagon official. Asked about the orders, a second official said only that the Navy is stepping up its "listening and learning" in the Persian Gulf but nothing more--a prudent step, he added, after Iran tested surface-to-ship missiles there in August during a two-week military exercise. And yet from the State Department to the White House to the highest reaches of the military command, there is a growing sense that a showdown with Iran--over its suspected quest for nuclear weapons, its threats against Israel and its bid for dominance of the world's richest oil region--may be impossible to avoid. The chief of the U.S. Central Command (Centcom), General John Abizaid, has called a commanders conference for later this month in the Persian Gulf--sessions he holds at least quarterly--and Iran is on the agenda.

On its face, of course, the notion of a war with Iran seems absurd. By any rational measure, the last thing the U.S. can afford is another war. Two unfinished wars--one on Iran's eastern border, the other on its western flank--are daily depleting America's treasury and overworked armed forces. Most of Washington's allies in those adventures have made it clear they will not join another gamble overseas. What's more, the Bush team, led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has done more diplomatic spadework on Iran than on any other project in its 51/2 years in office. For more than 18 months, Rice has kept the Administration's hard-line faction at bay while leading a coalition that includes four other members of the U.N. Security Council and is trying to force Tehran to halt its suspicious nuclear ambitions. Even Iran's former President, Mohammed Khatami, was in Washington this month calling for a "dialogue" between the two nations.

But superpowers don't always get to choose their enemies or the timing of their confrontations. The fact that all sides would risk losing so much in armed conflict doesn't mean they won't stumble into one anyway. And for all the good arguments against any war now, much less this one, there are just as many indications that a genuine, eyeball-to-eyeball crisis between the U.S. and Iran may be looming, and sooner than many realize. "At the moment," says Ali Ansari, a top Iran authority at London's Chatham House, a foreign-policy think tank, "we are headed for conflict."

So what would it look like? Interviews with dozens of experts and government officials in Washington, Tehran and elsewhere in the Middle East paint a sobering picture: military action against Iran's nuclear facilities would have a decent chance of succeeding, but at a staggering cost. And therein lies the excruciating calculus facing the U.S. and its allies: Is the cost of confronting Iran greater than the dangers of living with a nuclear Iran? And can anything short of war persuade Tehran's fundamentalist regime to give up its dangerous game?

ROAD TO WAR

The crisis with Iran has been years in the making. Over the past decade, Iran has acquired many of the pieces, parts and plants needed to make a nuclear device. Although Iranian officials insist that Iran's ambitions are limited to nuclear energy, the regime has asserted its right to develop nuclear power and enrich uranium that could be used in bombs as an end in itself--a symbol of sovereign pride, not to mention a useful prop for politicking. Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has crisscrossed the country in recent months making Iran's right to a nuclear program a national cause and trying to solidify his base of hard-line support in the Revolutionary Guards. The nuclear program is popular with average Iranians and the élites as well. "Iranian leaders have this sense of past glory, this belief that Iran should play a lofty role in the world," says Nasser Hadian, professor of political science at Tehran University.

But the nuclear program isn't Washington's only worry about Iran. While stoking nationalism at home, Tehran has dramatically consolidated its reach in the region. Since the 1979 Islamic revolution, Iran has sponsored terrorist groups in a handful of countries, but its backing of Hizballah, the militant group that took Lebanon to war with Israel this summer, seems to be changing the Middle East balance of power. There is circumstantial evidence that Iran ordered Hizballah to provoke this summer's war, in part to demonstrate that Tehran can stir up big trouble if pushed to the brink. The precise extent of coordination between Hizballah and Tehran is unknown. But no longer in dispute after the standoff in July is Iran's ability to project power right up to the borders of Israel. It is no coincidence that the talk in Washington about what to do with Iran became more focused after Hizballah fought the Israeli army to a virtual standstill this summer.

And yet the West has been unable to compel Iran to comply with its demands. Despite all the work Rice has put into her coalition, diplomatic efforts are moving too slowly, some believe, to stop the Iranians before they acquire the makings of a nuclear device. And Iran has played its hand shrewdly so far. Tehran took weeks to reply to a formal proposal from the U.N. Security Council calling on a halt to uranium enrichment. When it did, its official response was a mosaic of half-steps, conditions and boilerplate that suggested Tehran has little intention of backing down. "The Iranians," says a Western diplomat in Washington, "are very able negotiators."

That doesn't make war inevitable. But at some point the U.S. and its allies may have to confront the ultimate choice. The Bush Administration has said it won't tolerate Iran having a nuclear weapon. Once it does, the regime will have the capacity to carry out Ahmadinejad's threats to eliminate Israel. And in practical terms, the U.S. would have to consider military action long before Iran had an actual bomb. In military circles, there is a debate about where--and when--to draw that line. U.S. intelligence chief John Negroponte told TIME in April that Iran is five years away from having a nuclear weapon. But some nonproliferation experts worry about a different moment: when Iran is able to enrich enough uranium to fuel a bomb--a point that comes well before engineers actually assemble a nuclear device. Many believe that is when a country becomes a nuclear power. That red line, experts say, could be just a year away.

WOULD AN ATTACK WORK?

The answer is yes and no.

No one is talking about a ground invasion of Iran. Too many U.S. troops are tied down elsewhere to make it possible, and besides, it isn't necessary. If the U.S. goal is simply to stunt Iran's nuclear program, it can be done better and more safely by air. An attack limited to Iran's nuclear facilities would nonetheless require a massive campaign. Experts say that Iran has between 18 and 30 nuclear-related facilities. The sites are dispersed around the country--some in the open, some cloaked in the guise of conventional factories, some buried deep underground.

A Pentagon official says that among the known sites there are 1,500 different "aim points," which means the campaign could well require the involvement of almost every type of aircraft in the U.S. arsenal: Stealth bombers and fighters, B-1s and B-2s, as well as F-15s and F-16s operating from land and F-18s from aircraft carriers.

GPS-guided munitions and laser-targeted bombs--sighted by satellite, spotter aircraft and unmanned vehicles--would do most of the bunker busting. But because many of the targets are hardened under several feet of reinforced concrete, most would have to be hit over and over to ensure that they were destroyed or sufficiently damaged. The U.S. would have to mount the usual aerial ballet, refueling tankers as well as search-and-rescue helicopters in case pilots were shot down by Iran's aging but possibly still effective air defenses. U.S. submarines and ships could launch cruise missiles as well, but their warheads are generally too small to do much damage to reinforced concrete--and might be used for secondary targets. An operation of that size would hardly be surgical. Many sites are in highly populated areas, so civilian casualties would be a certainty.

Whatever the order of battle, a U.S. strike would have a lasting impression on Iran's rulers. U.S. officials believe that a campaign of several days, involving hundreds or even thousands of sorties, could set back Iran's nuclear program by two to three years. Hit hard enough, some believe, Iranians might develop second thoughts about their government's designs as a regional nuclear power. Some U.S. foes of Iran's regime believe that the crisis of legitimacy that the ruling clerics would face in the wake of a U.S. attack could trigger their downfall, although others are convinced it would unite the population with the government in anti-American rage.

But it is also likely that the U.S. could carry out a massive attack and still leave Iran with some part of its nuclear program intact. It's possible that U.S. warplanes could destroy every known nuclear site--while Tehran's nuclear wizards, operating at other, undiscovered sites even deeper underground, continued their work. "We don't know where it all is," said a White House official, "so we can't get it all."

WHAT WOULD COME NEXT?

No one who has spent any time thinking about an attack on Iran doubts that a U.S. operation would reap a whirlwind. The only mystery is what kind. "It's not a question of whether we can do a strike or not and whether the strike could be effective," says retired Marine General Anthony Zinni. "It certainly would be, to some degree. But are you prepared for all that follows?"

Retired Air Force Colonel Sam Gardiner, who taught strategy at the National War College, has been conducting a mock U.S.-Iran war game for American policymakers for the past five years. Virtually every time he runs the game, Gardiner says, a similar nightmare scenario unfolds: the U.S. attack, no matter how successful, spawns a variety of asymmetrical retaliations by Tehran. First comes terrorism: Iran's initial reaction to air strikes might be to authorize a Hizballah attack on Israel, in order to draw Israel into the war and rally public support at home.

Next, Iran might try to foment as much mayhem as possible inside the two nations on its flanks, Afghanistan and Iraq, where more than 160,000 U.S. troops hold a tenuous grip on local populations. Iran has already dabbled in partnership with warlords in western Afghanistan, where U.S. military authority has never been strong; it would be a small step to lend aid to Taliban forces gaining strength in the south. Meanwhile, Tehran has links to the main factions in Iraq, which would welcome a boost in money and weapons, if just to strengthen their hand against rivals. Analysts generally believe that Iran could in a short time orchestrate a dramatic increase in the number and severity of attacks on U.S. troops in Iraq. As Syed Ayad, a secular Shi'ite cleric and Iraqi Member of Parliament says, "America owns the sky of Iraq with their Apaches, but Iran owns the ground."

Next, there is oil. The Persian Gulf, a traffic jam on good days, would become a parking lot. Iran could plant mines and launch dozens of armed boats into the bottleneck, choking off the shipping lanes in the Strait of Hormuz and causing a massive disruption of oil-tanker traffic. A low-key Iranian mining operation in 1987 forced the U.S. to reflag Kuwaiti oil tankers and escort them, in slow-moving files of one and two, up and down the Persian Gulf. A more intense operation would probably send oil prices soaring above $100 per bbl.--which may explain why the Navy wants to be sure its small fleet of minesweepers is ready to go into action at a moment's notice. It is unlikely that Iran would turn off its own oil spigot or halt its exports through pipelines overland, but it could direct its proxies in Iraq and Saudi Arabia to attack pipelines, wells and shipment points inside those countries, further choking supply and driving up prices.

That kind of retaliation could quickly transform a relatively limited U.S. mission in Iran into a much more complicated one involving regime change. An Iran determined to use all its available weapons to counterattack the U.S. and its allies would present a challenge to American prestige that no Commander in Chief would be likely to tolerate for long. Zinni, for one, believes an attack on Iran could eventually lead to U.S. troops on the ground. "You've got to be careful with your assumptions," he says. "In Iraq, the assumption was that it would be a liberation, not an occupation. You've got to be prepared for the worst case, and the worst case involving Iran takes you down to boots on the ground." All that, he says, makes an attack on Iran a "dumb idea." Abizaid, the current Centcom boss, chose his words carefully last May. "Look, any war with a country that is as big as Iran, that has a terrorist capability along its borders, that has a missile capability that is external to its own borders and that has the ability to affect the world's oil markets is something that everyone needs to contemplate with a great degree of clarity."

CAN IT BE STOPPED?

Given the chaos that a war might unleash, what options does the world have to avoid it? One approach would be for the U.S. to accept Iran as a nuclear power and learn to live with an Iranian bomb, focusing its efforts on deterrence rather than pre-emption. The risk is that a nuclear-armed Iran would use its regional primacy to become the dominant foreign power in Iraq, threaten Israel and make it harder for Washington to exert its will in the region. And it could provoke Sunni countries in the region, like Saudi Arabia and Egypt, to start nuclear programs of their own to contain rising Shi'ite power.

Those equally unappetizing prospects--war or a new arms race in the Middle East--explain why the White House is kicking up its efforts to resolve the Iran problem before it gets that far. Washington is doing everything it can to make Iran think twice about its ongoing game of stonewall. It is a measure of the Administration's unity on Iran that confrontationalists like Vice President Dick

Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld have lately not wandered off the rhetorical reservation. Everyone has been careful--for now--to stick to Rice's diplomatic emphasis. "Nobody is considering a military option at this point," says an Administration official. "We're trying to prevent a situation in which the President finds himself having to decide between a nuclear-armed Iran or going to war. The best hope of avoiding that dilemma is hard-nosed diplomacy, one that has serious consequences."

Rice continues to try for that. This week in New York City, she will push her partners to get behind a new sanctions resolution that would ban Iranian imports of dual-use technologies, like parts for its centrifuge cascades for uranium enrichment, and bar travel overseas by certain government officials. The next step would be restrictions on government purchases of computer software and hardware, office supplies, tires and auto parts--steps Russia and China have signaled some reluctance to endorse. But even Rice's advisers don't believe that Iran can be persuaded to completely abandon its ambitions. Instead, they hope to tie Iran up in a series of suspensions, delays and negotiations until a more pragmatic faction of leadership in Tehran gains the upper hand.

At the moment, that sounds as much like a prayer as a strategy. A former CIA director, asked not long ago whether a moderate faction will ever emerge in Tehran, quipped, "I don't think I've ever met an Iranian moderate--not at the top of the government, anyway." But if sanctions don't work, what might? Outside the Administration, a growing group of foreign-policy hands from both parties have called on the U.S. to bring Tehran into direct negotiations in the hope of striking a grand bargain. Under that formula, the U.S. might offer Iran some security guarantees-- such as forswearing efforts to topple Iran's theocratic regime--in exchange for Iran's agreeing to open its facilities to international inspectors and abandon weapons-related projects. It would be painful for any U.S. Administration to recognize the legitimacy of a regime that sponsors terrorism and calls for Israel's destruction--but the time may come when that's the only bargaining chip short of war the U.S. has left. And still that may not be enough. "[The Iranians] would give up nuclear power if they truly believed the U.S. would accept Iran as it is," says a university professor in Tehran who asked not to be identified. "But the mistrust runs too deep for them to believe that is possible."

Such distrust runs both ways and is getting deeper. Unless the U.S., its allies and Iran can find a way to make diplomacy work, the whispers of blockades and minesweepers in the Persian Gulf may soon be drowned out by the cries of war. And if the U.S. has learned anything over the past five years, it's that war in the Middle East rarely goes according to plan.

How Close Is Iran To Having Nuclear Weapons? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

American intel agencies appear to be pushing back against conservatives who claim that their judgments about Iran's nuclear program are not hair-raising enough. In a development that reminded some experts of the fights over prewar Iraq intel, hard-liners on the House intelligence committee last month produced a report declaring the U.S. intel community "needs to improve its analysis and collection" on Iran's WMD programs. A caption in the report even claimed that "Iran is currently enriching uranium to weapons grade."

Last week, however, the House committee assessment was slammed by U.N. nuclear experts, who pointed out that there's little evidence Iran is anywhere near producing weapons-grade uranium. And three U.S. officials familiar with recent intel reporting on Iran, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitive subject matter, said that U.S. agencies have not altered assessments that Iran is years away from producing a nuclear bomb. As two of the officials acknowledge, recent intel reporting indicates that if anything, technical problems are slowing down Iran's nuclear program. David Albright, a former U.N. WMD inspector and independent expert, told NEWSWEEK: "Iran's gas-centrifuge program is moving unexpectedly slowly. The program was expected to be much further along by this point." Albright says this assessment is supported by data produced by U.N. investigators; one of the government officials says that because U.N. inspectors still have some access to Iranian nuke facilities, their reporting is at least as good as info being produced by clandestine U.S. spies. Another of the U.S. officials said intel reports show Iran was experiencing significant problems with gyroscopes it has been trying to install on missiles that could deliver Iranian bombs to targets in the region and even further.

Officials in National Intelligence Director John Negroponte's office have told journalists that U.S. intel believes Iran will not be able to produce a nuke until about 2010 at the earliest, and perhaps not until 2015. A spokesman for Negroponte's office says intel agencies are now working on a new National Intelligence Estimate—a classified report laying out the consensus view of all agencies—about Iran's nuclear effort; the spokesman said that for the moment, the agencies' Iran nuke timeline was unchanged, "but we're researching it."

"We Do Not Need Attacks" (TIME)

By Scott Macleod

Time, September 18, 2006

TIME: What were your impressions of New York during your visit to the U.S. last year?

Ahmadinejad: Unfortunately we didn't have any contact with the people of the United States. We were not in touch with the people. But my general impression is that the people of the United States are good people. Everywhere in the world, people are good.

TIME: Did you visit the site of the World Trade Center?

Ahmadinejad: It was not necessary. It was widely covered in the media.

TIME: You recently invited President Bush to a televised debate. If he were sitting where I am sitting, what would you say, man to man?

Ahmadinejad: The issues which are of interest to us are the international issues and how to manage them. I gave some recommendations to President Bush in my personal letter, and I hope that he will take note of them. I would ask him, Are rationalism, spirituality and humanitarianism and logic—are they bad things for human beings? Why more conflict? Why should we go for hostilities? Why should we develop weapons of mass destruction? Everybody can love one another.

TIME: Do you feel any connection with President Bush, since he is also a religious man, a strong Christian?

Ahmadinejad: I've heard about that. But there are many things which take place and are inconsistent with the teachings of Jesus Christ in this world.

TIME: Why do your supporters chant "Death to America"?

Ahmadinejad: When they chanted that slogan, it means they hate aggression, and they hate bullying tactics, and they hate violations of the rights of nations and discrimination. I recommended to President Bush that he can change his behavior, then everything will change.

TIME: How do you think the American people feel when they hear Iranians shouting "Death to America" and the President of Iran does not criticize this?

Ahmadinejad: The nations do not have any problems. What is the role of the American people in what is happening in the world? The people of the United States are also seeking peace, love, friendship and justice.

TIME: But if Americans shouted "Death to Iran," Iranians would feel insulted.

Ahmadinejad: If the government of Iran acted in such a way, then [the American people] have this right.

TIME: Are America and Iran fated to be in conflict?

Ahmadinejad: No, this is not fate. And this can come to an end. I have said we can run the world through logic. We are living our own lives. The U.S. government should not interfere in our affairs. They should live their own lives. They should serve the interests of the U.S. people. They should not interfere in our affairs. Then there would be no problems with that.

TIME: Are you ready to open direct negotiations with the U.S.?

Ahmadinejad: We have given them a letter, a lengthy letter. We say the U.S. Administration should change its behavior, and then everything will be solved. It was the U.S. which broke up relations with us. We didn't take that position. And then they should make up for it.

TIME: Does Iran have the right to nuclear weapons?

Ahmadinejad: We are opposed to nuclear weapons. We think it has been developed just to kill human beings. It is not in the service of human beings. For that reason, last year in my address to the U.N. General Assembly, I suggested that a committee should be set up in order to disarm all the countries that possess nuclear weapons.

TIME: But you were attacked with weapons of mass destruction by Iraq. You say the u.s. threatens you, and you are surrounded by countries that have nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad: Today nuclear weapons are a blunt instrument. We don't have any problems with Pakistan or India. Actually they are friends of Iran, and throughout history they have been friends. The Zionist regime is not capable of using nuclear weapons. Problems cannot be solved through bombs. Bombs are of little use today. We need logic.

TIME: Why won't you agree to suspend enrichment of uranium as a confidence-building measure?

Ahmadinejad: Whose confidence should be built?

TIME: The world's?

Ahmadinejad: The world? The world? Who is the world? The United States? The U.S. Administration is not the entire world. Europe does not account for one-twentieth of the entire world. When I studied the provisions of the npt [Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty], nowhere did I see it written that in order to produce nuclear fuel, we need to win the support or the confidence of the United States and some European countries.

TIME: How far will Iran go in defying Western demands? Will you wait until you are attacked and your nuclear installations are destroyed?

Ahmadinejad: Do you think the u.s. administration would be so irrational?

TIME: You tell me.

Ahmadinejad: I hope that is not the case. I said that we need logic. We do not need attacks.

TIME: Are you worried about an attack?

Ahmadinejad: No.

TIME: You have been quoted as saying Israel should be wiped off the map. Was that merely rhetoric, or do you mean it?

Ahmadinejad: People in the world are free to think the way they wish. We do not insist they should change their views. Our position toward the Palestinian question is clear: we say that a nation has been displaced from its own land. Palestinian people are killed in their own lands, by those who are not original inhabitants, and they have come from far areas of the world and have occupied those homes. Our suggestion is that the 5 million Palestinian refugees come back to their homes, and then the entire people on those lands hold a referendum and choose their own system of government. This is a democratic and popular way. Do you have any other suggestions?

TIME: Do you believe the Jewish people have a right to their own state?

Ahmadinejad: We do not oppose it. In any country in which the people are ready to vote for the Jews to come to power, it is up to them. In our country, the Jews are living and they are represented in our Parliament. But Zionists are different from Jews.

TIME: Have you considered that Iranian Jews are hurt by your comments denying that 6 million Jews were killed in the Holocaust?

Ahmadinejad: As to the Holocaust, I just raised a few questions. And I didn't receive any answers to my questions. I said that during World War II, around 60 million were killed. All were human beings and had their own dignities. Why only 6 million? And if it had happened, then it is a historical event. Then why do they not allow independent research?

TIME: But massive research has been done.

Ahmadinejad: They put in prison those who try to do research. About historical events everybody should be free to conduct research. Let's assume that it has taken place. Where did it take place? So what is the fault of the Palestinian people? These questions are quite clear. We are waiting for answers.

Bush, Ahmadinejad To Wage War Of Words At U.N. (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 18, 2006

President Bush and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad deliver dueling speeches at the United Nations this week in what could become a dramatic showdown over Iran's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0063876

Bush has pledged to use his U.N. talk to send Iran a clear warning that it must heed a U.N. Security Council resolution calling on it to suspend its program to make nuclear fuel. Iran says its program is for peaceful purposes, while Bush says Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons.

"Part of my objective in New York is to remind people that stalling shouldn't be allowed," Bush said Friday. "We are firmly committed in our desire to send a common signal to the Iranian regime."

The two leaders are scheduled to speak hours apart Tuesday at the annual meeting of heads of state of the General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad challenged Bush to a debate last month. The White House rejected it as a publicity stunt and diversion from dealing with the nuclear issue. Their speeches may be the closest the two come to a debate.

Iran has emerged as a leading target in Bush's war on terrorism because of its nuclear program and support for militant groups, including Hezbollah in Lebanon.

The United States wants the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran because it refused to meet an Aug. 31 council deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

About 70 world leaders will address the General Assembly this week, but the focus will be on Bush and Ahmadinejad.

Bush said his U.N. speech will serve as a warning to Iran that "if they try to drag their feet or, you know, get us to look the other way, that we won't do that."

What Ahmadinejad might say is harder to predict. In the past year he has risen from a little-known Iranian hard-liner to one of Bush's chief antagonists.

Last year, in his debut on the diplomatic scene, Ahmadinejad stunned the General Assembly with a speech assailing the United States and calling for the return of the Twelfth Imam, a revered Shiite Muslim figure whose coming is akin to Judgment Day.

He later told an Iranian cleric that he felt an "aura" of holiness surrounding him during the speech and claimed that the audience sat rapt for half an hour "as if a hand held them there (and) made them sit."

It's also possible Ahmadinejad could use his address this week to make a conciliatory gesture. Last week in Senegal, he said Iran is "ready for new conditions" on the nuclear issue. He did not give details.

The Iranian president is scheduled to arrive in New York City today following a visit with Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, another Bush antagonist.

Ahmadinejad is subordinate to Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, but his stature and notoriety have grown in the past year. He has denied that the Holocaust happened, threatened Israel and asserted Iran's right to pursue its nuclear program.

Malcolm Hoenlein, vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, said thousands will attend a rally across from the U.N. on Wednesday to "reject his hatred and his threats to the United States and Israel."

"He's far more powerful than we anticipated when he was elected," said Karim Sadjadpour, an Iran expert at the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization. "Everyone assumed he would focus on the domestic economy and defer to his elders on foreign policy."

Events in the region have strengthened Iranian hard-liners in the past year. A pro-Iranian Shiite government came to power in Iraq; an Iranian-backed Palestinian faction, Hamas, won parliamentary elections; and Iran's Lebanese proxy, Hezbollah, withstood a month of Israeli attacks. The United States considers Hezbollah a terrorist group.

At home, Ahmadinejad has bolstered his position by appointing fellow veterans of the hard-line Revolutionary Guard as provincial governors and Cabinet ministers. The regime has become increasingly repressive, arresting professors and closing newspapers.

Last week, the government shut a moderate newspaper, Shargh, after it published a cartoon portraying a donkey facing a knight on a chessboard. The donkey had a halo of light around it, an apparent reference to Ahmadinejad's remark about the "aura" he felt around him at the U.N.

Bush To UN: An Agenda For Freedom (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0063877

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

When President Bush speaks to the United Nations General Assembly here this week, he will studiously avoid Iran's President Mahmoud Amadinejad.

And Mr. Bush probably won't take up the controversial leader's challenge to the American president to face him in a "civilizational debate."

But Bush does plan to lay out his vision for the world, including an elaboration of his "freedom agenda" and the role of democracy in building global security, when he addresses the 192-country assembly Tuesday.

In that sense, the global airing and weighing of two distinct visions is already on. The president "will stress the United States' commitment to a broad international agenda that recognizes the connection between freedom, democracy, prosperity, counterterrorism, and security," according to the White House.

Focusing on the Middle East as "the main battle ground" in the struggle for freedom, according to a senior administration official, Bush will outline two tasks the international community must take on in the region: "to help people who don't have freedom achieve this," the official says, "and to help people with weak but democratically elected governments strengthen their institutions."

From his corner, Mr. Ahmadinejad - who has been busy lambasting the West and primarily the US and Britain as the major sources of the world's ills, while arguing for the rise of new world powers - will also no doubt offer his own perspectives during his stay in New York.

One question is whether the US, as the sole superpower and in particular as the leader of the widely unpopular war in Iraq, can even get a fair hearing in the world today.

"The fact is this debate has already started, and there is no way either side can think people out there - and I mean all around the world - aren't listening," says Michael Doyle, a former senior United Nations official now at Columbia University in New York. "Without it being face to face, [Bush] should take on some of the challenges that Ahmadinejad has posed to America and the West, like human rights as part of the global agenda, or the tension between sovereign rights and multilateral principles."

The US has not done enough to take the case for free and democratic societies to the world under the Bush administration, Mr. Doyle says, although he does see some greater effort in the president's second term.

The White House appears to agree that the US is already in this ideological debate, if not with Ahmadinejad himself, then with what it sees as the antidemocratic and extremist forces holding the region back.

"The president will lay out ... the bright democratic future we see" for the Middle East "in contradistinction to some who have an almost backward-looking vision for the region," says the senior administration official, who spoke on condition he would remain unnamed.

But will other world leaders be receptive to his message? A survey released by the German Marshall Fund earlier this month showed US esteem falling. It asked Europeans if the US should exert strong leadership in the world. Five years ago, 64 percent of those surveyed said, 'Yes." Today, that figure is 37 percent. At the same time, Bush will stride into the UN General Assembly hall a weakened and challenged president at home.

The current controversy in the US over the conduct of the war on terror, and treatment of detainees accused of terrorism, is a case in point. Bush wants to convince the world of the need to combat terrorism, but a growing list of prominent personalities in and out of government say his credibility on these issues is undermined if America is seen to be violating its own principles and riding roughshod on the world for its own security. And that could mean long-lasting consequences, they add, such as key countries' flagging willingness to cooperate with the US.

Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, encapsulated that concern in a letter addressed to Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, in which he says the US could pay a high cost if an administration proposal to redefine the application of certain principles of the Geneva Conventions is adopted.

In the letter, which was the talk of Washington over the weekend, Mr. Powell says, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," adding that it would also endanger US troops captured by our enemies. Aides say Mr. McCain says the proposal violates "our [American] values."

That controversy erupted amid other signs that the US position in the world is politically weakened - in particular by the war in Iraq. "Iraq has become the shorthand summary of American foreign policy, and until that changes, it will be hard for the president or anyone to resonate much with the world," says James McCormick, a professor of US foreign policy at Ohio State University in Ames.

At a press conference here last week, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan said the leaders he visited during a recent tour of the Middle East were torn over whether the US should stay in Iraq or plan to leave. But as for the consequences of the US invasion, Mr. Annan said he encountered no similar ambivalence in the region. "Most of the leaders felt that the invasion of Iraq and its aftermath have been a real disaster for them," Annan said. "They believe it has destabilized the region."

Ohio's Mr. McCormick says that "a broader agenda," clearly parting ways with the administration's trademark unilateralist approach to foreign policy, could begin to open international ports to US initiatives - and Bush's vision.

And administration officials say that is just what will happen. During Bush's visit to the UN, he will spotlight certain countries - Malaysia, for example, as a successful melding of Islam and democracy, and El Salvador, as once torn by death squads and an insurgency but now a functioning democracy that's contributing to global peacekeeping efforts.

Bush will also host a meeting of leaders from democratic states and civil society organizations involved in building institutions in weak democracies.

Europeans Trying To Grease Wheels For U.S. Talks With Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 17 -- European efforts to get Iran and the United States around the same negotiating table are at an advanced yet sensitive stage, with a small number of remaining differences to be tackled this week when world leaders gather at the United Nations, according to several American, Iranian and European officials involved.

President Bush plans to make Iran a centerpiece of his speech Tuesday before the U.N. General Assembly, explaining to the annual meeting of presidents and prime ministers why he regards the Tehran government as a grave threat yet is willing to support negotiations to ease those concerns.

For four years, Bush has sought, without success, to roll back an Iranian nuclear energy program that perhaps could be diverted for bombmaking. While many of his allies share suspicions of a secret Iranian effort, they have also been wary of supporting a U.S. president who has invaded two countries in the past five years and who has said that "all options are on the table" for Iran.

At last year's U.N. gathering, Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spent several days trying to persuade key allies to move the Iran issue into the U.N. Security Council, where the United States has more leverage to press for sanctions. They were unsuccessful then, but six months later, after additional diplomacy and poor cooperation from Iran, the issue was put on the council's agenda. Now, the president and his top diplomat will meet with allies again -- this time to discuss prospects for talks as well as options if those do not materialize.

"We want this to happen, we want negotiations," a senior administration official said Sunday on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "But we're not there yet."

Rice dined here Sunday evening with Javier Solana, the senior European Union official who has been trying to broker talks between Tehran and the Bush administration. Solana will meet with Iran's nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, later in the week.

Officials who have been briefed on Solana's efforts said he is waiting for Larijani to deliver a firm commitment from his government to halt its uranium enrichment program. Larijani has suggested a temporary suspension, but it is unclear whether he can get Iran's various political factions to agree to that approach. If a deal is reached, U.S. diplomats will join group talks with European powers, Russia, China and Iran to discuss Tehran's energy needs and the future of its nuclear program.

Several administration officials expressed skepticism, however, that Larijani would be able to secure that commitment. They said the administration has not made preparations for talks, such as formalizing a negotiating team or outlining guiding principles for discussion. If Iran fails to put its nuclear program on ice, even temporarily, the administration will continue to lobby allies to impose economic sanctions.

"I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program," Bush said at a news conference Thursday. But, he said, "they need to understand we're firm in our commitment and that if they try to drag their feet or, you know, get us to look the other way, then we won't do that."

Iranian officials are seeking assurances of their own.

Through Solana and other mediators, they have said it would be hard for them to sit down with a U.S. administration that is seen as threatening the Iranian leadership. Two Bush administration officials and several European negotiators said the security issue has been a major sticking point for Iran but that efforts to resolve it are serious.

"Sitting down with Washington at the same table," said one European diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity, "is the best guarantee. Both sides sitting down together is extraordinary in itself."

Officials noted that Bush refrained last week from characterizing Iran as a "grave threat," as he did last month. But he ruled out the possibility of a meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmedinejad. The Iranian leader is scheduled to address the United Nations on Tuesday, hours after Bush.

Tuesday evening, Rice will dine with the foreign ministers of France, Britain, Germany, Russia, China and Italy to discuss Iran.

France, Britain and Germany have committed to push for sanctions against Iran if it does not halt its uranium enrichment program, but the Europeans are also eager to find a route to negotiations and have been holding low-level talks with the Iranians for months.

In an effort to avoid a standoff over whether the United States or Iran will make the next move toward talks, diplomats said it is possible that European foreign ministers will meet with Larijani during the week in New York, effectively kicking off negotiations, followed by an Iranian suspension of its nuclear program and then U.S. participation.

Other E.U. members have strongly supported talks, rather than punitive measures, noting that Iran's technical progress on its nuclear program has been marginal, while its position as a major oil exporter gives Tehran significant leverage to batter their economies.

Russia, China, Japan, India and Italy -- influential countries with billions of dollars of investments in Iran's oil and gas industry -- have been particularly reluctant to back sanctions.

But all parties, including Russia and China -- two of Iran's closest economic partners -- have publicly said that Tehran must suspend its nuclear program for talks to begin.

Iran quit negotiations with the Europeans a year ago and restarted a uranium program that it insists is designed to produce only nuclear energy. In an effort to coax Iran back to the negotiating table, Rice announced in May that the United States will participate in resumed talks if Iran again suspends uranium enrichment.

Iran's nuclear program began in 1987 in secret and is under investigation by U.N. nuclear inspectors with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Inspectors have not found proof of a weapons program but have said they are unable -- mostly because of a lack of Iranian cooperation -- to confirm that the program is exclusively peaceful.

Iran this year produced trace amounts of low-enriched uranium, suitable only for an energy program, and has said it has no intention of producing highly enriched uranium. U.S. intelligence estimates report that Iran is as much as a decade away from being able to produce the amount and quality of highly enriched uranium that could be used for a nuclear weapon.

US Urges Allies To Increase Pressure On Iran (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Chris Giles And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063880

The US is seeking to increase economic pressure on Iran, even as its partners in the European Union talk to the Islamic Republic about beginning formal negotiations on Tehran's nuclear programme.

Hank Paulson, the new US Treasury secretary, is personally lobbying finance ministers and central bank governors to ensure their national financial systems are not used by Iranian entities involved in proliferation or terrorism finance.

But his efforts have irritated some European officials, who have objected to what they see as Washington's moves to impose sanctions on Iran through the back door.

The EU has joined with the US in threatening sanctions against Tehran unless it scales down its nuclear programme. But the bloc is also conducting a diplomatic push to open negotiations as an alternative to sanctions – which, in any case, face serious obstacles at the UN.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank in Singapore, Mr Paulson said Iran abused the global financial system to "procure technology that is going to aid in the production of weapons of mass destruction" and is "actively invol-ved in financing terrorists".

He added that the US had evidence that "blue chip banks" as well as other financial institutions were being used by an Iranian network of "more than 30 front companies".

The US has dispatched Treasury officials around the world to share declassified intelligence with foreign regulators on Iran's alleged abuse of the global financial system and to warn banks against becoming inadvertently involved.

The US Treasury secretary said the campaign was "nothing more than an educational briefing".

But EU officials refused to add any specific reference to Iran in a group of seven leading economies communiqué on Saturday, indicating instead that the US should name the front companies so that action could be taken.

Iran denies having or making weapons of mass des-truction. In addition, the EU also does not classify Hizbollah, the Islamist group allied to Tehran, as a terrorist organisation.

Joaquín Almunia, the Europan economic and monetary affairs commissioner, said: "As far as I know the Iran war was not on the G7 communiqué."

Any moves towards imposing UN sanctions on Iran are complicated by resistance from Russia and China, which have economic ties to Tehran and reiterated their reservations at the weekend.

Against such a backdrop, the US has sought to bring together a "coalition of concerned countries" to impose financial restrictions on Iran. Since the key players in such a coalition would be the EU and Japan, the natural forum is the G7.

But at present, the EU is in talks with Tehran over a possible deal on the nuclear file, in which Iran would suspend uranium enrichment at the same time as formal negotiations began.

Javier Solana, EU foreign policy chief, is due to meet Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear security official, this week in New York. If that goes well, a foreign ministers meeting could be held to begin formal negotiations. This would involve Iran, the EU, Russia and China – but not the US.

Chirac Urges World To Keep Iran Talking (DLYTEL)

By From Correspondents In Paris

Daily Telegraph, September 18, 2006

FRENCH President Jacques Chirac has urged world powers not to refer Iran to the UN Security Council over its nuclear program, at the same time calling on Tehran to give up uranium enrichment.

"First we have to find an agenda for negotiation, then engage the negotiation and during that negotiation I propose that on the one hand the six refrain from referring the issue to the Security Council and that Iran renounce during the negotiation the enrichment of uranium," he said.

The six nations running talks with Tehran are the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany.

It was the first time a European leader has clearly stated that the suspension of uranium enrichment is not a "precondition" for opening talks on the nuclear dossier.

Mr Chirac indicated that the suspension should come during rather than before negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0063881

"We can find solutions via dialogue," said Mr Chirac, who heads later to New York for the UN's General Assembly.

Iran's nuclear program will be at the centre of discussions on the sidelines of the assembly, with the aim of obtaining an end to uranium enrichment or failing that a consensus on possible sanctions.

Mr Chirac said that he was "never a supporter of sanctions" and had "never noticed that sanctions are effective".

However he added that he "did not mean that we must not have sanctions - which if it comes to it must be moderate and well-adapted".

The US is preparing a list of possible sanctions - such as travel bans and economic measures - to take if Iran refuses to suspend enrichment of uranium.

However Beijing and Moscow are reluctant to follow the sanctions path.

Asked about the attitude of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Mr Chirac said he "condemned in the clearest possible way the Iranian President's systematically anti-Israeli remarks".

On a possible meeting with Mr Ahmadinejad, Mr Chirac said that "nothing is planned" and "the conditions are not in place for a personal dialogue, given the Iranian President's comments concerning a country in the region".

World powers suspect Iran of trying to develop a nuclear weapon, though Tehran insists its program is for purely civilian use.

President Relenting On Value Of U.N. (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

President Bush, who once said the United Nations was teetering on the brink of irrelevancy and demanded it show some backbone, has increasingly turned to the organization for international problem-solving, even as most Americans think the body has outlived its usefulness.

On issues from North Korea to Iran to Sudan, the president, who arrives in New York today to attend the U.N. General Assembly's annual meeting, has deferred to the United Nations to drive action. Critics say Mr. Bush has been forced to become more multilateral after bucking the world body by invading Iraq, but administration officials assert that the United Nations remains a useful tool to spur foreign leaders to step in on major issues.

"This business about 'Our relationship is so bad' and 'We can't get anything done,' when you look at it, we actually have a fairly smart record of achievement," one senior administration official told The Washington Times last week. "We've gotten resolutions on some pretty serious issues where nobody thought we could get them."

But it remains the enforcement of those resolutions that so frustrated Mr. Bush in 2002, when the U.S. led a coalition of nations to oust Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. Four years ago, he asked, "Will the United Nations serve the purpose of its founding, or will it be irrelevant?"

Mr. Bush continues to have doubts about the organization. On Friday, he said, "I think a lot of Americans are frustrated with the United Nations, to be frank with you." He cited inaction over Sudan, where genocide has left an estimated half-million people dead.

"The problem is that the United Nations hasn't acted. And so I can understand why those who are concerned about Darfur are frustrated. I am."

He is not alone. A poll released last week shows nearly three-quarters of Americans think the United Nations is no longer effective and would support cutting U.S. contributions to it. In fact, 57 percent of those surveyed by the Hudson Institute said they agreed that "if the U.N. cannot be reformed and made more effective, it should be scrapped."

The United States will spend more than $1 billion this year on international organizations, much of it through the United Nations. Some lawmakers on Capitol Hill have sought to tie continued U.S. contributions to the implementation of reform at the world body, but the White House has fought most measures.

Still, since his assessment that the United Nations was becoming irrelevant, the president has sought to employ the body when faced with criticism that he is intent on running roughshod over world consensus. Internationally, this approach has been seen as hypocritical, as when U.N. Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown said in June that the Bush administration is engaged in "stealth diplomacy" by working with the organization on a number of issues, but blasting it publicly.

The White House official last week sought to downplay the president's earlier criticism, saying he was merely warning the United Nations over a simple concept.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said the United Nations continues to be the model of inaction, failing to follow through on its resolutions. For example, he cited North Korea's test-firing of missiles on July 4 as proof that the body is all talk.

"The entire 'civilized world' declared in midsummer that it would be 'unacceptable' for North Korea to fire missiles," he said. "They deliberately fired seven missiles on our national holiday as a way of showing how much total contempt they had for us."

The organization has proven itself ineffectual time and again, said Mr. Gingrich, citing the corrupt Iraqi oil-for-food program, continued kleptocracy, and the decision to put the world's worst offenders on its Human Rights Council.

"I think we should be actively trying to create alternative institutions that matter," he said. "I think we should take virtually nothing to the Security Council."

Annan, Bush On 2 Sides Of Policy Divide (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan say they get along fine on a personal level. It's the issues, from the Iraq war to nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea, that divide them.

These foreign policy challenges are on the agenda this week as Bush makes his annual trek to New York City to address the U.N. General Assembly. Bush's three-day trip, starting today, includes meetings with at least nine world leaders.

He plans to discuss efforts to promote democracy in Iraq, the greater Middle East and beyond. “The civilized world must stand with moderate, reformist-minded people and help them realize their dreams,” Bush said at a news conference Friday.

Bush's remarks underscored lingering U.S.-U.N. tensions. The president said the U.N. has been slow to address growing violence in the Darfur region of the Sudan and again questioned the institution's stewardship of its finances.

“I think a lot of Americans are frustrated with the United Nations, to be frank with you,” Bush said.

Annan, at a news conference of his own last week, cited the biggest conflict of them all: Iraq. Asked about a recent visit to the Middle East, Annan said, “Most of the leaders I spoke to felt that the invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them.” Annan added, “In a way, the U.S. has found itself in the position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave.”

The secretary-general said his overall relations with the Bush administration “are very good,” including with the president himself. For his part, Bush said of Annan: “I like him. And we've got a good relationship, personal relationship.”

Bush's relationship with the U.N. as an institution, however, has been “back-and-forth,” foreign-policy analyst Stephen Schlesinger says. Through Bush's presidency, his annual speeches first commanded support for the invasion of Afghanistan in 2001 but then failed to persuade the world community to back him for the invasion of Iraq in the years following. In his second term, he has tried to move toward conciliation.

Since disagreeing on Iraq, Schlesinger said, both sides have tried to work together on Iran, Sudan, North Korean nuclear weapons, and other items likely to surface this week. “It's simply impossible to obtain your objectives without allies,” said Schlesinger, author of Act of Creation: The Founding of the United Nations.

Still, he noted that Bush's decision to name John Bolton, a fierce U.N. critic, as ambassador had riled anti-U.S. feelings at the world body.

Charles Kupchan, an international relations specialist at Georgetown University, said Bush has tried to turn around his relationship with the U.N. in recent years, but he still faces challenges. One is the approach to terrorism, which Bush and aides cast as a struggle between liberal democracy and “Islamo-fascism.”

“The rest of the world just doesn't see it that way,” he said.

While acknowledging the opposition of some allies to the Iraq war, Bush also stresses that there are global coalitions on a variety of other fronts: helping the new democracy in Afghanistan, stopping the spread of nuclear weapons materials, and sharing financial information to help track terrorist groups.

Bush said there is general agreement within the U.N. to stop the violence in Darfur and to deny Iran the ability to make a nuclear weapon. But members are divided on whether to send a U.N. military force to Darfur, or slap economic sanctions on Iran if it continues to refuse suspension of a uranium enrichment program.

Bush is scheduled to address the General Assembly on Tuesday. The nine one-on-one meetings include Annan, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. The president will also host a roundtable on democracy with other world leaders.

Bush said Friday he's looking forward to the trip. “It's always an interesting experience for a West Texas fellow to speak to the United Nations,” he said.

Hezbollah Chief Plans 'Victory Rally' (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

Hezbollah's leader called Sunday for a massive rally in Beirut's bombed out southern suburbs to mark the militant group's "victory" over Israel during the monthlong fighting this summer.

Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said the rally, to be held Friday evening, would show Hezbollah's "absolute commitment to our right to recover our land and prisoners and defend our nation, its dignity, freedom, sovereignty and real and full independence in the face of (Israeli) occupation."

"I call on all of you to participate in this victory rally," he said in a brief, televised speech broadcast on Hezbollah's Al-Manar TV station.

Nasrallah went into hiding on July 12, the start of the 34-day war, and has not been seen publicly since. He did not say whether he would take part personally in the rally.

He has hinted in interviews that he would appear at some point, possibly at a rally, but did not say when for security reasons.

Friday's event would mark only the second large-scale Hezbollah rally in its stronghold, the Lebanese capital's southern suburbs, since fighting ended more than a month ago.

Such rallies and parades during which Nasrallah gave fiery speeches to hundreds of thousands of supporters were common before hostilities erupted.

The fighting, triggered by Hezbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid, has given way to a political struggle between the Western-backed government and Hezbollah as Lebanese troops try to establish control over the south of the country, the Islamic militant group's stronghold.

Nasrallah said the rally would "celebrate the divine and historic victory over the Zionists — the enemies of Lebanon and the nation" and "honor and thank all those who supported the resistance" during the Israeli offensive.

Israel Forms Committee To Investigate Lebanon War (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 17 — The Israeli government established a committee on Sunday to investigate the political and military leadership’s handling of the recent war in Lebanon, which has come under intense public criticism in the month since the fighting ended.

In Israel, which expects swift and decisive military victories, many citizens say that the military campaign in Lebanon was poorly planned and executed, and that leaders should be held accountable. Israel could not halt the rocket fire into northern Israel by the Lebanese group Hezbollah, and it has not achieved the return of two soldiers Hezbollah captured in the cross-border raid on July 12 that ignited the monthlong conflict.

The committee “will examine the political leadership and the security echelon regarding all aspects of the campaign in Lebanon,” Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet at the beginning of its weekly session.

The cabinet voted 20 to 2 for the committee, which will be led by a retired judge, Eliyahu Winograd.

However, dozens of protesters outside the prime minister’s office demanded that the investigation be carried out by a state commission. Such a commission would have greater power and be seen as more independent because it would be appointed by a Supreme Court judge instead of by the government it was investigating.

DOJ_NMG_0063884

Mr. Olmert defended the cabinet decision, saying the committee would have the powers of a state commission, allowing it to subpoena witnesses and order police searches.

Many Israelis, including a large number of disgruntled reserve soldiers, have been demanding an inquiry since the fighting ended Aug. 14. Mr. Olmert has faced some of the harshest criticism, and his popularity has plummeted.

Critics have also called for the resignations of Defense Minister Amir Peretz and the military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz. Last week, Maj. Gen. Udi Adam, who commanded the Israeli forces in northern Israel and southern Lebanon, submitted his resignation, the first senior figure to quit because of the war.

With an international peacekeeping force deploying in southern Lebanon, Israel has withdrawn from most of the positions it held when the fighting ended, though it still has troops in a number of places across the border.

On Sunday, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, left on a trip that will take him to the United Nations this week for the opening of the General Assembly. His absence puts on hold talks about a national unity government for the Palestinians, which had been marked by increasing friction.

Mr. Abbas wanted an agreement locked up before he left so he could appeal to Western leaders to restore the financial assistance that was cut after the militant group Hamas came to power in the spring.

Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement and Hamas say they remain committed to the unity government, but they have traded sharp words in recent days.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, a former information minister who is part of Mr. Abbas's delegation, said the internal Palestinian talks were in a state of crisis. He said Hamas needed to accept previous agreements between the Palestinians and the Israelis, or a new government would not win international acceptance.

"We want clarifications from Hamas," Mr. Abed Rabbo said in a telephone interview from Jordan, where Mr. Abbas was Sunday. "Hamas is affecting the credibility of the president and undermining his efforts to approach the international community."

Hamas said that its position had not changed, and that it still refused to recognize Israel. Western countries have demanded the Palestinian Authority government recognize Israel as one condition for restoring aid.

"We don't recognize Israel," Sami Abu Zuhri, a Hamas spokesman, said at a news conference on Sunday in Gaza City. "If such a position is a problem, then we consider that an honor. We want to break the siege by the West, but the price should not be abandoning the Palestinian interests."

Hamas officials say they believe talks with Mr. Abbas and Fatah will resume when the president returns.

Israeli Government Panel To Probe War (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Cabinet on Sunday approved a committee to investigate the government's handling of the recent war in Lebanon but rejected protesters' calls for an independent inquiry.

Amid broad dissatisfaction in Israel over the outcome of the conflict with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon, the question of whether to conduct an investigation, and of what kind, had become a political battle.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert favored a government inquiry; others, including Defense Minister Amir Peretz, advocated an independent commission that was seen as more likely to conduct a rigorous investigation.

Peretz, leader of the left-leaning Labor Party, in the end joined Olmert in a 20-to-2 Cabinet vote to approve a five-member panel named by the prime minister. Peretz said he was satisfied that the panel would have sufficient authority.

The inquiry will be headed by a retired judge, Eliyahu Winograd, and will examine the performance of Israeli political leaders and the military during the 34-day conflict. Israelis were left bitter over a range of issues, including the wisdom of a costly last-minute ground offensive and the military's inability to crush Hezbollah forces before a United Nations cease-fire took effect Aug. 14.

Olmert rejected demands for an independent commission, which by law would enjoy wide authority in deciding the scope of its inquiry, summoning officials for questioning and issuing recommendations. Such panels have looked into political controversies, and their findings have led to the firing of top public officials.

Olmert said such an investigation would take too long. Critics charged that he sought a whitewash.

"I sincerely hope that the committee will conclude its work as soon as possible and assist the state of Israel in better preparing for future challenges," Olmert said at the start of the weekly Cabinet session.

He said the panel would be granted authority equal to that of an independent commission.

Protesters have called for the resignations of Olmert, Peretz and Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, the army chief of staff. On Sunday, demonstrators carried placards and mocked the trio outside the prime minister's office.

Reserve soldiers who served in Lebanon and other critics have said the campaign was plagued by changing battle plans, poor preparation and shortages of combat gear, food and drinking water. Peretz has acknowledged failures. The inquiry's outcome could quell public anger toward Israel's leaders or fuel it.

Israel has slowly withdrawn its troops from south Lebanon, after an incursion triggered July 12 when Hezbollah militants captured two Israeli soldiers, who are still unaccounted for. Officials said they would pull out the rest of their forces once the international force and Lebanese army were in place, as called for under the cease-fire.

"When they're ready to come in, we'll be ready to leave," Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said Sunday.

Public support for Olmert and Peretz soared at the outset of the war but tumbled as it went on. Weakened politically, Olmert has shelved his central plan: drawing permanent national borders, with or without negotiations with Palestinian leaders, in a way that would require tens of thousands of Jewish settlers to withdraw from the West Bank.

In recent days, Olmert has said he was willing to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who has repeatedly called for new talks.

Abbas was en route Sunday to a U.N. General Assembly session to seek backing for new peace moves and for his Fatah group's plans to form a unity government with the ruling Hamas movement. The two parties said last week they would join hands in hopes of breaking an international aid embargo against Hamas that has dried up the Palestinian treasury.

Palestinian officials said Abbas planned to meet with President Bush on the sidelines of the session amid signs of discord in efforts by Fatah and Hamas to forge a government.

Hamas leaders Sunday denied reports by Fatah officials that Abbas had suspended coalition talks because Hamas refused to meet the West's conditions for resuming aid: recognizing Israel, pledging an end to the use of violence and accepting agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said negotiations over the proposed government would resume after Abbas returned.

Abbas wants Palestinian militants, including Hamas fighters, to release Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit before Fatah joins in a unity government. Shalit was captured June 25 in southern Israel and taken to the Gaza Strip, which led to the ongoing Israeli military incursion into the seaside territory.

Reports in several Arabic newspapers have said agreement was near on a prisoner swap with Israel. Palestinian officials did not comment, though unnamed Israeli officials were quoted in local media as saying that no deal was imminent.

Islamists' Rise Imperils Mideast's Order (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

CAIRO, Sept. 17 — President Bashar al-Assad has allowed Hamas safe haven in Syria. He has provided support to Hezbollah and castigated Arab leaders as "half men" for failing to press for a quick end to the war in Lebanon.

But even Syria has been unable to avoid being pulled into the struggle taking place in the Middle East between the traditional centers of power, like Damascus and Cairo, and opposition forces, particularly radical Islamists, that increasingly challenge them and try to force them to adopt more anti-Western, pro-Islamist policies.

The foiled terrorist attacks last week were directed against the United States Embassy in Damascus, but the very presence of armed Islamist terror groups within Syria — a country governed by Alawites, a minority sect of Islam — was troubling to the authorities there. And it followed a similarly foiled attack against a government building three months earlier.

"The fact that the Syrian regime is perceived as anti the United States does not save Syria from becoming a target of the jihadists," said Adnan Abu-Odeh, a former political adviser to King Hussein of Jordan, "because the jihadists in principle are against these regimes for ideological reasons."

The signs of the dynamic are piling up. In Egypt, the authorities said recently that they broke up a terrorist cell, detaining about 100 people suspected of adopting Al Qaeda's ideology. In Jordan, 15 Islamists who are members of Parliament recently threatened to resign. On Friday, four terrorists were killed as they tried to attack an oil plant in Yemen.

From Cairo, to Rabat, Morocco, to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, the order that emerged after World War II — long accustomed to encouraging domestic anger against Israel — has seen its influence and grip on power challenged in the wave of instability washing across the Middle East. That has roughly coincided with the rise of the insurgency in Iraq.

This region has long been defined by conflict, and leaders are unafraid to use force to crush opposition. But the current level of instability has unnerved them. They are not about to be toppled, not as long as they retain firm control over their security operations. But they find themselves fighting to maintain stability and credibility, political analysts said.

"The ruling regimes cannot disregard or dismiss the influence of Islamist movements in their countries," said Gamal Abdel-Gawwad, who runs the International Relations unit at the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

The empowerment of the Islamists has been propelled by events large and small — the occupation of Iraq, Israel's war with Hezbollah, the United States' support for Israel in that war, Danish cartoons lampooning the Prophet Muhammad, and most recently comments about Islam made by Pope Benedict XVI.

The pope issued an apology on Sunday, but the angry initial response served to highlight a dynamic years in the making that many political analysts say helped to lay the groundwork for the current rise of support for Islamic groups and radicalism.

Struggling to strip credibility from Islamic groups, Middle Eastern governments long tried to take the lead in defending what are perceived as Islamic values, while simultaneously trying to crush organizations that defined themselves as Islamic, like the Muslim Brotherhood. That, analysts said, created societies that are more religious — and more distrustful of their nonreligious governments.

"Progressive people like us, we were closed down," said the feminist Egyptian author Nawal al-Sadawi in an interview last fall. "My books were censored. Men and women who were secular and progressive were silenced, and they gave space more and more to religious people. They were competing. They were saying, 'We know God more than you,' and this is a very dangerous game."

The pressures on Arab governments — those close to the West and those opposing it — are increasingly clear. In July and August, the Egyptian government arrested about 100 people it said had formed a Qaeda-inspired cell, mostly in the northern city of Alexandria, said Mamdouh Ismail, an Islamist and lawyer who said he was working with many of those now in custody. He said the suspects had not been charged, and he insisted they were not guilty.

But he added that events like the attempted attack on the embassy in Damascus were unsurprising. "The people embrace their Arab-Muslim identity and feel an injustice is done upon them in more than one place — Iraq, Palestine, Darfur, Afghanistan, Lebanon," he said. "And that's why there are these kinds of reactions. There has to be a reaction. And there are exaggerations in the reactions because there is an excess of weakness on the part of the regimes."

In Jordan, the government recently sentenced two members of Parliament to prison for attending a mourning ceremony for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq who was killed by an American bomb. The 15 members of the Islamic Action Front, the political arm of the Muslim Brotherhood in Jordan, all threatened to resign — which could have caused a political crisis for King Abdullah II.

The members backed down from their threat, in part to preserve the organization's "ability to influence society," said Rohile Gharaibeh, the deputy secretary General of the Islamic Action Front in Jordan.

The attacks in Damascus were also evidence that Syria has been unable to neutralize the growing radicalism within its own borders. Muhammad Habbash, a member of the Syrian Parliament who is director of the reformist Islamic Studies Center in Damascus, said that part of the reason Syria had taken such a tough line toward Washington was to help head off the influence of radical currents in Syria.

"So Syria's objecting position is not only to challenge but to avoid problems inside," he said. But it has not worked. "It still happened," he said of the recent attacks.

The Arab League, which is the institutional face of the status quo, representing 22 Arab states, has decided to try to re-establish stability by trying to renew the peace process between Israelis and Palestinians.

"There is increased instability in the region, you see it all around you," said a senior Arab League diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "The core issue is the Palestinian issue in our opinion. Frustration is building upon frustration, from what's happening in Palestine, Iraq, and what happened in Lebanon."

Wahhabi Colonialism (WSJ)

By Melik Kaylan

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Pope Benedict XVI recently cited a Byzantine-era critique of Islam, and the usual hubbub of outrage ensued. Various self-appointed and official Islamic spokesmen (they're always men), including the head of Turkey's religious affairs directorate (why does Turkey have one?), responded sharply in the name of their faith. One might argue that a confident, evolved religion welcomes all kinds of open debate. Or one might intone gravely that the West continues to mishandle its relations with the umma -- the sphere of active Muslim believers -- with the implied assumption that there is such a unified entity of tens of millions, and that they all feel outrage in the same way at the same time. Islamist polemicists, in particular, cherish the archaic umma concept, evoking, as it does, a premodern utopia of monolithic harmony.

Many in the West buy the notion, with its familiar en bloc echoes of the proletariat. But should the rest of us believe them? Do we insult Muslims by buying into it, too, or insult them the more by considering it antiquated and bogus?

Mishandling and misinterpreting Muslim sentiments appears to be a habit we acquired in the post-Soviet age. Until then the West couldn't go wrong. We didn't need to know too much about radical Islam because we knew this much: Marxism was a shared enemy because it imposed atheism on subject populations, and primitive Islamic fervor worked in our favor. During the Cold War years, the West did indeed encourage the spread of a unitary and evangelical form of the religion wherever possible, as a counter to secular values. We have belatedly realized that to the doctrinaire Islamist ideologues, the Wahhabists, the Sayyid Qutbs, the Muslim Brotherhoods and now their bin Ladenite inheritors, modernism, too, was a kind of atheism.

Arabian fundamentalists concluded that if post-medieval progress in the world made their values unworkable, then it was the world's fault, and the world should be stopped in its tracks. This is a bit like the Flat Earth society resolving to retro-authenticate its views by nuking the earth flat. The Islamists found in Afghanistan that this could be done, after a fashion: Reduce the environment to premodern conditions, and, miraculously, the ideology applies precisely -- as it did wherever nature, not tamed by progress, had to be tamed by repressive social discipline. In some places, such as parts of Africa and Pakistan's tribal areas, a weak central state offered ready conditions for that ideology. In other places, like Chechnya, Palestine and now Iraq, chaos needed encouragement with car- and-suicide bombings. There's nothing new or particularly Islamic to this prescription. Remember Mao Zedong's revolutionary slogan: "Chaos under the heavens and all is right with the world."

An apparently impossible predicament, then, confronts Western policy makers today: whether to uphold corrupt and often hostile tyrannies, as in Egypt and Uzbekistan -- or to topple them and open the door to religious extremists applying their iron dialectic. A terrible inevitability is born, so it seems. In fact, a way through exists, but the West must quickly shed ignorance of matters Islamic.

As many Muslim apologists contend, though often for disingenuous purposes, the Islamic world is indeed not monolithic. It remains highly fissiparous and regional, inmixed with a myriad of localized customs, superstitions and hagiologies. The indigenous Islam of Central Asia, for example, combining Sufi mysticism, shamanism and dance, gave rise to the spiritualist école of Gurdjieff, et al., that swept through Europe early last century. Until recently, a branch of it held sway in Chechnya, where men danced the ecstatic zikhr circle dance on holy days -- until, that is, al Qaeda crept in just 10 years ago.

When fundamentalists confront such diversity, they do so with dogmatic force, huge resources and a fully schematized set of ideas. They bully local Islam into puritan uniformity. In Bosnia and Kosovo, whenever Saudi and Gulf agents offered funds to rebuild war-damaged communities, they insisted first on flattening cemeteries, destroying tombstones and whitewashing mosque décor, on the principle that pure iconophobic Islam abhorred the worship of idols. (This, despite the ubiquity of giant-sized idolatrous portraits, in their own countries, of Gulf and Saudi emirs on public walls -- not to mention currency notes.)

One can imagine the initial distress followed by resistance from local communities against such arrogant sacrilege from outside -- a resistance that, alas, fades with pressure and neglect. In the Balkans, inhabitants had to be restrained, weeping, from forcefully defending their family graves. This is where the opportunity lies for the West to break the extreme Islamists' strategy for indoctrination and for sowing jihad upon chaos. Both in Western mosques and in the Islamic world, the reintroduction of regional forms of belief and practice should be fostered. * * *

In such Central Asian countries as Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan and Turkmenistan, where sub-al Qaeda groups now clandestinely offer the only full-fledged religious instruction available to the populace, national leaders should be encouraged instead to revive their own indigenous practices (long dormant under Soviet rule), to arm their citizens with a regional pride in their organic Muslim traditions, even to export them to nearby Afghanistan -- where such practices endured until the Soviet invasion. In Turkey, the vast heritage of poetic mysticism accumulated in the Seljuk and Ottoman dynasties, visible now only in the Rumi-Dervish order, should be revitalized and exported to neighbors (assuming the religious affairs directorate agrees, of course). In Central Asia, Indonesia, the Philippine Islands and elsewhere, Wahhabists should no longer expect to meet with no counterargument when, as a prelude to conversion, they accuse the locals of ignorance and godlessness. They should be confronted with a literate, individuated and self-confident Islam, deeply rooted in local history and all the more resistant to their internationalist, one-size-fits-all template.

In such conditions, local Muslims will also defend the progress and development they have achieved nationally, thereby short-circuiting the messianic return-to-rubble logic of jihadists. To the argument that such initiatives imposed from above or initiated in the West will be dismissed as imperialist or collusionist, there's a simple answer. The spread of fundamentalist Islam was itself fostered by the West via the Arabian peninsula for political reasons. It has become the ultimate, invasively colonial force and aims to subjugate the entire umma to its tenets.

Hamas' Rejection Of Israel Halts Talks (WT/AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Coalition talks between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the militant group Hamas have stalled over U.S. demands that a national unity government recognize Israel, Palestinian officials said yesterday.

The suspension of negotiations underscores the difficulty that Mr. Abbas is having in trying to get Hamas to soften its anti-Israel ideology, a move that would pave the way to ending international sanctions that are crippling the Palestinian economy.

Israeli officials, meanwhile, said they were making progress in talks to win the release of an Israeli soldier captured three months ago by Hamas-linked militants in the Gaza Strip. That attack sparked an Israeli offensive in Gaza that further worsened the plight of Palestinians.

Mr. Abbas will use a meeting this week with President Bush on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly session in New York to try to win U.S. support for a coalition that doesn't fully meet international demands for a changed stance on Israel, Palestinian officials said.

They said he would warn that failure to work out a unity government could lead to a Palestinian civil war.

Still, some Palestinian officials wondered whether Mr. Abbas and Hamas can bridge their differences.

"What's the point of forming a government if this government is saying that it won't recognize agreements signed with Israel?" asked Palestinian lawmaker Saeb Erekat, an Abbas confidant. "The whole point is to break the deadlock in the peace process and bring an end to the siege."

The so-called Quartet of Middle East peacemakers -- the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations -- insist that Hamas must renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept past peace agreements before aid can resume.

Hamas has long sought Israel's destruction, with its followers killing hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings. But the group caved in to months of economic sanctions and announced last week that it would form a coalition government with Mr. Abbas' more moderate Fatah Party.

The Hamas Cabinet resigned Wednesday, and Mr. Abbas said the Palestinian Authority's 165,000 civil servants would be paid in the coming days. The employees have not been paid their full salaries since Hamas took control of the government in March.

But the current platform for the planned unity government falls short of the requirements set by the West to restore the flow of money, and Hamas leaders said they would not compromise any further.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said yesterday that the group would not recognize past peace deals despite the international pressure.

A Real Test For The Palestinians (NYT)

After six months of crippling sanctions, Hamas's leaders are trying to figure out the very minimum they need to say — and the even less they plan to do — to end their isolation and salvage their government. Skepticism is more than warranted. But Hamas's admission of weakness could provide at least a chance to quell the violence and resuscitate peace talks. The Bush administration should not squander the opportunity.

The radical Islamist Hamas — which came to power after last January's legislative elections — has been negotiating to form a national unity government with the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate, and his Fatah Party. Hamas still refuses to say the words necessary to unlock international aid: that it will renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist. Aides to Mr. Abbas warned yesterday that Hamas will have to make some rhetorical concessions — no matter how grudging — before a unity government can hope to win international acceptance.

Words are important. But worrying about who said what should not divert attention from what should be the real test of any Palestinian government: whether it will commit to a genuine cease-fire and use its security forces to halt, rather than abet, rocket and terrorist attacks against Israel.

The cutoff of financing has taken a harsh toll on the Palestinian people, especially in Gaza. Even then, Hamas began to buckle only after government employees, unpaid for months, went on strike. The Europeans are eager to resume aid, but all that leverage will be lost if they settle for words rather than deeds. The Bush administration is right to warn against that. Unfortunately, that is all that it has been doing.

One can spend endless hours puzzling over why President Bush has made no effort to broker a peace between Israel and the Palestinians. After pushing so hard to isolate Hamas, he now needs to capitalize on its weakness.

Working with the Europeans and moderate Arab states — all desperate to see Washington engage — the administration should take the lead in trying to negotiate a cease-fire and a prisoner exchange. Washington should also send a clear message to Syria that there can be real rewards if it restrains its clients, Hamas and Hezbollah, while the Europeans should warn of real punishments if it refuses.

If progress is to be made, Israel will need to turn over tax revenues and stop expanding settlements. And if a cease-fire can be put in place, Washington should push for a quick resumption of peace talks.

Skepticism is a basic requirement for dealing in the Middle East. But that cannot be an excuse for nearly six years of White House inaction. It's time that Mr. Bush and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, try the hard work of diplomacy.

An Endless Vacuum In The Middle East (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

President Bush once asked former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon why he had proposed his bold plan to evacuate Israeli settlers and soldiers unilaterally from the Gaza Strip. "To fill the vacuum," Sharon frankly replied. Before Sharon uncorked the idea in the fall of 2003, the Israeli-Palestinian "peace process" was stalemated, and there was mounting international pressure for progress. Proposals from outsiders and would-be brokers were proliferating; Sharon feared one of them would eventually gain traction and be imposed on him. So, with the flair that won him many a battlefield victory, he outflanked the incipient discussion.

Three years later, in the aftermath of a war that was one of the unforeseen consequences of Sharon's strategy, a similar vacuum looms before his successors. Once again there seems no clear way forward toward an Israeli-Palestinian peace. The unilateral West Bank pullout championed by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert earlier this year is, at least for now, dead. But a settlement seems more urgent than ever, and lots of people have ideas: Jacques Chirac, Kofi Annan, the Arab League.

Most of them are bad: grandiose proposals for international conferences or non-starters that would require Israel to accept the "return" of millions of Palestinians to its own territory as a condition for Arab recognition of what would no longer be a Jewish state. Nonetheless, the U.N. Security Council may debate the various schemes at the end of this week.

Both Olmert's government and the Bush administration know that this would be the ideal moment to put a new, game-changing plan on the table. But as a visit to Washington last week by Olmert's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, made clear, they haven't got one. Livni spent hours in conversation with Bush, Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other senior officials, with the goal of coordinating positions before the expected onslaught of diplomacy at the United Nations. The bottom line, one official said, is that "there will be no major diplomatic initiative."

Why the paralysis? There are some important substantive reasons, including the simple fact that the end of Israeli unilateralism means an Arab partner is needed -- and the Palestinian Authority is not ready for a serious peace process. Since Israel withdrew from Gaza a year ago, neither President Mahmoud Abbas nor the rival Hamas movement has been able to gain control over an increasingly anarchic territory.

There are also powerful political problems here and in Israel. With his presidential capital rapidly waning, Bush is focused on finding solutions for Iraq. Trying to solve the Middle East's most intractable conflict on top of that is a stretch. Olmert's government is reeling from the war in Lebanon, besieged by critics who say he failed to deliver on promises to cripple Hezbollah or that he squandered the lives of the scores of Israelis who were killed. For the next few months, at least, he will be focused simply on surviving in office.

Bush and Livni consequently found themselves watching with a mixture of apprehension and dismay last week as the usually passive Palestinians launched a Sharonesque gambit. Abbas announced that he had struck a deal with Hamas and other factions on a "unity government" that he would discuss with Bush at a meeting this week at the United Nations. Hamas leaders, meanwhile, floated an even bolder backup plan: dissolving the Palestinian Authority, which could force Israel to resume its occupation.

The Palestinian leadership knows that the still-evolving unity pact isn't likely to impress either Olmert or Bush, since it almost certainly won't commit Hamas or the new government to formal recognition of Israel or an unqualified renunciation of violence. But if it goes forward it will be a fresh initiative -- and it could break the current international embargo on the Palestinian Authority, by persuading European governments to renew subsidies that cover half of the authority's payroll. Western governments and Israel would be reduced to arguing with each other, rather than pressing for a Palestinian government that could make peace.

The U.S.-Israeli strategy to counter this maneuver amounts to a series of small tactical steps. Once an Israeli soldier still held captive in Gaza is released, Olmert will meet with Abbas and release hundreds or thousands of Palestinian prisoners. An Israeli chokehold over movement in and out of Gaza will be eased. If all goes well, Olmert might even discuss transferring security responsibility in several West Bank towns from the Israeli army to Palestinian security forces controlled by Abbas.

All these would be useful steps forward. They wouldn't, however, fill the vacuum.

US Moves Stall To Press Sudan On Darfur (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Moves in Congress to put financial pressure on Sudan to stop the killings in Darfur have been stymied by a combination of big business interests and the Bush administration, according to supporters of legislation blocked in the Senate that would have endorsed decisions by US states to divest from companies involved in Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0063891

Tens of billions of dollars in equity are at stake, mostly of non-US companies and including two listed Chinese energy giants involved in Sudan's rapidly growing oil industry which fuels the military with arms and other supplies.

While giving rhetorical backing to anti-genocide protests staged around the world on Sunday, Democrats and Republicans admitted that a new watered down draft of the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act was further evidence of US unwillingness as well as inability to take decisive action.

The draft put forward last week after long delays by Senator Richard Lugar, head of the foreign relations committee, took out controversial language known as "section 11" in the House equivalent that passed in April. This would have given a green light to a growing, celebrity-backed Sudan divestment campaign that has successfully targeted states, universities, pension and investment funds, persuading them to dump stock.

In June New Jersey became the first state to divest fully public funds from foreign companies linked to Sudan, selling $2.16bn of stock. Maine, Oregon, Illinois and Connecticut have also passed divestment legislation, as have many public and private universities with billions of dollars in endowments.

"Section 11 was critical," said Jason Miller, national policy director of the Sudan Divestment Task Force which is co-ordinating the campaign. His group pushes for divestment targeted not at all companies in Sudan but those deemed to be directly helping the government, through the oil industry which accounts for over half of state revenues and some telecommunications companies that have directly assisted the military.

On the other side, the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), a US business lobby group representing major industries, is fighting the campaign and has sued the state of Illinois.

Bill Reinsch, president of the NFTC, lobbied Congress. He told the FT that the principle was simple – "the president of the United States runs foreign policy; the mayor of Berkeley does not".

The NFTC also complains that lists of target companies are drawn up by unaccountable private interest groups. He said some of the US companies listed had been exempt from existing US sanctions to do business with Sudan – usually in the south where rebel groups recently signed a peace accord with Khartoum. Others had nothing to do with Sudan, he said.

It is not clear whether Mr Lugar's draft will get through the committee, though there is a sense that so much time has been wasted that something is better than nothing. The sudden arrival of the draft caught many by surprise and it is still being studied. No one contacted by the FT could explain why support for a "no fly zone" over Darfur had apparently been dropped as well.

The State Department declined to make an official comment on the issue.

One administration official questioned whether the legislation would make any difference. He said there was little the US could do on its own, its military was stuck and exhausted in Iraq, China was refusing to co-operate and Nato was tied up in Afghanistan.

To that list, analysts said, should be added US reluctance to make Darfur a priority in its difficult relationship with China, Sudan's oil wealth, and a still close intelligence relationship between Washington and Khartoum in the war on terror.

Companies affected by the divestment campaign include: PetroChina, Sinopec, ABB, Alstom, Siemens, Schlumberger, Tatneft of Russia, Italy's Finmeccanica, Weir Group of the UK, and Shell.

As Peace Mission Nears End, War In Sudan Intensifies (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 17 -- As the African Union prepares to abandon its troubled peace mission to Darfur, the region is descending ever more steeply into war.

Fresh Sudanese government troops with machine guns slung over their shoulders patrol the streets of El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur state. Helicopter gunships based here rumble off into the countryside almost every day, loaded with rockets. And Darfur's fractured and frustrated rebel forces increasingly are fighting back against government forces.

The intensity of the combat in Darfur, the western Sudanese region the size of Texas, has forced a new flood of civilians to flee their burned and bombed-out villages for sprawling camps on the outskirts of this and other cities. The estimated 2 million people already in such camps are settling in for the long haul, losing hope that they will ever return home.

Hawab Abdallah Osman, 50, said her village about 45 miles northwest of here is now empty. Asked when she planned to return, she said, "Never."

"There is bombing there," she said. "I don't think peace will come."

Hundreds of thousands of people have already died in three years of war, which began when rebels attacked government installations in Darfur. The government responded by sending in army troops and arming a militia, called the Janjaweed, that has attacked rebels and civilians.

The African Union, which launched an ambitious but poorly funded peace monitoring mission in 2004, is scheduled to leave Sept. 30, when its mandate expires.

A proposed United Nations force of about 20,000 -- over three times the size of the African Union's -- has been blocked by President Omar Hassan al-Bashir, who says it is part of an effort by Western nations to "re-colonize" Sudan.

"We don't want the United Nations back to Sudan no matter the conditions," he said Saturday in Havana, where he was attending an international summit of developing countries.

A cease-fire agreement for Darfur was reached in May but has collapsed in the four months since it was signed in the Nigerian capital of Abuja. The government has repeatedly violated terms prohibiting military flights over Darfur and new troop deployments.

The government also has failed to restrain the Janjaweed, which continues to rape, kill and pillage. Increasingly, the militiamen are doing so while wearing crisp green uniforms, distributed by the government.

Civilians here say militiamen gallop their horses and camels into the camps for displaced people, sometimes within site of African Union troop positions. Rarely have the troops responded with force. In some cases, Darfur civilians, still smarting from deaths of friends and family members, have demonstrated angrily in front of African Union encampments.

"This African Union, if there is fighting, they are running away," said Halima Idriss, 55, gesturing furiously as her orange head scarf flapped in the hot wind of a camp outside of El Fasher.

The African Union's Peace and Security Council plans to review its decision to depart at a meeting in New York on Monday. But with its current mandate and resources, African Union officers express despair about their ability to keep peace when both the government and rebel forces are determined to return to war. Field commanders from the only rebel group that signed May's peace deal say they, too, are likely to resume fighting soon unless the United Nations sends its peacekeepers to Darfur.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, the African Union officers muttered angrily about their failure to enforce calm while expressing greater fears. They used the words "genocide" and "Rwanda" to describe what they expect will follow their departure.

Outside analysts also say that the African Union, while ineffective at peacekeeping, is serving as vital eyes and ears for the outside world at a time when the Sudanese government is making it more difficult for aid groups and journalists to operate here. With the African Union gone, they say, the last buffer will be lost against a bloodier assault in Darfur.

"All predictions are that without witnesses, the slaughter will begin," said Eric Reeves, a Smith College professor who has closely monitored the Darfur conflict, speaking from Northampton, Mass. "As long as the A.U. stays in, they are powerless but they are witnesses."

The African Union pullout would come shortly before the end of the rainy season, when flooded dirt roads typically dry out, allowing full-scale military maneuvering to resume after many weeks of limited mobility for both sides.

John Prendergast, an Africa analyst for the International Crisis Group, said the United States and the United Nations have allowed the Sudanese government to outmaneuver them diplomatically. He acknowledged that the United Nations would have trouble deploying troops over the objections of the government but said tougher actions would persuade officials to allow the peacekeepers.

"If we start acting, they will change their behavior," said Prendergast, speaking from New York, where he was preparing for a Darfur rally in Central Park. "It's very sad that the U.S. has not mustered the political will to head down that path."

Little news of the political maneuvering reached displaced civilians in Darfur. They passed the day much as they have for months, in some cases for years. They took long, dangerous walks into the Janjaweed-controlled countryside to gather firewood.

They rode their donkeys in search of grass for the animals to eat. They sought shade from the blistering sun under makeshift shelters made with reeds and plastic tarps distributed by international aid groups.

And they waited for a peace few expect to come.

Idriss, the Darfur woman who said she had lost faith in the African Union, expressed tentative hope that U.N. peacekeepers might do better. If they don't come, she said, she knows what will happen.

"We will lose all the people of Darfur," Idriss said. "The killing is always going on."

In A Blow To Merkel's Christian Democrats, Far-Right Party Wins Seats In An East German State (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

FRANKFURT, Sept. 17 — A far-right party made further inroads in Germany's economically fragile east on Sunday, winning seats in a state election in Mecklenburg-West Pomerania, a lonely land of farms and fishing villages that is the home constituency of Chancellor Angela Merkel.

The National Democratic Party, which openly espouses xenophobic and neo-Nazi views, was projected to win slightly more than 7 percent of the vote, according to preliminary results. That was less than analysts here had feared, but enough to clear the threshold of 5 percent for seats in the state legislature.

Extreme-right parties will now be represented in three of Germany's six eastern states — a trend that worries officials and underlines the divide between the country's eastern and western halves. Far-right parties have negligible support in more-prosperous western Germany.

"This shows the extreme right is a stable and growing force in the east, but it is not an earthquake," said Hajo Funke, a political scientist at the Free University of Berlin. "It's not a danger for our democracy."

The result, however, is a rebuke for Mrs. Merkel and her conservative party, the Christian Democratic Union, which lost votes in Mecklenburg and fared even worse in the second of the two state legislative elections on Sunday, in Berlin. There, the popular mayor, Klaus Wowereit, led his Social Democratic Party to a comfortable victory.

Voters appeared to be punishing Mrs. Merkel's party, 10 months after it squeaked into power in an unwieldy "grand coalition" with the Social Democrats. The Social Democrats, who govern Mecklenburg-West Pomerania, lost ground there, too, and it was not clear whether they could salvage their coalition with the Party of Democratic Socialism, the former East German Communist party.

Mrs. Merkel, who began her political career in Mecklenburg 15 years ago, has tried to focus attention on the region, inviting President Bush in July for a visit. But the state has one of the highest unemployment rates in Germany, which makes it a breeding ground for extremism, analysts say.

The National Democratic Party, which the German government once tried to ban, won seats in Saxony, a similarly depressed eastern state, in 2004. Another far-right party is represented in Brandenburg, the state that surrounds Berlin.

"The grand coalition hasn't presented a forceful program to tackle Germany's problems," Mr. Funke said. "These parties take advantage of the frustration of those who have no chance of a social or economic future."

One of the few winners on Sunday was Mr. Wowereit, who was given a strong mandate as mayor of Berlin, with the choice of renewing his coalition with the Party of Democratic Socialism or forming a new one with the Greens, the largest vote-gainer since the last election, in 2001.

The victory may foretell a greater national role for Mr. Wowereit, a 52-year-old lawyer who has become a star in Berlin. His party-going style seems to suit his late-night town, and his disclosure before the last election that he is gay only added to his appeal. On Sunday, Mr. Wowereit appeared on stage with his partner, Jörn Kubicki, a neurosurgeon.

With the departure of Social Democratic leaders like Gerhard Schröder, and a lack of other rising stars, Mr. Wowereit has made his ambitions plain. "I would like to have more say that I have had in the last five years, when we had to clean up the city," he said in a recent interview with the German magazine Stern.

Whether he has done so is a matter of debate. Berlin is strangled by debt, a jobless rate of nearly 20 percent and a shrinking commercial base. Mr. Wowereit, who is known as Wowi, prefers to focus on its role as a cultural center and tourist magnet. Berlin, he said last year, is "poor but sexy" — a line that has become a tongue-in-cheek slogan for the city.

His opponent, Friedbert Pflüger, a Christian Democratic member of Parliament, tried to portray the mayor as a lightweight. But in a city that rewards flamboyance, Mr. Pflüger, an establishment politician originally from the western city of Hanover, never stood a chance.

"Up until now, he hasn't been a strong voice in politics on the national level," Uwe Andersen, a political scientist at Ruhr University, said of Mr. Wowereit. "He may think this result strengthens his position."

Sweden's Governing Party Voted Out After 12 Years (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall And Ivar Ekman

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

STOCKHOLM, Sept. 17 — Sweden swept away 12 years of center-left government on Sunday, voting to reject its longtime prime minister, Goran Persson, in favor of a conservative candidate who has pledged to revise the Swedish welfare state.

With almost all the votes counted by 11 p.m., three hours after the polls closed, the right-of-center coalition led by the leader of the Moderate Party, Fredrik Reinfeldt, had taken 48.1 percent of the vote, compared with 46.2 percent for the Social Democrats and their left-of-center allies.

The Social Democrats received just 35.2 percent, their worst showing since universal suffrage began in Sweden in 1921. Mr. Persson, 57, who has been prime minister since 1996, said he would step down as party leader in March.

One of the world's most consistently successful political parties, the Social Democrats have governed Sweden alone or in coalitions for 65 of the past 74 years. The party's defeat reflects a feeling not only that Mr. Persson has become complacent in office, but also that Sweden's celebrated social welfare model, with its high tax rate and generous benefits, has encouraged too many people to stay out of work for too long.

Speaking to jubilant party members after declaring victory, Mr. Reinfeldt, 41, went out of his way to welcome people who had voted for the first time for the Moderates, the conservatives. During the campaign, they were repackaged as the new Moderates, signaling a shift to the center.

"Tonight, people who never had thought of voting for us have given us their vote," Mr. Reinfeldt said. "We want them all to feel at home with the new Moderates."

Conceding defeat, Mr. Persson told members of his party that he took responsibility for the poor election results. Voter turnout was around 80.4 percent in a country of 9 million people and 6.9 million voters. The Social Democrats won 177,000 fewer votes than they did in the last election four years ago.

"We will work hard to be a powerful opposition," Mr. Persson said. Pressing home one of the major themes of his campaign, that Mr. Reinfeldt's party represented a seismic, rightward turn in Swedish politics, he said: "We will never accept the system shift of the right. We will fight back."

Nicholas Aylott, a political scientist at Sodertorn University, said in an interview: "There's a sense that the government has become tired, that it's been drifting, really. It hasn't been clear where the Social Democrats want to lead Sweden."

Mr. Reinfeldt successfully made unemployment a major issue in the campaign. By most measures, Sweden is thriving economically: the economy is growing this year at a projected annual rate of 4.1 percent, and the official unemployment rate is 5.7 percent.

But with its generous social services and high unemployment benefits, Mr. Reinfeldt argues, it has encouraged a vast swath of people to fall out of the labor market, a particularly acute problem with an aging population. Taking into account the number of working-age people who are not working or in school — including early retirees, people in job training and those on long-term disability — the unemployment figure is close to 21 percent, he says.

Styling the Moderates "the new labor party," Mr. Reinfeldt said that in Mr. Persson's view, "Security is living on subsidies." By contrast, he said in a recent interview, his party is "saying that security is the ability to work and to stand on your own two feet."

Mr. Reinfeldt has pledged to revitalize the economy by cutting payroll taxes for low-income workers, reducing unemployment benefits from the current high of 80 percent of a worker's last salary, raising educational standards to prepare students for work in a competitive market and encouraging employers with tax credits to hire the long-term unemployed.

"The election's big issue was the poor functioning of the labor market," Mr. Aylott said. "The fact that so many people don't have work has to be considered a major failing of the Social Democratic government, given that they've presided over such a long period of economic growth."

But in a country that likes stability, Mr. Reinfeldt has been at pains to cast his plans as a fine-tuning, rather than a full-scale overhaul, of Sweden's economic model. "The Nordic welfare model is in many aspects a good model," he said as he campaigned Sunday, "but it needs more of a choice for individuals."

But in a series of television and radio debates, Mr. Persson tried to portray his opponent as a classic conservative in disguise, saying the conservatives would tamper with the country's successful formula of high taxes, a large public sector, and generous benefits.

In the previous election four years ago, Mr. Reinfeldt's party was trounced at the polls when it ran on a traditional platform of big tax cuts and deep reductions in social security benefits. When he became party leader, Mr. Reinfeldt acknowledged that such a stance was unlikely to win any elections in a country that is essentially happy with its underlying big-government, high-tax system.

So he moved the party to the center and settled on unemployment as an issue on which the government would be particularly vulnerable.

On Sunday, there was a feeling in the air that something momentous was afoot.

"This year, you've felt vibrations that you haven't felt before," Mattias Jonsson, a 30-year-old banker who was voting for the Moderates, said in an interview outside a Stockholm polling station. "This time, there is a real alternative."

Magnus Rosander, a 44-year-old computer engineer who said he had a nervous breakdown after losing his job four years ago and had not worked since, said he had voted for the Social Democrats and was worried about what would happen under the Moderates.

"I'm dependent on social welfare," Mr. Rosander said outside a subway station in central Stockholm. "If Fredrik Reinfeldt wins, we will get less money and he will force me to work even though my doctor says I'm not ready yet."

Some voters said that regardless of the differences between the parties, they felt simply that the Social Democrats, and Mr. Persson, had been in power too long.

Frida Henriksson, who is 26 and works in telephone sales for a large Swedish company, said she voted for Mr. Reinfeldt because "it feels like I have a lot more in common with him" than with Mr. Persson.

"It's time for a change, to see what someone else can achieve," she added.

Swedish Oust Persson As Right Wins Poll (FT)

By David Ibison

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Swedish voters ousted the ruling Social Democrats from power after 12 years on Sunday and elected the centre right Alliance for Sweden, almost complete official results indicated.

As he declared victory on Sunday night, Fredrik Reinfeldt, leader of the four-party Alliance, told jubilant supporters: "It was teamwork that helped us win."

The results showing the Alliance parties ahead by just over 1 percentage point was a stunning rebuke for prime minister Göran Persson and his party that has led Sweden for 65 of the last 74 years, overseeing the creation of its world-famous welfare state.

Mr Persson told a group of subdued supporters: "Tomorrow, I will go to the speaker [of parliament] and hand in my and our government's resignation." The prime minister, who has led the Social Democrats for 10 years, said he would also step down as party leader in March. But he added: "We have lost the election, but we are not a defeated party."

The result means Sweden is set for an historic change of direction as it moves away from being a welfare state towards encouraging more market-based activity.

The new government, while supporting many aspects of the welfare state, has pledged to lower taxes and deregulate areas of the economy in which the government continues to play a large role.

"The Social Democrats have been in power for 12 years so there is a general malaise, but there are also underlying reasons," said James Ashley, economist at Barclays Capital.

"The official unemployment rate looks better than European averages, but when you look at the true rate, taking into account government schemes for example, it is much higher, and there is a lot of dissatisfaction with that."

The official unemployment rate is 5.7 per cent, but independent economists have calculated the real rate is between 15 per cent and 17 per cent. Youth unemployment is 23 per cent, according to the European Union.

The Alliance victory comes as the economy is growing at an annualised rate of 5.5 per cent, inflation is low and house prices rising – factors that usually guarantee success for an incumbent government.

Mr Persson emphasised these points repeatedly during his campaign, urging voters to stick with the party that had created Sweden's current prosperity.

But Mr Reinfeldt has argued that record high youth unemployment masks fractures that are appearing in Sweden's social model

These include a rapidly ageing society, indicating that more people will require state support at a time when the number of taxpayers is dropping.

He argued that if nothing was done, either welfare benefits would have to be reduced or taxes would have to go up. He believes deregulation will boost employment and ultimately the government's tax income.

The Alliance victory is likely to have little immediate impact on financial markets or the currency, but it could be more marked in the longer term.

Mr Reinfeldt has pledged to sell state shareholdings in listed companies and deregulate other areas of the economy in which the state has a large influence. This could clear the way for cross-border mergers or acquisitions of listed companies.

Next Sweden Leader Aims To Tweak Welfare (AP)

By Katarina Kratovac, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Fredrik Reinfeldt, leader of the center-right coalition that won Swedish parliamentary elections on Sunday, once wrote a book criticizing the country's vaunted cradle-to-grave welfare state.

Now he will have the chance to tweak the model.

Reinfeldt's coalition ousted the Social Democratic government in a close parliamentary election Sunday, ending 12 years of leftist rule in the Nordic nation.

The 41-year old leader of the main opposition Moderate Party is decidedly more pro-American than Prime Minister Goran Persson, who Reinfeldt defeated.

He has criticized the President Bush's administration, saying "a long list of mistakes" were committed in Iraq. But he also has said: "I have not experienced any conflict in the world where people don't stand up and call for the Americans to come there and solve it. You can't forget that."

Political opponents often point to Reinfeldt's 1993 book "The Sleeping Nation," in which he criticized the cradle-to-grave welfare state.

Realizing the welfare state is a near-sacred concept in Sweden, Reinfeldt called for fine-tuning the system with small, pro-business adjustments rather than dismantling it altogether.

"We want to show that we like the Sweden we have — but also signal a will to change things through safe steps," the father of three told The Associated Press in a pre-election interview.

Reinfeldt, who comes from an upper middle-class background, was voted into Parliament in 1991, a year after completing a university degree in economics.

He assumed leadership of the main opposition Moderate Party in 2003, a year after its poor showing in 2002 elections. In just three years, he revived the party by softening its conservative image and moving it to the political center.

The Moderates' more controversial goals — such as privatizing state-owned companies and ending Sweden's traditional neutrality to join NATO — were hardly mentioned during the campaign.

In the campaign, Persson cast suspicion on Reinfeldt's shift to the center, saying his true aim was to overturn Sweden's social model.

Reinfeldt has compared himself to Canada's Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper or British Conservative leader David Cameron.

He has said many reforms were needed in the U.N., describing his disenchantment when listening to Cuba's foreign minister give a speech to the General Assembly in 2004 which he said glorified communism while delivering a "giant attack on the USA."

"It was one of the worst things I've heard," Reinfeldt recalled. "But he got a standing ovation from the present delegates. That tells you that this U.N. system isn't perfect.

"It should not become a scratch-each-other-on-the-back society for dictatorships," he added. "That may explain why the USA sometimes chooses to act on its own."

Mexican Leftwinger Calls Himself President-elect (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential election last July, proclaimed himself president-elect at the weekend and vowed to set about transforming the country's institutions to establish "a new republic".

Speaking before tens of thousands of cheering supporters, he said he would not recognise the government of Felipe Calderón, the official winner, and promised to continue his "civil resistance" movement.

"Do they really think the puppet they put in power will be able to govern?" he asked the "delegates" of his resistance movement. "Well, they are wrong."

Mr López Obrador, the 52-year-old former Mexico City mayor, insisted that the July election had been fraudulent and said that his decision to proclaim himself president was not "capricious" but rather a necessary step in combating a corrupt system set up to benefit the rich.

"They [the establishment] created a gang of white-collar delinquents to fight against us," he told a fervent crowd. He said the decision to proclaim himself president was a "take that so that they learn to respect the will of the people".

Minutes before his rousing speech on Saturday evening, the delegates – organisers claimed there were more than a million although private estimates suggested there were considerably fewer – voted on 12 points.

These included naming Mr López Obrador president-elect, authorising him to appoint a cabinet, choose a government headquarters and even collect revenue, though they did not specify how. The delegates voted overwhelmingly to name him president on November 20, the date Mexicans celebrate the 1910 revolution.

With a show of hands – many enthusiastically raised both hands when asked to vote – delegates also promised to continue Mr López Obrador's "peaceful civil resistance" movement aimed at complicating life for Mr Calderón once in power.

One delegate speaking before Mr López Obrador said the strategy would include protesting everywhere Mr Calderón appeared in public, holding up signs behind television reporters and even boycotting products of companies that allegedly contributed to Mr Calderon's election campaign. Coca-Cola, Wal-Mart and Banamex, the bank owned by Citigroup, were some of the companies mentioned.

Speaking to the delegates, many of them drenched and shivering from a torrential rain storm earlier in the afternoon, Mr López Obrador said triumphantly: "I will not let Mexico down."

The line went down well with those in the capital's main square. But for others, Mr López Obrador already has. In Mexico City, the leftwing campaigner's principal support base, a growing number of residents – including many who voted for him in July – say enough is enough.

Many political analysts say that by adopting such tactics, Mr López Obrador has locked himself into a poorly funded resistance movement that will gradually start to lose support. Mr Calderón, who takes possession on December 1, will be hoping they are right.

López Obrador To Run 'Parallel Government' As Mexico Opposition (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Hundreds of thousands of supporters of leftist Andrés Manuel López Obrador elected him the leader Saturday of a "parallel government" opposed to President-elect Felipe Calderón's administration.

The symbolic "vote" -- a show of hands in the packed Zocalo plaza -- was the latest development in Mexico's nearly three-month electoral dispute. Mr. López Obrador claims fraud and illegal government spending were responsible for Mr. Calderón's victory by fewer than 234,000 votes in the July 2 election, and he has vowed to be the new leader's biggest opponent.

It was unclear what the "parallel government," complete with its own cabinet, would entail.

Mr. López Obrador retains a strong following despite a Federal Electoral Tribunal ruling this month that rejected most of his fraud allegations and awarded the presidency to Mr. Calderón. Supporters of Mr. López Obrador said they would travel the country to spread his message of helping the poor and opposing the elite.

Mr. López Obrador will be "sworn in" to his new post on Nov. 20. Mr. Calderón will be inaugurated Dec. 1.

Delegates at Saturday's convention also agreed to support the formation of a "Progressive Front" to replace the former coalition of leftist parties that backed Mr. López Obrador in the national election.

Mexico's 'Parallel' Gov't In Question (AP)

By Lisa J. Adams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Now that Mexican leftists have acclaimed defeated candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador president of a parallel government, the question is will they settle into the role of a normal democratic opposition or try to press their agenda through more militant resistance.

Lopez Obrador, who lost the July 2 presidential election by 234,000 votes to conservative Felipe Calderon, led a massive protest for seven weeks with followers camped out in the center of Mexico City clogging the heart of the capital to demand a full vote recount.

The protest culminated in a self-styled convention of delegates who packed central Zocalo plaza Saturday night and voted by a show of hands to form a parallel government with a Cabinet and plans to swear in Lopez Obrador as president on Nov. 20.

Lopez Obrador, who championed the rights of the poor during his campaign, said Saturday the parallel government will work on proposals to rewrite Mexico's constitution to guarantee the right to food, work, health care, education and housing while overhauling "corrupt" public institutions.

Saturday's mass convention held back from vowing to pay taxes to the parallel government or break existing laws. But it pledged to wage a campaign of peaceful resistance to undermine Calderon at every turn during the single six-year term allowed by Mexico's constitution.

At least one Lopez Obrador aide, former Congressman Jose Agustin Ortiz Pinchetti, said, however, no one was "calling for an insurrection" to topple the government.

But it was still unclear how Lopez Obrador planned to implement his "parallel government" policies or what impact it would have. He has said his alternative government will be "itinerant" — traveling around the country to touch base with supporters outside of Mexico City but based somewhere in the capital.

Mexico expert George Grayson of the College of William & Mary in Virginia said he expects President-elect Calderon to promote his own platform of social programs to tackle poverty and inequality.

Grayson said the movement could be a positive influence if it "keeps the elite's feet to the fire" while funneling its ideas to the congressmen and senators of Lopez Obrador's leftist Democratic Revolution Party, now the second-strongest force in Congress.

"The problem is if they become frustrated and resort to militant resistance," Grayson said. That could again result in widespread street protests, the blockade of government offices — or even worse — disruptive attacks on the capital's infrastructure, such as its water system or electric grid.

"I just hope he maintains restraint," Grayson added.

Recent political polls have shown declining support for Lopez Obrador and some analysts say that raises questions about what his movement can achieve. Some analysts say the chances are slim that Lopez Obrador can launch a radical opposition government.

The former Mexico City mayor claims a broad conspiracy of business leaders cheated him out of an election victory. Calderon will be sworn in on Dec. 1 as President Vicente Fox's successor.

Dozens of world leaders, including President Bush and Argentine President Nestor Kirchner — have recognized the victory and promised to work with Calderon as Mexico's new chief executive.

But Lopez Obrador has refused to back down from his claim that he is the country's rightful leader.

Terrorist Access To Nuclear Site Feared (WT)

By Bojan Pancevski

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- More than two tons of radioactive material stored in a rundown research facility in Serbia offer an easy target for terrorists seeking to build a "dirty bomb," according to the United Nations' nuclear watchdog.

Nuclear inspectors have branded the lightly guarded storage facility at a communist-era reactor, which closed 22 years ago, the world's most dangerous disused nuclear site -- because of the potency of the material and the risk of leakage.

The outdated facility is on a 48-acre site at the Institute of Nuclear Sciences in Vinca, 10 miles outside the capital, Belgrade, surrounded by a rusty barbed wire fence and secured only by a small number of armed guards.

Michael Durst, the special program manager at the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), said the Vinca site topped the global priority list of unsecured uranium sources because it combined the threats of nuclear proliferation and environmental disaster.

"Vinca is unique in the amount of uranium stored within its facility -- at least 2.5 tons -- and the fact that about 30 percent of it is leaking. It would be easily accessible to an organized group," he said.

"There are other sites in Bulgaria, Romania and Hungary, as well as elsewhere in the world, but the amount of nuclear material, the accessibility and the leakage makes Vinca the most dangerous. It requires immediate action."

In 1992, more than 100 pounds of highly enriched uranium fuel -- which can be used to make an atomic bomb -- was removed from Vinca by the IAEA and the American, Russian and Serbian governments. It was transported to a disposal facility near Dimitrovgrad, in Russia.

The IAEA fears that the remaining nuclear material could be packaged with conventional explosives to spread radioactive material over a large area -- a so-called dirty bomb.

Officials said much of the uranium is stored in a 75-foot-deep pool, filled with murky water, in the institute's reactor building. Other nuclear material stored at the site includes plutonium and highly radioactive spent-fuel byproducts.

This week, the IAEA will appeal to international donors for funds to pay for decommissioning the site and shipping the most dangerous material to Russia for disposal.

A joint project by the IAEA, the Vinca institute and the Serbian authorities to secure the material has stalled for lack of funds.

"The Vinca staff are highly professional and very cooperative," Mr. Durst said. "But the budgets of the institute, and of the whole country, are very limited. They are keeping the whole thing together with gum and tape."

The institute was founded in what was communist Yugoslavia in 1948 with the help of Soviet scientists. Its nuclear reactor was shut down in 1984, but there are still more than 800 workers at the site, 400 of them scientific staff.

Fumbled China Spy Probe An Intelligence Failure (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

First of three excerpts

Tai Wang Mak dialed a phone number in Guangzhou, China.

The man who answered, Pu Pei-liang, was a researcher at the Chinese Center for Asia Pacific Studies at Zhongshan University, known to U.S. intelligence officials as CAPS.

"I'm with Red Flower of North America," said Mak, a Chinese national working as an engineer in Los Angeles for Hong Kong-based Phoenix Television.

Mak said he would arrive in China in nine days. Pu instructed him to use a calling card to phone from the airport in Guangzhou so that he could be picked up.

The call from California to China, placed Oct. 19, 2005, was intercepted by the long electronic ears of the U.S. National Security Agency.

Mak's reference to Red Flower of North America brought a breakthrough in a yearlong investigation into one of the most damaging losses of defense technology in American history.

Chinese spies used those code words to authenticate themselves when making contact with communist China's intelligence bureaus. Other often-used code words include Winter Chrysanthemum and Autumn Orchid.

U.S. intelligence knew that CAPS received funding from the People's Liberation Army and conducted operational research for the Chinese military. The phone call revealed that CAPS had one of its most valuable spies inside the U.S. defense industrial system.

Mak and Pu, investigators say, were undercover military intelligence officers with the Second Department of the People's Liberation Army, the spy service well-known to U.S. counterspies as 2 PLA.

Investigators say Tai Mak's brother, Chi Mak, headed a family spy ring in Los Angeles. After his Oct. 28 arrest by the FBI, Chi Mak, a naturalized citizen and electrical engineer with a major American defense contractor, told investigators that he had supplied sensitive Navy weapons secrets to the Chinese since 1983.

The fact that the spy ring went undetected for two decades was a major counterintelligence failure. Worse, the U.S. government would go on to bungle the case.

Picking pockets

R. James Woolsey, the former CIA director, has called the Constitution one of the best recruiting tools for intelligence services. His point is that those living under oppressive, dictatorial regimes sometimes will take incredible risks to step forward and secretly help in the battle for freedom and democracy.

In fall 2004, the CIA recruited just such a source from China, a person within the military and security establishment. One of the first questions the CIA poses, in the jargon of the intelligence business, is "Who is picking our pockets?"

The new source identified the spy ring in Los Angeles that investigators said was run by Chi Mak, an electrical engineer with the defense firm Power Paragon, a subsidiary of the Fortune 500 company known as L-3.

The source said the Chinese military was gaining sensitive technology and information on Navy warships. What's more, China was buying ostensibly commercial goods and diverting them to the military.

Under pressure to adopt a counterintelligence culture instead of a "cop" mentality, the FBI hoped to play the spy ring and see where it led.

Counterintelligence is part art, part science, a discipline aimed at identifying and exploiting or stopping foreign spies. Law enforcement is easier: You identify the bad guys and arrest them.

But the government mishandled the case. One problem was that the FBI and the CIA had conflicting goals. The CIA was afraid to lose its prized source, the Chinese recruit. The agency did not want the FBI to make arrests immediately, since swift action would alert the Chinese to a mole.

DOJ_NMG_0063901

Investigators said Tai Mak, who worked for a producer of Chinese-language programming, served as a handler and courier for the spy ring. The investigation continued for about a year, until the NSA intercepted his "Red Flower" phone call in October 2005.

Days later, on Oct. 28, the FBI arrested Chi Mak, 66, and his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, 63.

Agents also arrested Tai Mak, 57, and his wife, Fuk Heung Li, 49, at Los Angeles International Airport as they prepared to travel to China.

He was carrying disks on which were hidden encrypted files containing sensitive data on Navy technology. Many documents were labeled "proprietary" and "restricted," meaning they could not be exported.

'At serious risk'

An FBI affidavit made a case for applying maximum charges against the four suspects -- conspiracy to steal U.S. military information on restricted Navy warship technology, smuggling information to China in violation of export laws and theft of government property.

"Chi Mak said that he knew that Mr. Pu was providing the information to members of the Chinese government's science and technology community," the affidavit said.

The FBI produced the affidavit to secure arrest warrants for the Mak brothers and their wives, as well as search warrants for their homes, workplaces and vehicles. Having spent a year conducting electronic surveillance, investigators believed the searches would uncover classified data and other information that would lead to more serious espionage charges.

Judges underscored the seriousness of the charges by denying bail for the Mak brothers. One judge told Chi Mak's lawyer: "You're talking about billions of dollars of technology that puts our country at serious risk."

Chi Mak, a specialist in electrical power, received a secret-level security clearance in 1996.

The document trail led investigators to conclude that he passed information that will allow Beijing to track the Pentagon's new Virginia class-attack submarine, which uses L-3 technology. The compromised technology also will enable the Chinese to develop countermeasures against the submarine and to copy its electronic systems.

Investigators believe he gave China schematics and design information on the latest generation of Aegis weapons systems, which L-3 helped to develop. Aegis -- meaning shield -- is being upgraded to become America's most advanced and mobile anti-missile system for use on guided-missile cruisers, guided-missile destroyers, Sea Wolf-class submarines and aircraft carriers.

Chi Mak worked on four classified Navy contracts related to Aegis. Investigators believe his spy ring was the main supplier of Aegis technology to China and, one U.S. defense official says, the Chinese quickly incorporated it into their Luyang II guided-missile destroyer.

Lesser charges

By the time formal indictments were issued Nov. 15, the most serious charges against Chi Mak and the three others had been dropped. Tai Mak's wife was excluded altogether, though she was charged separately with running an illegal marriage-fraud network that helped immigrants gain entry into the United States.

The three remaining suspects were indicted on relatively minor charges of failing to register as foreign agents. The initial charges could have resulted in prison terms of up to 25 years, but the lesser charges carried maximum sentences of 10 years. Chi Mak, his wife and Tai Mak all pleaded not guilty.

So what changed? U.S. government sources say that petty squabbling between prosecutors and investigators jeopardized the case.

The more serious charges were dropped because the FBI counterintelligence team that conducted the investigation got into a dispute with the U.S. attorneys in Los Angeles who were in charge of the prosecution.

The FBI fully expected that search warrants would unearth classified data, so prosecutors balked when much of what was found was not officially classified as secret.

"Nothing I passed [to China] was classified," Chi Mak told investigators shortly after his arrest.

He was right. Investigators say the lack of classified documents revealed that the spies had done their homework.

Chinese intelligence-gathering services exploited the fact that Navy officials underclassified some of the most sensitive information about weapons systems to make it easier for private defense contractors to use the data.

DOJ_NMG_0063902

"There is no question that this case has caused serious damage to U.S. national security," one investigator said.

'More subtle'

Espionage laws are so difficult to apply that prosecutors almost need a confession to be able to make their case.

The current statute, enacted in 1917, requires prosecutors to prove "intent or reason to believe that the information is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation."

This standard often forces the release of intelligence or defense information to prove national security was harmed.

David Szady, head of FBI counterintelligence until this year, said loss of sensitive-yet-unclassified information can do real harm to national security.

The technology passed to China in the Mak case was proprietary corporate trade secrets or export-controlled, but did not carry the "secret" or "top-secret" label. Chi Mak had access to Connecticut-based submarine manufacturer Electric Boat, for example, as if he were one of their own employees, Szady said.

The case "probably murdered the Navy" because of the loss of technology, he said.

Obtaining contract documents not only will allow Beijing to build its own version of one of the Navy's developmental warships, the DD(X) destroyer, but possibly to "sell it in competition to us," Szady said.

The Chinese, he said, are good at positioning agents who can obtain advanced technology in the developmental stage, before it is classified.

"The [spy] business is getting more complex, more subtle," Szady said. "It's smarter business than the old cloak-and-dagger."

U.S., Europe Seek Stronger Asia Currencies (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Worried that their nations' companies are being undercut by inexpensive Asian competitors, the U.S. and its European allies are responding by pressing to push up the exchange value of Asian currencies.

In statements at top-level financial meetings during the weekend, European officials suggested they expect the yen to rise, in an apparent effort to jawbone financial markets to drive the Japanese currency up against the euro. At the same time, finance officials from the Group of Seven major industrial powers, including the U.S., renewed their long campaign to persuade China to allow the yuan to appreciate against the dollar and euro. (See related article1.)

"Greater exchange-rate flexibility is desirable in emerging economies with large current-account surpluses, especially China, for necessary adjustments to occur," the G-7 officials said in a communiqué issued at the end of their session Saturday.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson echoed that view at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund's steering committee yesterday when he called for "greater exchange-rate flexibility in Asian emerging economies."

He also called on finance ministers to clamp down on Iran's finances. He said Tehran uses front companies to finance its nuclear ambitions and to fund terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas.

The currency pressure reflects the political potency of the exchange-rate issue. European officials feel that the weakness of the dollar and certain Asian currencies, such as the yen and the yuan, has left the euro the strongest of the major currencies. That makes it harder for European companies to compete with foreign producers.

Likewise, U.S. manufacturers, unions and lawmakers argue that China's practice of keeping the yuan artificially weak against the dollar is costing American companies sales and American workers jobs. Treasury officials have for years called for a more-flexible Chinese exchange rate.

But markets are eager to understand the views of the new Treasury secretary, who travels to China tomorrow eager to stake out his own attitude toward Beijing. Mr. Paulson considers other aspects of China's economic policy to be of equal or greater concern than the yuan, but he also recognizes that he must address the currency question directly if he is to stave off protectionist moves in Congress.

The Senate is expected to vote this month on a bill imposing 27.5% tariffs on all Chinese imports to retaliate for the alleged currency advantage.

"China needs greater currency flexibility and stronger domestic consumption, as well as financial-sector reform," Mr. Paulson said after the G-7 gathering.

While Treasury officials are dubious that a stronger yuan would do much in and of itself to correct the ballooning U.S. trade deficit, they do believe that a stronger yuan could persuade other Asian governments to allow their currencies to rise, too, in theory making U.S. products more competitive around the world.

"The Asians are not so concerned about losing competitiveness against the U.S.," said Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International. "If one Asian currency goes up by too much, their fear is they'll lose competitiveness against the other Asian exporters. So they're looking over their shoulders at one another."

After keeping the yuan virtually frozen against the dollar for a decade, China revalued the currency by 2.1% in July 2005. Since then it has further strengthened by just a couple of percentage points.

China will allow market forces to play a greater role in setting the value of the yuan and will adjust the currency's daily trading band "sooner or later," the country's central-bank governor said on the sidelines of the global economic meetings.

Comments by People's Bank of China Governor Zhou Xiaochuan signal that China is willing to continue adding flexibility to its exchange rate but won't accelerate changes in its foreign-exchange policy in the face of criticism that it isn't doing enough in terms of the global economy.

Yesterday, Mr. Zhou played down the role of the yuan's exchange rate in resolving global trade imbalances. "Structural policy plays a much larger role [in adjustments], compared with the exchange rate," he said.

Responding to expectations that China would widen daily trading limits for the yuan's exchange rate, Mr. Zhou also said that China could widen the band if the currency used up the existing flexibility allowed or to accommodate large changes in exchange rates of major international currencies.

Currently, China allows the yuan to fall or rise in one day by no more than 0.3% against the U.S. dollar from its opening central parity level, which the central bank issues each morning.

Mr. Zhou declined to give a specific timetable for a widening of the daily trading band.

The European G-7 members -- France, Britain, Germany and Italy -- were part of the chorus calling on China to relax its grip on the yuan. But in other comments during the weekend's meetings, senior European officials focused on the yen, commenting in language sufficiently similar to suggest a coordinated strategy of talking up the Japanese currency.

German Finance Minister Peer Steinbrück told reporters that Japan's currency should respond to -- presumably by appreciating -- both the end of the country's zero-interest-rate monetary policy and its solidly recovering economy, estimated by the IMF to expand 2.7% this year. Likewise, European Central Bank President Jean-Claude Trichet said the G-7 officials had "all agreed that the yen will reflect these developments."

Mr. Paulson's comments on Iran reflect the Bush administration's frustrations in seeking United Nations sanctions against Tehran. He said he has dispatched aides to Europe and the Persian Gulf in recent days, where he has instructed them to lay out the U.S. case that Iran has been using dozens of front companies to fool banks into facilitating illicit financial transactions. That follows Treasury's decision this month to ban Iran's Bank Saderat from access to the U.S. financial system, either directly or through its relationships with foreign banks.

China Competes With West In Aid To Its Neighbors (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

STUNG TRENG, Cambodia — In the dense humidity of northern Cambodia, where canoes are the common mode of transportation, a foreman from a Chinese construction company directs local laborers to haul stones to the ramp of a nearly completed bridge.

Nearby, engineers from the China Shanghai Construction Group have sunk more than a dozen concrete pylons across a tributary of the mighty Mekong River, a technical feat that will help knit together a 1,200-mile route from the southern Chinese city of Kunming through Laos to the Cambodian port of Sihanoukville on the Gulf of Thailand.

This is the new face of China's foreign aid to poor Asian countries: difficult construction in remote places that benefits the recipient, and China, too.

"It is the favor of our government to the Cambodian people," said Ge Zhen, 26, one of the more than 50 engineers and 250 other Chinese workers on the four-year project.

Flush with nearly a trillion dollars in hard currency reserves and eager for stable friends in Southeast Asia, China is making big loans for big projects to countries that used to be the sole preserve of the World Bank, the Asian Development Bank, the United States and Japan.

With the Singapore meeting of the World Bank on Sept. 19 and 20, China, one of the bank's biggest customers, is quietly shaking up the aid business in Asia, competing with the bank at its own game.

For poor countries like Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar, and somewhat better-off countries like the Philippines, China's loans are often more attractive than the complicated loans from the West.

The Chinese money usually comes unencumbered with conditions for environmental standards or community resettlement that can hold up major projects. The aid does not carry penalties for corruption that are being increasingly used by the World Bank president, Paul D. Wolfowitz. And China's offers rarely include the extra freight of expensive consultants, provisions that are common to World Bank projects.

For its part, China benefits from the added infrastructure — roads, ports and bridges — in the underdeveloped but growing region around it, to help increase trade and to move natural resources from China's periphery to its heartland.

Liqun Jin, vice president of the Asian Development Bank and a former vice minister of finance in Beijing, said in an interview at the bank's headquarters in Manila that China had carefully considered how to use its increasing wealth.

"China is attracting external capital, and as a balance China wants to help developing countries in the region by financing infrastructure projects," Mr. Jin said. "Helping your neighbors to have a good life is no sin."

He added, "China makes no bones that we want a peaceful neighborhood to develop our own economy."

The effects are likely to be enormous. Tom Crouch, country director for the Philippines at the Asian Development Bank, said, "Here comes a very large new player on the block that has the potential of changing the landscape of overseas development assistance."

Already, in the past several years, China has given aid to African countries, where it is buying oil and gas. They include some with repressive governments like Nigeria, Sudan and Angola.

Even during the cold war, China spread aid around Africa, sometimes to counterbalance assistance from rival countries, which were being helped by Taiwan. In the 1960's and 70's, for example, China aided Angola while Taiwan helped neighboring South Africa.

In Cambodia, Prime Minister Hun Sen boasts of China's offer last spring of $600 million in "no strings attached" loans, made during a visit from the Chinese prime minister, Wen Jiabao. The money will help pay for two major bridges near the capital, Phnom Penh, that will link to a network of roads; a hydropower plant; and a fiber-optic network that will connect Cambodia's telecommunications with that of Vietnam and Thailand.

In contrast, Mr. Hun Sen points out that the traditional lenders together pledged just $1 million more than China. And the money came laden with conditions, including World Bank anticorruption clauses.

Four World Bank programs in Cambodia worth about $70 million were recently suspended by the bank after its investigators found corruption among Cambodian officials in the procurement process.

China's generosity to Cambodia has caught Washington's attention. The United States Navy is planning a port visit to Sihanoukville early next year, a first since the Khmer Rouge seized power in 1975.

In the Philippines, China is also making a big splash, offering an extraordinary package of $2 billion in loans each year for the next three years from its Export-Import Bank.

That made the $200 million offered separately by the World Bank and the Asian Development Bank look puny, officials from those banks said, and easily outstripped a $1 billion loan under negotiation with Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0063905

Officially, the World Bank says it is not concerned about competition from China's increasingly energetic aid program. "The more important impact of China on these countries' development is trade rather than aid," said Homi Kharas, the bank's chief economist for East Asia and the Pacific.

The aid, chiefly for infrastructure, was being focused by China on the integration of trade in the region, a useful result for poor countries, he said.

But Western aid donors complain that China is secretive about its aid projects, and that it declines to attend the traditional meetings presided over by the World Bank to coordinate aid activities in poor countries. They also say they doubt that China always delivers the full value of the projects that it announces.

And Western aid officials said they were taken aback when the news of the $2 billion Chinese aid package came out at a lunch meeting of more than 100 aid donors in Manila last month. The size of the Chinese loans came as a shock, in part because the Philippines serves as the headquarters of the Asian Development Bank, a lender dominated by Japan and the United States. China is also a shareholder.

The secretary general of the National Economic and Development Authority in the Philippines, Romulo Neri, compared the Chinese aid package to those from other sources, and noted the appealing absence of the expensive consultant fees common to Western projects.

After being a favorite of the Bush White House, the Philippine president, Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, fell out of favor when she pulled her country's troops out of Iraq in 2004.

The Chinese appeared to have quickly filled the economic breach for the Philippines and, according to a memorandum from Mr. Neri's office, a number of projects are expected to be completed when Mr. Wen visits Manila in December.

They include two toll roads and a water supply system for Manila, and further financing for a rail project already under way to connect northern Manila with four provinces.

In some countries, like Cambodia, China's construction projects seem clearly aimed at helping to assure China's access to natural resources.

Western diplomats and aid officials in Phnom Penh said they believed that Cambodia had recently granted China the rights to one of five offshore oil fields that could yield as much as $700 million to $1 billion a year. Chevron already has an agreement for exploratory drilling at one of the Cambodian fields.

Washington does not know yet, and would like to know, whether China plans to offer loans for an often-discussed deep-sea port at Sihanoukville that would allow China a convenient delivery point for its Middle East oil imports.

In resource-rich Myanmar, the former Burma, Beijing's only real competitor on the aid front is India. China has built dams and roads connecting the interior of the country to China's southern flank, and is currently reported to be working on a deep-water port on Myanmar's west coast.

Myanmar is in deep arrears to the World Bank, which said it had no loan program there. The United States offers no official aid, either, because of the repressive nature of the government.

In Laos, China has built a major road up the spine of the country, and has been influential as much by the prospect of what it might do, than by what it has actually accomplished.

After years of study on the impact on the environment, the World Bank broke ground on a environmentally controversial major dam, known as Nam Theun 2, in Laos last year, because it knew that China was ready to step in to build the dam, bank officials say.

Beyond its no-strings approach, China is often appreciated as a lender by poor countries because it is willing to take on complicated projects in distant areas that others are not.

The bridge that Mr. Ge, the engineer, and his colleagues have sweated over during the last four years — the temperature creeps up as high as 106 in April — is in one of the most underdeveloped corners of Southeast Asia, the area where the Khmer Rouge first took power.

Running from the bridge is a new, smooth 130-mile road built by Mr. Ge's team that connects Kratie, a village to the south of Stung Treng, to the Laotian border.

DOJ_NMG_0063906

"When we came here four years ago, we would leave at breakfast time from Kratie and we would arrive here for dinner — eight hours," Mr. Ge said. "It now takes two hours."

Ghani Joins Race To Succeed Annan (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Ashraf Ghani, the former Afghan finance minister, is expected to make a late entry into the race to succeed Kofi Annan as secretary-general of the United Nations, taking the number of formally declared candidates to seven.

Mr Ghani, 57, will declare his candidacy this afternoon in a meeting with Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, who is visiting the US.

"I hope to win, through ideas," Mr Ghani told the Financial Times in New York. "In the public debate so far, I have yet to see a clear articulation of vision, an analysis of the central issues and a programme for change."

The Kabul-born Mr Ghani returned to Afghanistan in October 2001 after an absence of 24 years, interrupting a stellar career at the World Bank as a UN special adviser.

From June 2002 to December 2004 he served as finance minister, securing pledges of $28bn from international donors. He left the government to become chancellor of Kabul University.

"The UN would be very lucky indeed to get him," said Hernando de Soto, economist and founder of the Institute for Liberty and Democracy in Lima.

Carlos Pascual, director of foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution, said he had "tremendous intellect, talent and capacity to mobilise the UN".

Other observers said Mr Ghani had a strong track record as an administrator but suffered from his reputation for impatience.

"Ashraf wants to reform the whole international aid system and has some fantastic ideas," said an acquaintance. "But given that he blows up at even his closest friends, I can't see him as the world's leading peace-maker."

In a second round of straw polls in the Security Council last week, Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, consolidated his lead. It also emerged that Vaira Vike-Freiberga, the Latvian president, would run.

Security Probes Hold Up Diplomats (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Dozens of Foreign Service officers say their careers are in ruins because their security clearances were suspended based on suspicions or unsubstantiated accusations.

Several have accused the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service (DSS) in interviews of "abusing the security clearance process" by punishing "whistleblowing, dissenting viewpoints or minor acts of possible misfeasance unrelated to national security."

"All I want is a resolution, even if they decide to revoke my clearance," said Daniel Hirsch, whose request for an assignment in Iraq or Afghanistan has languished for three years.

"At least, I'll be able to take further action. Now, my hands are tied, and I'm just waiting while my career is being destroyed."

Mr. Hirsch, a Foreign Service officer for 21 years, has spent his career working in hardship posts in Africa, Central Asia and the Balkans, so it was only fitting that he would volunteer for the world's most dangerous places.

"I put my name in several times a year, but I've never heard back from anyone," he said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has repeatedly called for U.S. diplomats to serve in the two posts that the Bush administration deems most important for its war on terrorism.

But Mr. Hirsch is not eligible to serve in any overseas post while awaiting the outcome of a DSS investigation that began in 2003. He said he has been kept in the dark about its findings and possible outcome.

DOJ_NMG_0063907

"DSS maintains that they do not even have to establish any facts in order to revoke a clearance, much less suspend one" said Mr. Hirsch, whose battle with DSS began when his wife sought marital counseling at their last post in Ashgabat, Turkmenistan.

That counseling prompted suspicions of spousal abuse, which continue to be investigated, even though his wife has repeatedly denied any such abuse in writing.

Mr. Hirsch said the DSS dug up a brief episode from his past -- a trip he took with the group Volunteers for Israel when he was 23 and working for the CIA. The agency knew about it, he said, but DSS became suspicious about a picture of him in an Israeli military uniform.

DSS declined to comment for this article, saying only that it does everything according to the law and administrative regulations. A spokeswoman said there are up to 30 suspensions every year from among the up to 40,000 State Department employees and contractors who hold security clearances at any given time.

Diplomats with suspended clearance are given desk jobs in Washington that require little of their expertise and experience.

Les Hickman, who had his clearance suspended in November 2002, said the DSS has "no transparent procedure about how they do things."

"What happened to me was based on allegations, nothing factual," he said.

Mr. Hickman, who has been in the Foreign Service since 1978, was the U.S. consul in Amman, Jordan, when DSS discovered that one of his local Jordanian employees was taking money from visa applicants to expedite their paperwork.

That employee's duties included processing applications from Iraqis, who after the September 11 terrorist attacks required special screening, and Mr. Hickman had issued instructions that all Iraqi cases be referred to him.

Because only Mr. Hickman and the local employee had access to those applications, DSS suspected that the consul might be involved in the fraud scheme as well. His clearance was suspended, and he was relieved of his duties.

The investigation found that bribes had been taken only from Jordanians and not Iraqis, and it produced no evidence that Mr. Hickman had anything to do with the scheme. Mr. Hickman said he knew nothing about it, and the Jordanian employee said he had acted alone.

Then DSS accused Mr. Hickman of abusing his power by forbidding anyone else in the consulate to handle the Iraqi applications. Mr. Hickman said he did that because his junior officers did not understand the State Department's new instructions and made mistakes.

Mr. Hickman, who was last interviewed by DSS in June 2004, said he does not understand why the State Department allows cases such as his to drag on for years when critical diplomatic posts -- and consular positions in particular -- remain vacant.

In some cases, Mr. Hirsch said, clearances have been suspended based on nothing more than an accusation.

Bruce Knotts was the deputy chief of mission in Banjul, Gambia, in February 2004, when a local security guard accused him of making a sexual pass at him.

"That never happened, although I am gay," Mr. Knotts said, "but the guard's story was that he refused, and I turned around and left. Nevertheless, they gave me 24 hours to leave the embassy."

Last December, DSS recommended that his clearance be revoked. It denied his first appeal last month, and he is about to take his case to a panel of representatives from the offices of the undersecretary of state for management, the assistant secretary for administration and the director-general of the Foreign Service.

"This is my best shot," he said. "It's the first chance to talk to somebody other than DSS."

IMF Expected To OK Reform, More Forecast (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 18, 2006

SINGAPORE — The International Monetary Fund is expected today to approve a U.S.-backed overhaul giving four fast-growing countries a greater say in the global lender's operations and paving the way for broader changes by 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0063908

"This was a reform summit to create the IMF of the future," said Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the exchequer and chairman of a key IMF oversight committee.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson endorsed the plan Sunday as "a small down payment" on broader reforms. The two-stage package is billed as the biggest makeover in IMF governance in 60 years.

But the plan is opposed by key economic powers, including Brazil and India, and will trigger intense skirmishing about the new formula the IMF eventually will adopt to complete its internal realignment.

Poor countries, in particular, fear their already weak representation could ebb further. "The current package of reforms does not adequately address the problem of under-representation of developing countries," said Philippines Finance Secretary Margarito Teves, chairman of the G24 group of developing countries.

Nations enjoying a greater say than their economic punch warrants, such as Belgium and the Netherlands, worry that any new approach will cost them. (The U.S., which has 17% of the IMF votes but accounts for 30% of the global economy, says it won't seek a larger say.)

The reform, the centerpiece of the fund's annual meeting this week, reflects the dramatic changes in the world economy in recent years, such as the rise of Asia and an enormous expansion in global capital flows.

First to benefit: China, Turkey, South Korea and Mexico, the countries suffering the biggest gap between their share of IMF votes and the size of their economies. The measure, expected to be approved today, will trigger only modest changes immediately. China, for example, will see its share of IMF votes rise to 3.7% from 2.98%.

The U.S. sees the overhaul as a critical step in preserving the IMF's legitimacy. Created in 1944 to promote global financial stability, the fund remains tilted toward the economic powers of an earlier day.

The mismatch between individual countries' economic heft and their voting shares has become increasingly controversial following the financial crises that began in Asia in 1997. Smaller countries that accepted IMF bailouts in the 1990s resented the harsh conditions the fund attached to its loans, especially since the borrowers had so little say in the fund's operations.

Many Asian and Latin American nations responded by accumulating enormous stockpiles of foreign reserves to avoid new fund borrowing. Now, without major reforms, IMF officials worry they could abandon the fund entirely in favor of new regional groupings.

Colombian Village's Unarmed Rebellion (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

ARENAS ALTAS, Colombia — Ana Hilda Vargas was living in a place called Hope when the gunmen came to her farm and gave her an ultimatum: Leave your house in 48 hours or be killed.

"Everything I built in my youth and all that I had — pigs, hens, mango and avocado trees, yucca, corn and bean fields — I lost that day," Vargas said, recalling the terrible morning in 1997 when she was thrown off her land in the village of Esperanza by paramilitary members.

It wouldn't be the last time she would hear that chilling warning.

Over the next six years, the widow, now 50, was forced from one village to another by army, right-wing paramilitary and left-wing guerrilla groups vying for control of this strategic, mineral-rich region of northwest Colombia. One of 3 million displaced Colombians, she became a statistic in one of the hemisphere's longest-running humanitarian crises.

Finally, Vargas decided she'd rather die than be rootless again. Three years ago, she joined the "peace community" of San Jose de Apartado, where a group of 1,200 peasant pacifists is taking a brave stand against the country's civil conflict.

The community of three villages, which includes Arenas Altas, where Vargas lives, was formed in 1997 after a Catholic archbishop named Isaias Duarte — who would be assassinated five years later — encouraged the farmers to say no to war. It is one of 10 such peace communities, or "humanitarian zones," in Colombia, according to Justice and Peace, a human rights advocacy organization in Bogota, the capital.

"They are making a strong moral point at great risk to themselves," said Lisa Haugaard of the Latin America Working Group, a human rights advocacy office in Washington. "It's a very hard and daring venture which seems to almost invite attacks from the various armed actors."

Vargas lives off the land in this Xanadu-like corner of Colombia, creased by river chasms and carpeted with cedar, cacao and banana trees, accessible only by mule. Her village of 200 people, hemmed in by the jungle, is a neatly laid-out collection of wood-paneled shacks bordered by the community soccer field. Pigs and mules roam freely.

She and other members disavow any contact or collaboration with armed groups, and agree to work as a collective on crops, livestock and community projects and to share what they produce. The group is self-sufficient except for small grants from outsiders to build community projects.

But the community's profession of neutrality has not shielded it from horrendous violence.

Of San Jose's nearly 1,400 original members, 178 have been killed since 1997 by armed groups looking to clear the zone of suspected collaborators, appropriate valuable land for themselves or claim transit routes for arms and drugs traffic in and out of nearby Pacific and Caribbean ports.

Because of the risks and hardships, there has been no inrush of new residents: Since its founding, about as many members have joined as have fled.

Community leader Renato Araiza estimates that 80% of the victims have been killed by the army and rightist paramilitaries, the rest by the leftist guerrillas here in the Uraba region of Antioquia state. One day last year, his 16-year-old sister was killed by guerrillas for refusing to collaborate.

"Each side suspects us of helping the other one, and that's why they all want us to leave," said Araiza, who also has lost a cousin to the violence. "We are trying to change the logic of armed groups who think guns solve anything."

In a small park in San Josecito, another village in the community, rocks painted with the names of the victims and the dates of their deaths serve as a humble memorial. There are reminders elsewhere of the price the community has paid. A kiosk in La Union, three miles from here, was the scene of the execution-style killings of six community members by suspected paramilitaries six years ago.

"We've gotten it from all sides," said Alicia Guzman, whose husband was killed in 1992, leaving her with three daughters to raise alone.

The death toll would undoubtedly be higher if it were not for the presence of volunteer "accompaniers" provided by international groups such as San Francisco-based Fellowship for Reconciliation, or FOR, and Peace Brigades International, a British group. The death rate has tapered off since 2002, when FOR began placing two volunteers in the community on a full-time basis.

"The hope is that by being here, the armed groups won't commit acts that would create an international public relations problem. The political costs increase if something happens to us," said Paul Kozak, a 24-year-old Huntingdon, Pa., native and FOR volunteer here.

A deeply religious Catholic who once considered joining the priesthood, Kozak is a pacifist whose ambition is to work nonviolently to help solve conflicts. After graduating from a Jesuit college in the Midwest, he went to El Salvador to work with street gang members. Then he heard about the peace community's refusal to leave its land and volunteered as an accompanier.

The accompaniers have hardly made the community bulletproof.

In February 2005, San Jose's leader and co-founder, Luis Eduardo Guerra, his girlfriend and his 11-year-old son were hacked to death along with five others shortly after he announced that the peace community was expanding its boundaries to include another village. His wife had been killed the year before by an army grenade.

The killings prompted outrage among international human rights groups but, as with so many other violent deaths in this region, no suspects have been jailed nor charges filed.

Many community members blame the army for the deaths, but the government denies responsibility. The investigation has been hampered somewhat by the community's refusal to cooperate fully for fear of reprisals.

DOJ_NMG_0063910

Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has little use for neutrality in what he has described as "total war" against subversive forces. Last year, he accused the community of being supporters of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, the country's largest leftist guerrilla group. Community leaders and international peace activists say Uribe's charge is baseless.

The U.S. Embassy was concerned enough about the killings of Guerra and the others to withhold human rights "certification" of Colombia for several months last year, delaying the delivery of $35 million of the $600 million in annual Plan Colombia aid aimed at fighting drugs and terrorism.

Appalled by the violence, the Organization of American States demanded that the Uribe government work with the peace community on protective measures. But two months after the killings of Guerra and the others, Uribe unilaterally established a national police base in the middle of San Jose de Apartado.

The community objected, saying any such base should have been located far outside town. Most of the residents fled and no longer consider the town of San Jose part of the neutral zone.

"No one has forgotten what happened in Bojaya," said Araiza, the community leader, referring to a town in neighboring Choco state where guerrillas in 2002 killed 119 peasants in a mortar attack after the paramilitary units army briefly occupied the village.

Three more members have been killed since the February 2005 slayings.

The Uraba region was a guerrilla stronghold until the late 1980s, when the right-wing paramilitary movement began as a landowner-financed reaction to counteract the leftists' widespread extortion, kidnappings and killings.

The two sides have fought a bloody war for dominance ever since, with ideology taking a back seat to competition for control of Colombia's drug and arms trade and real estate. Periodic advances and retreats by opposing sides have caused an ebb and flow of evacuations of poor Uraba farmers such as Vargas.

Colombia's paramilitaries are in the process of disarming, but Uribe's growing army is filling the vacuum.

In Arena Altas, Vargas scratches out a living as a sharecropper, renting land on which she raises pigs, rice and corn. Malaria, dengue fever and several varieties of poisonous snakes may prevail, but Vargas, a tiny, care-worn woman whose skin and expression reflect a life of hardship and tragedy, says she is happy to be in the countryside. During her years as a nomad, she spent time in the city of Medellin, where she says people are treated as "machines" and she nearly died of starvation and loneliness.

"When you have no job, no place to stay and you don't know anybody, you are just an object of reproach in the city," Vargas said, adding that she was reduced to begging in the streets to survive. "At least in the country you can grow what you need to sustain yourself."

In a community where everyone seems to have lost a loved one to the arbitrary power of the gun, Vargas is no exception: Her husband and two brothers were killed in the conflict. She doesn't like talking about how they died.

Although the violence now seems deceptively distant much of the time, the village has not been forgotten by the warring sides. In March, a gun battle between guerrillas and the army broke out; as the two sides fired at each other from opposite ridges, bullets whizzed over the town in the small valley below. One soldier died in the volley.

Vargas believes the presence of Kozak and fellow FOR volunteer Gilberto Villasenor saved villagers from another forced evacuation order, or worse.

"If they weren't here, we would have been crushed," she said.

Just before the battle erupted, Vargas and the two volunteers approached troops who had gathered in the soccer field below the town. She knew guerrillas were in the area, and asked the soldiers to release a father and son they had detained and leave to avoid bloodshed.

Kozak, who described the half-hour shootout as "terrifying and deafening," spoke admiringly of Vargas' courage, saying that she put herself in harm's way to spare the village from violence, that her stubborn insistence on speaking up and staying put had furthered the cause of peace.

Vargas, who still hopes the war will end and she will one day return to her farm in Esperanza, said she had little left to lose.

"Living in the country," she said, "is the only way I know to exist."

Dictator And Diplomat (USNEWS)

By Eduardo Cue

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

MALABO, EQUATORIAL GUINEA-It was what Washington insiders call a grip 'n' grin. A beaming President Teodoro Obiang Nguema of Equatorial Guinea shook hands with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who welcomed him warmly to Washington as a "good friend" of the United States. If Rice had any qualms that April day, she didn't let them show. Obiang may head a corrupt and repressive regime, according to the State Department's own human-rights reports, but Equatorial Guinea is a growing oil producer-now No. 3 in sub-Saharan Africa after Nigeria and Angola-and an oil-needy America can't afford to be too picky about choosing its petro pals.

But half a world away, in this nation's dusty, ramshackle capital, Rice's diplomatic pragmatism doesn't cut it for two political dissidents who show their torture scars from their four years confined in the notorious Black Beach prison. "We are offended," one of them says. "For a Third World country to call a dictator a good friend is one thing, but for the United States to do it is something else."

Equatorial Guinea is one of those places-and there are others, to be sure-where Washington chooses not to be preachy when the competition for oil reserves is against countries such as China, unencumbered by concerns about human rights and corruption. And even Obiang's opponents seem resigned to that reality. "There will be no democracy here because the president of Equatorial Guinea does not want to democratize the country," the dissident asserts. "Equatorial Guinea's oil resources are in the hands of Obiang and his family. The people are living in a state of misery."

Nouveau riche. A former Spanish colony in West Africa, Equatorial Guinea was a forlorn, forgotten place eking out a living on coca and tobacco exports until oil was struck in the early 1990s. Today, it is quickly becoming a petrostate, its agriculture abandoned and its economy almost entirely dependent on rising revenues from oil and natural gas. Equatorial Guinea's offshore wells pump some 350,000 barrels a day, providing the government with a $3.8 billion windfall this year alone.

The country of roughly 1 million people-nearly double the official population estimate-is finally getting some respect. It has drawn attention from energy-hungry China, which is providing military training as well as locking up oil rights. In February, China National Offshore Oil Co. signed an oil production deal with Equatorial Guinea, following a strategic partnership between the two countries announced by Obiang during his visit to Beijing last October.

The United States, which closed its embassy in 1995, reopened a diplomatic mission in 2003. The Senate is expected to soon confirm career diplomat Donald C. Johnson to serve as the first resident ambassador here in over a decade. As part of the increased contacts, the Bush administration says it is pressing Obiang and his government for progress on issues such as political reform, anticorruption measures, and human-rights protections. "Human rights are violated systematically and on a daily basis," says Jesus Ela Abeme, a leader of the Convergence Party for Social Democracy, the country's only truly independent opposition force. "Torture is practiced daily. It is the only method of investigation and punishment."

Shielding The Allies (WSJ)

By Marshall Billingslea

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Events of the past few months underscore how the missile threat is growing. Both North Korea and Iran, for example, have done flight testing of their missiles. Their programs, along with their developing nuclear capabilities, are raising worries in Europe and North America. Advanced and dangerous technology is still spreading -- and in the wrong hands, these technologies can be weapons of terror.

NATO has been working hard to develop protection against the emerging missile threat. An effective theater missile defense (TMD) requires, among many things, sophisticated radars to spot incoming missiles, a computerized network to command and control the defenses, and interceptor rockets to shoot down attacking missiles. We have been making progress in all of these areas.

For the past several years, we have been designing a command and control network that will be able to "plug and play" with the many different radars and interceptor systems possessed by the 26 allies. We are now ready to start building it. The NATO system will be the most sophisticated of its type in the world, and will be the only system which can integrate defenses, such as the well-known Patriot battery, from every NATO nation. Additionally, in terms of Patriot-type batteries, three allies (the United States, Germany, and Italy) have created the NATO Medium Extended Air Defense System Agency to build a "next generation" defense, called MEADS. This defense, like those of all NATO allies, will be able to work with the command and control network that we will construct. Finally, the Netherlands leads NATO's work to protect against the "low-end" of the threat spectrum, against mortars and short-range rocket attacks. These multinational efforts, in addition to what some NATO allies are doing on their own, are progressively making our troops safer from the threat of short- and medium-range missile attack.

Today NATO crosses a major milestone in its theater missile defense efforts. The Alliance is announcing, in London, the selection of a trans-Atlantic consortium of companies with whom we will begin working on the first of our major missile defense contracts. Specifically, we will soon start construction of an integration test bed that will be used to develop the NATO TMD command and control network. It will take a few years to build the test bed, and a few years more to complete the actual command and control system; there are significant technological challenges in building something able to integrate so many different national TMD systems. But once built, the test bed will not only help with our command and control project; it also can be used in the future for more sophisticated and challenging territorial missile defense work.

Many NATO allies already have the capability to deploy defenses to protect their troops against SCUD-type missiles. Indeed, as NATO MEADS shows, several nations are making their systems even better. But none of them have the ability to make their defenses work seamlessly with one another to give overlapping protection. That is what NATO will provide with its program. And, except for a handful of allies, few nations can protect against more sophisticated medium range missiles, such as the North Korean Nodong missile. Again, the NATO system that we are building will give a better degree of protection against this threat because it will let us merge the best capabilities that each nation has to offer, and "stretch" their effectiveness.

But we can, and should, do more. The threat is growing more and more sophisticated. As capable as our theater missile defenses are becoming, they are not able to protect against intercontinental range ballistic missiles (ICBMs), or even some kinds of medium-range systems. But those are precisely the types of missiles that some countries are pursuing, along with weapons of mass destruction. Only the North American part of the Alliance today has a limited shield against such weapons. The rest of Alliance territory is vulnerable.

In the face of these growing threats, our Alliance has several options. We can continue to limit NATO to dealing with the shorter range threats, leaving it to individual nations to provide defenses against the longer range threats. Or we can choose to address the whole range of threats together, and develop a common defense for the entire Alliance. It is clear that some nations, perceiving an urgent need for action, are taking steps of their own. While their efforts are entirely consistent with the blueprint that NATO has already developed for Europe's defense, and while we hope they succeed in their efforts, we also hope that all Alliance members will choose to move forward together. Certainly the door for this cooperation has been opened. This past spring, all of NATO's National Armament Directors unanimously affirmed that an effective shield for all of NATO was feasible.

NATO's greatest strength is the power of its unity -- unity of commitment and unity of action. That is why we favor a unified approach that leaves no nation behind, provides a NATO missile shield to all of our citizens, and gives the highest degree of certainty that any missile threat, whether from state adversaries or terrorists, will be defeated. In November, when the NATO heads of state and governments meet at a Summit in Latvia's capital, Riga, it is to be hoped that this matter will be discussed and that NATO will proceed with developing this urgently-needed defense.

Mr. Billingslea is NATO's assistant secretary general for defense investment.

DDT's New Friend (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

The World Health Organization announced Friday that it will begin actively promoting use of the pesticide DDT to combat malaria in developing nations. Do you believe in miracles?

Malaria is the number one killer of pregnant women and children in Africa and among the top killers in Asia and South America. It's long been known that DDT is the cheapest and most effective way to contain the disease, which is spread by infected mosquitoes. But United Nations health agencies and others have for decades resisted employing DDT under pressure from anti-pesticide environmentalists. After tens of millions of preventable malarial deaths in these poor countries, it's nice to see WHO finally come to its senses.

The agency's malaria chief, Arata Kochi, told reporters that "one of the best tools we have against malaria is indoor residual spraying. Of the dozen or so insecticides WHO has approved as safe for house spraying, the most effective is DDT." He also said, "We must take a position based on the science and the data."

Mr. Kochi's intellectual honesty is commendable and all too rare among public health officials in this debate. For decades, the science and empirical data about DDT's effectiveness have been distorted or suppressed. Nevertheless, and Rachel Carson's scare-mongering notwithstanding, there is no evidence that DDT use in the amounts necessary to ward off malarial mosquitoes is harmful to humans, wildlife or the environment. Period.

By contrast, there's plenty of evidence -- from the U.S. and Europe to Australia, India, Sri Lanka and Brazil -- that spraying DDT is the best intervention. According to Pierre Guillet, another WHO official at Friday's press conference, South Africa temporarily stopped using DDT in 1996 because green groups were opposed, not because it wasn't working. Malaria takes a heavy toll on a country's economy by discouraging foreign investment and incapacitating otherwise productive people, so these anti-DDT alarmists have been helping to impoverish those they don't kill. There is something other-worldly, or worse, about well-heeled greens trying to deny the world's poorest people the very tool used by rich nations to eradicate this disease.

Even if WHO's decision won't change those minds, its stamp of approval on pesticide use matters in the public health world. Other organizations, ranging from the World Bank to Aid for International Development to Doctors Without Borders, look to WHO for guidance and will now likely reassess their own guidelines. The U.S. is typically the largest donor to these international agencies, and the recent efforts of Republican Senators Sam Brownback of Kansas and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, who have called for DDT intervention and more responsible allocation of aid dollars generally, no doubt played a role in WHO's decision.

One insecticide won't end malaria, and DDT's proponents don't claim it will. But by keeping more people alive and healthy, DDT can help create the conditions for the only lasting solution, which is economic growth and development. It's encouraging that even a U.N. health agency seems to have figured that out.

Another Green Revolution? (WP)

ONE GENERATION ago, what became known as "the green revolution" doubled food production in parts of Asia and Latin America, reducing malnutrition and lifting millions out of poverty. Now the Rockefeller Foundation, whose scientists helped to lay the groundwork for that breakthrough, is teaming with the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to repeat the success in Africa. Last week the two charities announced an initial pledge of $150 million over five years to start down that road. The money will boost African seed-breeding programs that develop higher-yielding strains of local crops. It will fund the training of African scientists so that the seed-breeding programs can be enlarged. And it will bolster the distribution networks that bring seeds and fertilizer to farmers.

Legions of development experts have locked horns with Africa's rural poverty and then retreated hurt. The continent's physical capital is rudimentary: Irrigation systems and rural roads to get food to market are scarce. Its human capital is no better: African farmers are held back by sickness and illiteracy. Its social capital constitutes another handicap: The legal framework needed to permit the licensing of seed technologies to private distributors is often missing, and perverse regulations often make it difficult to farm for profit. Add in water scarcity and soil erosion, and you can see why previous calls for a green revolution in Africa have come to little.

Nonetheless, the two charities are right to be trying. The spectacular failure of rural development programs in Africa in the 1970s so discouraged donors that they turned their backs on agriculture, preferring to focus on macroeconomic problems or on education and health. But farming is the dominant form of work in Africa, and the continent won't break out of its poverty unless crop yields somehow rise. The Rockefeller Foundation already has a presence in East Africa, and its grants have resulted in some progress: 20 new seed varieties and a fix for the broken licensing program that had prevented the dissemination of seeds in Kenya. The partnership with the Gates Foundation will add money and ambition to these efforts.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Compromise Called Possible On Interrogations (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — President Bush's national security adviser signaled on Sunday that he was seeking a compromise with the Republican senators who are rebelling against the administration's proposal to explicitly permit certain severe interrogation practices against terrorism suspects.

The adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, is negotiating with Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and other Senate leaders over the administration's proposal, which would give the C.I.A. permission to use "alternative" techniques when interrogating terrorism suspects.

Appearing on the ABC News program "This Week," just two days after Mr. Bush declared he would end all interrogation of terrorism suspects unless Congress defined the techniques the way the administration believes necessary, Mr. Hadley struck a more moderate tone.

Asked if he believed compromise was possible, Mr. Hadley said, "I do." He said it was essential that "we continue to have this terribly important program for protecting the country, as the president requires, that gives the men and women who carry out this program clear guidance and clear Congressional support, and also achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3," referring to the Geneva Conventions.

"We need to find a way through that obstacle course," he added. "And I think we can."

Mr. McCain has said that redefining the practices allowed under Common Article 3, which outlaws "outrages upon personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment," would ultimately harm captured American soldiers and further undercut the United States image abroad. Mr. Hadley repeated on Sunday the administration's position that the White House wanted to clarify how the provision applied to Qaeda prisoners and others termed "unlawful combatants."

Other administration officials said it became clear over the weekend that the administration was going to have to give ground. "I don't think anyone anticipated the avalanche of opinion that would be assembled on the other side of what seemed like a pretty abstruse legal issue," one official said, speaking on condition of anonymity as he was not authorized to discuss the issue with a reporter.

In New Hampshire, where he was appearing at a Nascar race and a reception for supporters, Mr. McCain said he had seen Mr. Hadley briefly on Sunday morning before they appeared, separately, on the ABC program, but he said they had not discussed a compromise. "He said all of us realize that it is in the country's interest that we try to reach an agreement," Mr. McCain said. "And I said we've had many conversations, and I look forward to continuing our conversations.

Asked what he thought Mr. Hadley was signaling with his comments on the show, Mr. McCain said: "I don't know. It can't be anything but good."

Then, adding to the administration's pain on the issue, he said: "By the way, I forgot to mention this: George Schultz said I could say that he strongly favors our position." Mr. Schultz was President Ronald Reagan's secretary of state, and his endorsement would add another powerful Republican voice in opposition to Mr. Bush, along with that of former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

At his Rose Garden news conference on Friday, Mr. Bush said Congress must provide "clarity" to C.I.A. interrogators seeking to extract information about future attacks from "enemy combatants."

But Mr. Bush and Mr. Hadley have declined to say what kind of "alternative interrogation practices" they want to make explicitly legal, so interrogators do not have to fear prosecution under the War Crimes Act for violating the Geneva Conventions. Common Article 3 does not define exactly what constitutes violations of personal dignity or degrading treatment.

In June, the Supreme Court ruled that the article applied to all interrogations of terror suspects. That has led to concerns within the Central Intelligence Agency and among military officers that techniques used since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks could be viewed as illegal. Mr. Bush's amendment would legalize all but "serious violations" and give retroactive immunity to interrogators charged with going over the line.

In a second television appearance, on "Late Edition" on CNN, Mr. Hadley gave no ground on another point of dispute: whether to share with terrorism suspects classified information that is used against them.

Mr. McCain and Senators Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John W. Warner of Virginia, both Republicans, have proposed letting a judge make determinations about the evidence and, if need be, dismiss the charges if there is no way for the defendant to respond.

Mr. Hadley said, "The challenge is to be able to continue to prosecute and bring to justice terrorists where a lot of the evidence is classified evidence." He said the administration had addressed the issue by making sure the evidence was provided to the suspect's lawyer and, where possible, by giving the accused a declassified summary of information.

Compromise On CIA Interrogations Possible (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration signaled Sunday that it is willing to compromise with Republican lawmakers to save a CIA interrogation program President Bush says is vital to defeating terrorists.

National security adviser Stephen Hadley, making the rounds of Sunday talk shows, said the administration believes it can clarify interrogation rules without amending the Geneva Conventions. The comments appeared aimed at closing a rift between Bush and Republicans in the Senate that Bush said threatened to halt CIA interrogation of terrorism suspects.

Key Republican lawmakers, including Sen. John Warner of Virginia and Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a former prisoner of war, argue that changing the conventions would invite other countries to do the same and expose future American POWs to mistreatment.

Asked on ABC's This Week with George Stephanopoulos whether he thought a deal could be worked out, Hadley replied, "I do."

Hadley said legislation should enable the CIA to resume interrogations that use unspecified techniques but under clear rules that comply with the conventions. Lawmakers and the White House could craft a compromise that "achieves Sen. McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change Common Article 3," the provision of the conventions that the Supreme Court ruled in June applies to terrorism detainees, he said.

Specifically, Hadley said, interrogators need clarification about the provision in Common Article 3 that bans "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

Appearing on CNN's Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer, Hadley said: "Nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean?"

McCain, who spent 5½ years in North Vietnamese prison camps, said tough CIA interrogations can continue within the bounds of the conventions. The ultimate issue is the United States' position as a moral leader, he said. "We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do," McCain said on This Week.

On Labor Day, the CIA transferred 14 high-level detainees, including alleged 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, to U.S. military custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, effectively halting the CIA interrogation program.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said on Fox News Sunday that CIA interrogations could resume if another high-level terror suspect was captured, but under more restrictive rules. "That person may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques, that the president was referring to the other day may be problematic," he said.

Hadley wouldn't discuss the specifics of the CIA's interrogations. To do so, he said on ABC, would give terrorists the ability to train against the techniques "and neutralize their effect." He repeatedly denied that the techniques constitute torture.

Other Republicans expressed optimism that a deal could be reached with the White House. "I'm willing to compromise," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., who has opposed Bush's plan for interrogating and prosecuting terrorism suspects.

GOP Expresses Confidence On CIA Bill (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

The Bush administration and holdout GOP senators expressed confidence on Sunday they could reach a compromise on rules for CIA interrogations of suspected terrorists.

Neither the president's national security aides nor some of the lawmakers who are resisting White House pressure would say how they can reconcile their deep differences after a week of public sparring.

As a result, it is unclear if Congress quickly can pass legislation authorizing aggressive methods against terrorist detainees, as President Bush wants. Congress is likely to adjourn in two weeks for the fall elections.

Bush says CIA personnel should be able to resume tough interrogation techniques to extract information from detainees. Several senators from his own party are standing in the way, seeking changes. They say the United States must adhere strictly to international standards in the Geneva Conventions and that setting harsher ones could put U.S. troops at risk if they are captured.

"We have to hold the moral high ground," said Sen. John McCain of Arizona, one of the Republicans not satisfied with the White House proposal. "We don't think al-Qaida will ever observe those conventions, but we're going to be in other wars."

McCain elaborated later Sunday at a reception in Concord, N.H., warning against breaking with provisions of the Geneva Conventions that protect wartime prisoners. "That's what we do not want, because Americans would be setting the precedent for changing a treaty that has been untouched by any nation for 57 years," he said.

A Supreme Court ruling in June essentially said the Geneva Conventions should apply to suspected terrorists in CIA custody. The decision froze the interrogations and eventually led the administration to turn over the last 14 prisoners in CIA custody to the military officials running a prison for detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Bush's national intelligence director, John Negroponte, said the interrogation program has had "precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now" because of questions about its legality. But, he said, it is important that the program continue.

"It's provided invaluable information that has saved lives of Americans, and significant plots against our homeland have been disrupted as a result. And, surely, there is a way of finding a way forward that would permit this program to continue and, at the same time, do it in a way that is both respectful of our law and Constitution and our international obligations," Negroponte said.

But, he added, "I think we're going to have to wait and see" if a compromise can be reached with McCain and others.

McCain said he is committed to a deal. "I still believe that we'll be able to work this out to the satisfaction of everybody concerned," the senator said.

The White House says the existing ban on "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" satisfies U.S. treaty obligations. The senators' bill is silent on the issue.

Bush's proposal allows evidence to be held from a defendant if it is classified and allows coerced testimony if deemed reliable. The Senate bill requires a judge to dismiss charges if evidence cannot be shared. It also excludes any testimony obtained by cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

"If it's seen that our country is trying to redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of the CIA, why can't every other country redefine the Geneva Convention to meet the needs of their secret police?" said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., another opponent of Bush's plan. "It would be a disaster."

Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, declined to say what specific techniques, such as waterboarding or prolonged sleep deprivation, would be illegal if Congress did not pass Bush's proposal.

But he said the CIA program would suffer and be shut down if interrogators do not have guidance. He said the White House is working on a compromise that "achieves Senator McCain's requirement that we don't amend or change" the Geneva Conventions.

"We need to find a way through that obstacle course, and I think we can," Hadley said.

Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he was not certain a compromise was possible.

"I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva," Levin said.

Also Sunday, 34 relatives of Sept. 11 victims released the text of a letter they had sent to senators asking them to fight Bush's proposal. The family members said they do not believe "that it is in the interest of the United States to create a system of military courts that violate basic notions of due process and lack truly independent judicial oversight.

"Not only does this violate our most cherished values and send the wrong message to the world, it also runs the risk that the system will again be struck down, resulting in even more delay" in prosecuting terrorists, the relatives wrote.

Hadley appeared on ABC's "This Week," CBS' "Face the Nation" and CNN's "Late Edition." Negroponte was on "Fox News Sunday," McCain on ABC and Graham and Levin on CBS.

Republicans See Compromise On Terror Detainees (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Administration officials and Senate Republicans said a compromise can be reached over the treatment of detained terror suspects.

Divisions remain on a proposed modification of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which regulates the interrogation standards of terror suspects. The administration says it wants only to interpret the laws so that CIA officers can conduct tough interrogations without fear of prosecution in international courts.

Critics, including several Republican senators and U.S. military officials, say that changing the accepted standards of the Geneva Conventions would hurt U.S. prestige and endanger American troops captured abroad.

"We have to hold the moral high ground. We're the nation that people look up to. We can't lower our standards because others do," Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, said yesterday during an appearance on ABC's "This Week."

President Bush told reporters that Mr. McCain's position would weaken the administration's ability to collect vital information from terrorist suspects.

Nonetheless, Mr. McCain and other officials said a compromise can be reached.

"Absolutely, the talks are continuing," Mr. McCain said. "I've supported this president in the war on terror. I've supported him on the war in Iraq. I think he's a friend. I hope he considers me a friend. I believe we can sit down, we can work this out, preserve our Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions."

However, it is not clear how far each side is willing to compromise.

"I think the way ahead here is to all come together behind the proposition that the president has made, that we need this CIA program," National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said on CBS' "Face the Nation."

During his interview with ABC, Mr. McCain emphasized that he is not opposed to the CIA program.

"I am not saying we should shut down the program," he said.

Sen. Lindsey Graham, South Carolina Republican, agrees with Mr. McCain on the issue and said the administration and Congress are closer than some observers think.

"I think we can get there from here," Mr. Graham said.

"Fox News Sunday" moderator Chris Wallace noted that many of those opposed to the administration's plan, including Mr. Graham, Mr. McCain and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, all have military combat experience. In contrast, many of the plan's supporters, including Mr. Bush, do not.

"If anybody knows about Geneva up close and personal, it's Senator McCain," who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, said on "Face the Nation."

The ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee said he isn't convinced that a compromise can be reached.

"I don't see a way unless the president gives up on his idea that we're going to unilaterally modify Geneva."

Why GOP Trio Is Bucking The White House (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

For the Bush White House, this week's showdown with the Senate over US treatment of detainees sets up a rematch with a triumvirate of GOP senators who have been the president's strongest supporters in the war in Iraq - and his most effective critics.

Sens. John McCain of Arizona, John Warner of Virginia, and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina led the first push-back in the Senate over the war when they opposed the White House over its torture policy last year.

Now the trio is on a new collision course with the White House over how to bring suspected terrorists to trial - a must-pass bill, since the US Supreme Court overturned the president's plan for military tribunals in June.

Senator McCain, a former prisoner of war in North Vietnam, knows torture firsthand and brings moral authority to the issue. Torture is wrong, he says. Anything that weakens international protections for detainees, "threatens US troops in this and future wars," he said on Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0063921

Senator Graham, a military lawyer with the Air Force Reserve for 22 years, said Sunday on CBS's "Face the Nation" that President Bush's detainee bill, including its "clarification" of the 1949 Geneva Conventions, would "redefine America in a way that we can't win this war."

Senator Warner, a former secretary of the Navy and now chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, says he aims to pass legislation that will withstand further review by US courts.

"It would be a very serious blow to the credibility of the United States ... if legislation that was prepared by the Congress and signed [by] the president failed to meet a second Supreme Court review," he said during the committee's markup Thursday.

Senators Warner, McCain, and Graham, along with Sen. Susan Collins (R) of Maine, voted with 11 Democrats on the panel, prompting renewed bids for a compromise with the White House over the weekend.

For Mr. Bush, the issue is national security. In a fiery press conference on Friday, he charged that the rival Senate bill, sponsored by McCain, Graham, and Warner, would derail a CIA program vital to the war on terror. "It's a debate that's really going to define whether we can protect ourselves," he said.

So far, GOP senators opposed to Bush's plan are not blinking.

"Weakening the Geneva protections is not only unnecessary, but would set an example to other countries, with less respect for basic human rights that they could issue their own legislative 'reinterpretations,' " responded McCain, in a statement responding to Bush on Friday. "This puts our military personnel and others directly at risk in this and future wars."

With weeks to the midterm elections, GOP strategists had hoped to go into such a debate united. Instead, at least two other senators, including Chuck Hagel of Nebraska (R) and John Sununu (R) of New Hampshire, say they will back the McCain-Warner-Graham approach.

Together, McCain, Warner, and Graham led the first rebellion in the Senate over the conduct of the war in Iraq when they challenged the White House over its torture policy last year. The McCain amendment banning the use of "cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment" of terror suspects was adopted by the Senate on Oct. 5, 2005, with the support of 9 of 10 senators, and was signed into law on Jan. 6.

In a bid to rally support for new legislation on Capitol Hill, the White House is using the text of the McCain amendment to "clarify" the terms of the Geneva Conventions, especially the requirement of Common Article 3 banning "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

"I'm asking Congress to pass a clear law with clear guidelines based on the Detainee Treatment Act that was strongly supported by Senator John McCain," said Bush Friday.

But, ironically, the trio that produced the McCain amendment now sees it as a tool to weaken international protections for detainees by imposing a unilateral redefinition of the law. For now, the GOP revolt in the Armed Services Committee is giving cover to Senate Democrats, who don't want to head into another midterm election tagged with being weak in the war on terror.

On Sunday, Sen. Mitch McConnell said it would be awkward for Democrats to "go home and explain a vote ... to shut down an intelligence program that we know has helped save lives...."

"Questioning our policy in Iraq is not treason and it's not appeasement. It's our obligation under the Constitution," said Sen. Richard Durbin, the deputy Democratic leader, in a press briefing last week.

Last week, only eight Democrats voted against a detainee bill that is closely modeled on the president's version, when the House Armed Services Committee marked up its version of the 2006 Military Commissions Act on Sept 13.

At Issue: How Suspects Are Treated (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 18, 2006

Questions and answers concerning the debate over how suspected terrorists should be interrogated and prosecuted:

Q: Why is Congress having this debate now?

A: The Supreme Court, by a 5-3 decision in June, rejected the Bush administration's plan for trying some of the more than 400 terrorism suspects imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The court ruled that the detainees are covered by the Geneva Conventions, international treaties that govern the treatment of prisoners of war. Last week, the Bush administration submitted a plan for the interrogation and trial of terrorism suspects. Some lawmakers, led by Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner, R-Va., say the plan doesn't go far enough to satisfy the court's objections.

Q: If the United States supports the Geneva Conventions, why is there any question about how they apply to the prisoners?

A: The United States is one of 194 signatories to the Geneva Conventions. Those rules clarify how uniformed prisoners of war and civilians should be treated. The administration says the alleged terrorists fall into a new category because they aren't part of any established army. That's why the administration initially maintained the Geneva Conventions didn't apply, but the Supreme Court held otherwise.

Q: Who is against the administration's plans?

A: The most outspoken opponents are four Republicans: Warner, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and former secretary of State Colin Powell.

Many Democrats, including Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, his party's top-ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, also oppose President Bush's plan.

Q: Why are the Republicans influential?

A: All are military veterans with special knowledge in this area: Warner is a former secretary of the Navy; Graham is a member of the Air Force Reserves and a military lawyer; Powell is the former chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and McCain spent 5½ years as a North Vietnamese prisoner of war. Last week, the three Republican senators joined Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, and 11 Democrats to vote for a rival plan in the Armed Services Committee for trying and interrogating terrorism suspects.

Q: What are the main differences between the plans?

A: There are three main areas of contention:

·The president says some classified evidence must be withheld from suspects to prevent intelligence from leaking. The Senate panel's bill would require that defendants be informed of all the evidence against them.

·Both plans would ban the use of evidence obtained through torture. The president's proposal would permit evidence obtained by other types of coercive methods if a judge allowed it. The panel's bill would ban evidence obtained by "cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment."

·The president says his agreement to abide by the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005, which bans inhumane treatment, fulfills U.S. obligations under the Geneva Conventions. McCain and other senators say this waters down the conventions, which ban "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

Q: Doesn't the senators' plan protect the legal rights of people who may be plotting against the country?

A: The senators argue that it's important for the nation to set a strong example to ensure U.S. citizens are treated fairly if they become prisoners of war. "If a CIA paramilitary operative were captured in Iran and put on trial by the Iranian government as an unlawful enemy combatant and the Iranian prosecutor provided evidence to the judge and jury marked secret to convict the American agent that he would never see or rebut, would you object to this procedure?" Graham asked Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in a letter Friday.

Q: Why doesn't Bush agree?

A: Bush and administration spokesmen say the committee plan would end CIA interrogations that have produced information that protects American lives. The president and his advisers say the Geneva Conventions language banning "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment" is too vague. "The director of CIA must be confident that what he has asked an agency officer to do is lawful," CIA Director Michael Hayden says.

Q: What types of interrogation are at issue here?

A: That information is classified. The administration will not discuss what methods are used in interrogations of terrorism suspects.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales hinted at some of the issues at a briefing Friday. He suggested that certain conditions of confinement, including the size of detainees' cells and the amount of light provided to prisoners, are open to interpretation.

"There is no baseline standard," Gonzales said. "We want clarity."

Q: What would happen if a top terrorism suspect, such as al-Qaeda lieutenant Ayman al-Zawahri, were captured today?

A: Gonzales said Friday that the CIA detention program, which allowed for aggressive interrogations of high-level al-Qaeda detainees at secret locations overseas, has been halted until legislation is passed that would allow the administration to resume the program. This year, prominent al-Qaeda suspects were transferred from the custody of the CIA at undisclosed detention facilities to the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay.

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte said on Fox News Sunday that high-level terrorism suspects captured today could still be questioned by the CIA, but under greater restrictions. "That person may be questioned," Negroponte said, "but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques that the president was referring to the other day, may be problematic."

Q: What happens now?

A: The House of Representatives has scheduled a vote on the president's plan for this week and is likely to approve it.

The Senate is more likely to approve the competing Armed Services Committee bill. If that happens, House and Senate negotiators would have to work out the differences.

Geneva Contention (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

The media are concentrating on the politics of the intra-Republican fight over military tribunals and detainee treatment, which last week saw the Senate Armed Services Committee move a bill substantially different from what the White House wants. But the stakes here are far more serious: To wit, if Senators John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Susan Collins get their way, aggressive interrogation as an antiterror intelligence tool will effectively end.

Thanks to last year's McCain Amendment, the Defense Department is already required to give detainees in its custody better treatment than American police must give common criminals. The new Army Field Manual doesn't even allow for good cop/bad cop routines against Iraqi and Afghan insurgents if threats of any kind are conveyed or implied. This restraint is not required by the Geneva Conventions, which clearly distinguish between lawful and unlawful combatants -- the latter being deemed to have fewer rights because they have violated the rules of war by fighting out of uniform or targeting civilians.

Now the four GOP Senators and most Democrats are working to put CIA interrogators under similarly restrictive rules. If they get their way, they will make it impossible for any government agency to squeeze the next al Qaeda terrorist who may have information about a ticking bomb in an American city. * * *

At issue now is something called Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which the Supreme Court ruled this summer in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld applies to our conflict with al Qaeda. This was a dreadful decision, since Article 3 is intended to be applied to an "armed conflict not of an international character" -- i.e., a civil war. But it is now the law, and the question going forward is how to interpret Article 3's ambiguous prohibition against "outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment."

That clause can mean just about anything depending on the eye of the beholder. To pick one example, U.S. human rights groups have alleged that using women to question Islamist prisoners is "humiliating and degrading." But for the U.S. to bar women interrogators might well violate our own civil rights laws. What's more, the definition of an "outrage" is context-dependent. What's outrageous when dealing with the likes of 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, or a terrorist who might know about imminent plots, is clearly different than what's outrageous when dealing with a lawful combatant or prisoner of war.

The Bush Administration has proposed to deal with this ambiguity by laying down a clear set of rules specifying conduct it considers acceptable and unacceptable under Article 3. We think it is perfectly legitimate to interpret Article 3, as the Administration does, in a way that permits aggressive interrogation of some detainees. Some people may disagree. But it is wrong to assert that merely attempting to interpret "outrageous," "humiliating" and "degrading" is to somehow rewrite the Geneva Conventions, as the critics charge.

Paradoxically, the GOP Senators claim the Administration has all the legal authority it needs to maintain the CIA interrogation program, which deals with the worst al Qaeda captives such as KSM. Even though the War Crimes Act as amended in 1997 makes it a crime to violate Common Article 3, the Senators say the Administration can proceed based on an opinion it can seek from the Department of Justice defining what Common Article 3 means.

But this is naive, if not disingenuous. Somebody is going to have to interpret what Article 3 requires in real world situations, and we'd rather see it done by open and honest Congressional debate than by secret Justice Department memos -- or, worse, leaving that job to interrogators in the field on a case-by-case basis. In Hamdan, the Supreme Court showed little deference to the executive branch but it did invite Congress to play a role. Yet now these Members of Congress want to abdicate that role and tell the Administration it is on its own in interpreting Common Article 3.

As soon as some Justice lawyer writes an opinion on Geneva allowing "stress" interrogations (such as exposure to hot or cold, or sleep deprivation), it will be denounced by Europeans and liberal activists who have a different interpretation. A future President could also rewrite that Justice opinion, exposing CIA agents to ex post facto liability. And would the same Senators now saying that the CIA interrogation program is legal stand up and defend it under media and political pressure? Don't count on it.

Amid these vagaries, CIA Director Michael Hayden is absolutely right to say that, without clear rules from Congress, he cannot put his agents at political and legal risk. He will have to shut down an interrogation program that the President says has yielded crucial intelligence that has saved American lives. CIA agents "don't want to be tried as war criminals," Mr. Bush said in his press conference Friday. "They expect our government to give them clarity about what is right and what is wrong." We'd add that as patriots they also want to be proud of their duty and know that the Congress supports it.

You'd think the critics would at least engage on these issues, but instead they are trying to play a political trump that portrays the Administration as moral rogues. Former Secretary of State Colin Powell put it most demagogically when he claimed the Bush Administration was trying to redefine Geneva and would lead others to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism" and "put our own troops at risk."

In fact, our captured troops wearing the uniform would be lawful combatants entitled as POWs to the full protection of the Geneva Conventions, not just Common Article 3. In any case, the al Qaeda terrorists we are fighting care nothing for Geneva as they mutilate and behead the Americans they capture. The Administration is making a good faith attempt to translate vague terms of international law into domestic statutory obligations. Mr. Powell's suggestion that the effort in any way compares with the habits of our enemies must be deeply offensive to his former colleagues.

Mr. McCain also didn't do his argument any favors when he accused General Hayden of "trying to protect his reputation at the risk of America's reputation." Doesn't the Senator recognize the possibility that the CIA Director is actually concerned about protecting America? We're willing to accept Mr. McCain's own sincerity on the issue. We merely disagree with him and think that leaving Article 3 undefined will mean an end to the kind of interrogation that, against certain terrorists, could save American lives.

As a political matter, however, Mr. McCain seems to want it both ways: On the one hand, he claims the Administration has all the legal rights it needs to maintain the CIA interrogation program. So he can deny responsibility if the program is shut down. On the other hand, he won't speak up and support such interrogations, and he continues to imply that the Administration favors "torture" and illegal behavior even as he knows the CIA is demanding no such thing.

The good news is the Senate is not the last word on this debate. The House is likely to endorse the Administration's preferred language this week, and a bill that emerges from conference may be a compromise the CIA can live with. The government's ability to protect Americans using the vital tool of interrogation depends on it.

The Politics Of Torture (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh And Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

Waterboarding, which dates back to the Spanish Inquisition, is an interrogation method that involves strapping a prisoner face up onto a table and pouring water into his nose. The idea is to create the sensation of drowning so that the panicked prisoner will talk. According to The New York Times, 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammed was waterboarded by the CIA. He eventually confessed what President Bush described last Friday as "information about terrorist plans we couldn't get anywhere else." Neither Bush nor any other administration official has acknowledged, on the record, the use of waterboarding or any other specific CIA method. But at a White House news conference, Bush passionately defended the once secret CIA interrogation program involving such "alternative" techniques as "vital."

The question is whether waterboarding, however effective, is torture—and whether Americans ought to be doing such things at all. Some leading Republican senators, John McCain, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, believe it should be clearly banned under new legislation. The Bush administration has proposed its own bill seeking to redefine the Geneva Conventions—which set out the rules of war—in order to preserve the CIA's right to use some harsher methods. But even Bush's former secretary of State, Colin Powell, publicly questioned last week whether the administration's stance might lead the world to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." And recently Bush administration officials, in private negotiations with the Senate, have agreed to drop waterboarding from a list of approved CIA interrogation techniques, according to a Senate source involved in the dispute. (He, like the other administration officials and congressional sources quoted in this story, asked not to be identified owing to the sensitivity of the negotiations over classified information.)

The Bush administration wants to maintain seven other approved CIA interrogation methods, however, for use against suspected high-level terrorists, according to one congressional source and a lawyer involved in the negotiations. A senior administration official said he could not discuss what CIA methods are still being considered. But the official added that "one should not assume all techniques used previously will be used in the future." He also noted that the new U.S. Army field manual bans waterboarding. Two other sources, one a U.S. legislator and the other a counterterrorism official, told NEWSWEEK that the total number of CIA detainees subjected to the "most rigorous" interrogation techniques was less than five. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed is the only one among them whose identity has been acknowledged by former government officials.

The GOP's intraparty dispute centers on a single provision of the Geneva Conventions. The president has criticized a Supreme Court decision last June that ruled all suspected terrorists, even those detained secretly by the CIA, are protected under Geneva's Common Article 3, which forbids "outrages upon personal dignity" and "cruel treatment."

Bush says that, under such vague rules, CIA professionals will not know if the interrogation techniques they are using are legal, and they could be vulnerable to war crimes prosecution. He's proposing a new law that will more narrowly define Common Article 3 to mean only "serious" violations. McCain and the other GOP senators have indicated they would be willing to amend domestic U.S. law, especially the War Crimes Act, to permit at least some "enhanced" CIA techniques. They are also willing to pass legislation that would deny many rights to detainees at Guantánamo Bay and allow them to be held indefinitely. But the senators, who appear to have the support of a majority of their colleagues, want to keep the Geneva restriction broadly defined in order to protect U.S. troops abroad. "What is billed [by Bush] as 'clarifying' our treaty obligations will be seen as 'withdrawing' from the treaty obligations," Graham said. "It will set precedent, which could come back to haunt us."

Neither administration nor congressional sources would describe the other interrogation methods in dispute. As NEWSWEEK has previously reported, various CIA techniques such as open-handed slapping were first discussed in Alberto Gonzales's office in 2002 before the then White House Counsel became attorney general. Scott Horton, a New York City Bar Association lawyer who has advised the Senate on the legislation, says Capitol Hill aides have told him that the CIA has sought to use the following techniques: (1) induced hypothermia; (2) long periods of forced standing; (3) sleep deprivation; (4) the "attention grab" (the forceful seizing of a suspect's shirt); (5) the "attention slap"; (6) the "belly slap"; and (7) sound and light manipulation. Tom Malinowski, the Washington director for the group Human Rights Watch, says that Hill sources working on the legislation have described the same list to him.

Some human-rights activists view only the first two methods, hypothermia and forced standing, as outright torture. But Malinowski said there is a reason why U.S. military interrogation manuals consistently ban physical abuse of any kind. "The Army's experience has taught them that once you allow physical contact once, even if it's mild, it's very difficult to prevent much more violent physical contact," he said.

CIA Director Gen. Michael Hayden told agency personnel last week in an e-mail that he was not asking for a "CIA carve-out"—in other words, an exception for CIA interrogators. But critics say the administration is trying to achieve just that.

A Guide To The Terrorism Bills (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, September 18, 2006

Much of Bush's war on terrorism has been waged in the shadows. But with secret surveillance and detention programs now exposed, the Administration has been forced to reckon with the lights, and the law. The President has offered two bills to put his programs on a legal footing. So far, the strongest opposition has come from his own party.

SPYING

BUSH'S BILL would allow--but not require--the President to seek approval for the National Security Agency's (NSA's) no-warrant electronic-surveillance program from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court. Bush has said he would seek the court's approval for the program, which he says targets only suspected terrorists calling or e-mailing to or from the U.S. Current law requires the government to get the FISA court's permission for each device--rather than each suspect--to be wiretapped; Bush claims his wartime powers override that law. His bill would send all legal challenges pending against the no-warrant program to the FISA court and allow for appeals up to the Supreme Court. It would add penalties for leaking information about official surveillance programs. The existence of the NSA program was revealed by the New York Times.

CONGRESSWOMAN HEATHER WILSON'S BILL would allow the targeting of individuals, not devices, but would require eavesdroppers to get a warrant within weeks of doing so. The bill would require that Congress be given written notification and justification for no-warrant wiretaps. Most Senate Republicans support Bush's plan, but leading House Republicans back Wilson, a New Mexico Republican, who chairs the subcommittee that oversees eavesdropping.

DEMOCRATIC BILLS in both chambers would strengthen the 1978 law and would try to make Bush comply with it.

QUESTIONING

BUSH'S BILL seeks to set the rules for future treatment of detainees in the war on terrorism. Arguing that some of the language of the Geneva Conventions regulating the treatment of prisoners of war is too vague--like the prohibition in Common Article 3 against "outrages upon personal dignity"--Bush would remove Geneva references from the U.S.'s 1996 War Crimes Act, which provides penalties up to death for abuse of detainees. Instead, he would identify nine violations: torture, cruel or inhuman treatment, performing biological experiments, murder, mutilation or maiming, intentionally causing great suffering or serious injury, rape, sexual assault or abuse and taking hostages. The bill states that these prohibitions "shall fully satisfy United States obligations" under Geneva. It would apply retroactively to all detentions after 9/11 to provide some legal protection to U.S. jailers and interrogators who dealt with detainees between then and the putative passage of the bill.

JOHN MCCAIN'S BILL would protect interrogators from civil suits, would punish them only for grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and would increase rights of appeal to the U.S. courts. It would preserve references to the Geneva Conventions in the War Crimes Act. The Arizona Senator and his co-sponsors, John Warner and Lindsey Graham, argue that if the U.S. interprets Geneva to its liking, other countries will too, endangering American troops if they are captured.

PROSECUTING

BUSH'S BILL on questioning detainees would create military courts to try foreign detainees in the war on terrorism. The bill would expand the definition of who can be tried to include those charged with conspiracy and other lesser offenses. It would also establish the laws under which they would be tried--this in response to the Supreme Court's June ruling that the original tribunals

Bush established after 9/11 did not comply with Geneva's requirement of a "regularly constituted court affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The new courts would afford defendants the right to a civilian lawyer, an insanity defense and a copy of the proceedings, with classified information removed. But coerced statements could be accepted as evidence, and detainees could be denied access to classified intelligence presented to jurors to build the case against them. The bill would set strict limits on detainees' access to U.S. civilian courts.

MCCAIN'S BILL would prohibit the introduction of coerced statements and would allow defendants to see the evidence used against them. Its sponsors argue that statements obtained under duress are not reliable and that no one can properly defend himself without fully knowing what he is accused of. Bush has the Senate leadership and House Republicans on his side. Warner, McCain and Graham have moderate Republican supporters and most, if not all, Senate Democrats.

Leading A Rebellion (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty, Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, September 25, 2006

If you want to understand how a baby-faced freshman Republican Senator from conservative South Carolina has come to be standing against President George W. Bush on the issue of how to interrogate and try terrorism suspects, it helps to know how Lindsey Graham spent part of his summer. A month ago, when most Senators were back home campaigning and fund raising, he was in Kabul, Afghanistan, answering to "Colonel." Wearing desert fatigues, with an M9 pistol strapped to his hip, Graham was conducting a two-day tutorial on the principles of U.S. military law at the Afghan Defense Ministry. He recalls coaching Afghan military lawyers, who are modeling their system after that of the U.S.: "It's important that when the troops act badly, they are punished to keep good order and discipline, but it's equally important that people believe that the punishment and the system itself are fair." The only Senator now serving in the National Guard or reserve, and the first in decades to do military duty in a combat zone, Graham adds, "It has to be based on what the person did and not who the person is."

That's pretty much the same argument that Graham is making back in Washington, where he is helping turn what looked like a smart political strategy into an internecine battle among Republicans on Capitol Hill. White House and congressional leaders had hoped that focusing on terrorism in the final months before a tight midterm election would give their party an advantage over the Democrats. But they didn't count on a rebellion in their own ranks, made worse by the fact that it is led by Graham and two more senior members of the Armed Services Committee who also have impressive military credentials: chairman John Warner, a former Secretary of the Navy who was a Marine ground officer in the Korean War, four years before Graham was born; and John McCain, a former Navy pilot whose father and grandfather were admirals and who still suffers from what he endured during 5 1/2 years in a North Vietnamese POW camp.

Graham got his battle testing in a military courtroom, first at Shaw Air Force Base in South Carolina and then as chief prosecutor for the Air Force in Europe during the 1980s. He insists that Bush's proposal to tamper with the interpretation of the Geneva Conventions and put detainees on trial without letting them see all the evidence against them would have far-reaching consequences because it would invite future enemies to do the same, or worse, to Americans they capture. That argument has drawn strong support from such powerful voices as Colin Powell, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and ex--Secretary of State, who in a rare public criticism of Bush policy sent McCain a letter warning that "the world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism." Caught in the middle have been Graham's fellow military lawyers, many of whom share misgivings about the detainee program. At a closed session of the Armed Services Committee last week, Senator John Cornyn of Texas brandished a letter signed by top lawyers of each service saying they "do not object" to a key part of Bush's plan. But he may have overstated their level of support. "That's not the whole story," Graham said to Cornyn, according to a witness. Last week, amid bitter Republican infighting and despite a White House lobbying effort that brought both Bush and Vice President Cheney to Capitol Hill, the committee defiantly passed the trio's proposal for trying and interrogating terrorism suspects, rather than Bush's. The showdown on the Senate floor, where majority leader Bill Frist is expected to introduce the President's proposal, is not likely to be pretty.

It's not the first time Graham has put the Bush Administration on the spot. When the Abu Ghraib prison scandal broke most inconveniently in a presidential election year, he demanded accountability up the chain of command. "What are we fighting for?" the Senator asked at a hearing. "To be like Saddam Hussein?" On Bush's biggest domestic initiative, Graham supported the President's idea to add individual savings accounts to Social Security but also suggested a heretical payroll-tax increase to finance them. He infuriated the right last year by joining the bipartisan, largely moderate "Gang of 14" that blocked a change in Senate rules that would have ended Democratic filibusters of Bush's judicial nominees. Graham more recently helped ice the appeals-court nomination of Defense Department counsel William Haynes, an architect of the Administration's detainee policy.

Graham, 51, so confounds political labeling that his fellow apostate McCain, 70, has dubbed him "my illegitimate son." Like McCain, the presumed front runner for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, Graham has a voting record that defies the headlines he creates. From the time he introduced his first piece of legislation in the South Carolina General Assembly, a bill barring gays and lesbians from serving in the state's National Guard, Graham has hewed to the right on social issues. He got a 96% rating from the American Conservative Union last year, and a zero from NARAL Pro-Choice America. As a House member, Graham caught the nation's attention playing corn-pone puritan as a House manager in Bill Clinton's impeachment trial. "Where I come from," Graham memorably drawled during the trial in the Senate chamber, as he described a phone call the President made to Monica Lewinsky, "you call somebody at 2:30 in the morning, you're up to no good." But in the Senate, Graham has become one of Hillary Clinton's good friends and has sponsored legislation with her to expand health benefits for reservists and members of the Guard--one of many times he has worked across the Senate aisle. Alex Sanders, the Democrat he defeated in 2002 to get the job, told TIME, "If I'd have known how Lindsey would turn out, I would have voted for him." And Dick Harpootlian, who in 2002 chaired the South Carolina Democratic Party, has gone so far as to send Graham a $1,000 campaign contribution.

As you might imagine, none of that sits particularly well with the G.O.P. establishment back home. "To say that Lindsey Graham has been a disappointment to the conservatives who were the heart and soul of his campaign would be an understatement," Republican political consultant Jeffrey Sewell wrote last week in the State, one of South Carolina's largest newspapers. "Unfortunately, our senior Senator has moved from disappointing to downright dangerous." Some Republicans are encouraging wealthy shopping-center developer Thomas Ravenel to take Graham on in the 2008 G.O.P. primary and have circulated an online petition to draft him. Ravenel--who has called Graham "the third Senator from New York"--says he has "no intention" of running against him, but that could change.

Making his own way is nothing new for Graham. He grew up in the rooms behind the Sanitary Cafe, a pool hall, bar and liquor store that his parents owned in Central, S.C. Graham's father, known as Dude, tended bar for the millworker clientele; the future Senator racked balls and answered phones. You've learned everything you really need to know about politics, Graham says, when you've had the experience of telling a wife who is on the line and looking for her husband, "He says he's not here." Graham set his sights on the military early, joining the ROTC in college, and he would have been a pilot were it not for a bad ear and dismal math scores. He had to adjust his plans again when his parents died within two years of each other while he was still in college, leaving him with a 13-year-old sister to provide for. After graduating from law school, he formally adopted her, mostly so that she would be eligible for his military benefits.

Once out of the Air Force, he returned to South Carolina and entered politics, where it seemed as if everything went his way. After two years in the legislature, he caught the Republican wave of 1994 and rode it to the House of Representatives. He supported McCain in the state's brutal 2000 G.O.P. primary and might have been punished by the new President's team, except for the fact that a Senate seat opened up with the retirement of 100-year-old Strom Thurmond two years later, and Graham had the best shot at winning it. Bush ended up coming to the state to campaign for him, in what became the most expensive Senate race in state history.

Those who don't like Graham say he is an opportunist and a grandstander. There are stories of him driving two hours for the chance to be on television for three minutes. But this month's "Best and Worst of Congress" rankings in Washingtonian magazine--the kind of popularity contest you might remember from your high school yearbook--have him pegged by a poll of 1,700 Capitol Hill insiders as one of the top choices in four categories: "Rising Star," "Straightest Shooter," "Bridge-Building Centrist" and "Funniest."

One place where Graham is not giving anyone much to laugh about these days is the White House. In an impassioned Rose Garden news conference, Bush warned that the proposal by the rebellious Republican Senators, if carried out, would give him no choice but to cancel the CIA's interrogation program of high-value terrorism suspects because it would deprive "our professionals" of the clear permission they need to continue using aggressive interrogation techniques. And the President suggested that the consequences of losing those techniques could be dire: "Were it not for this program, our intelligence community believes that al-Qaeda and its allies would have succeeded in launching another attack against the American homeland."

Graham insists that there are still ways to work out a compromise, although both sides appear to be digging in. "I share the President's goal of pursuing a CIA program that would protect us and operate within the rule of law," he told TIME. "And I will work with him to achieve that." That's a call to duty for both Senator and Colonel Graham.

Negroponte Says Ruling Halted 'Tough' CIA Methods (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's top intelligence official acknowledged Sunday that the CIA had used "tough" and "aggressive" interrogation techniques that were discontinued when the Supreme Court ruled that terrorism suspects are entitled to the protections of the Geneva Convention.

DOJ_NMG_0063928

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte said the CIA might still question terrorism suspects, but he added it was "up in the air" whether agency interrogators would be free to employ methods that had been used over the last five years and that Negroponte described as necessary and effective.

"There's been precious little activity of that kind for a number of months now, and certainly since the Supreme Court decision," Negroponte said on "Fox News Sunday," citing "legal uncertainties surrounding the entire program and which we think must be clarified."

Negroponte's appearance was part of a campaign by the Bush administration to defend a CIA program in which high-ranking Al Qaeda operatives had been held in secret prisons abroad and subjected to interrogation methods that critics contend are tantamount to torture.

Negroponte did not discuss specific interrogation techniques, but the CIA is known to have employed such methods as sleep deprivation; light and sound manipulation; and "water-boarding," in which a detainee is strapped to a board and made to fear he is drowning.

In appearances on the Sunday talk shows, Negroponte and national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley both reiterated the White House position that the CIA program would probably be shut down if Congress did not approve legislation clarifying or reinterpreting key provisions of the Geneva Convention.

But the administration faces a revolt from key Senate Republicans, including John McCain of Arizona, who have rejected the White House proposal and are siding with Democrats to advance legislation that would tighten rules regarding treatment of detainees.

Both sides signaled Sunday that they believed they could reach a compromise to let the CIA program continue, but they gave no indication that differences had been resolved.

McCain, who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, said on ABC's "This Week" that he believed the CIA program should be preserved, but that it should be in compliance with the existing language in the Geneva Convention, which sets rules for the conduct of wars and the treatment of prisoners. It has been ratified by more than 190 countries, including the United States.

"I'm not saying we should shut down the program. In fact, we should have a program," McCain said. "What I'm saying is that we should not do things which would be condemned by everyone in the world."

The White House has argued that the language is vague, leaving CIA officers vulnerable to prosecution or lawsuits. In particular, the debate has centered on the meaning of provisions in what is known as Common Article 3, which bans conduct including "outrages upon personal dignity" and "humiliating and degrading treatment." Hadley said those provisions must be clarified for the CIA program to continue.

"I'm saying that nobody knows what humiliating treatment is. What does it mean?" Hadley said on CNN's "Late Edition."

"And the concern is that [interrogators] are being asked to take on very tough assignments. They want to be clear as to what is required, and they want it to be interpreted by U.S. law."

The two sides also dispute rules for prosecuting terrorist suspects in special tribunals, including whether the accused should have access to the U.S. government's classified evidence against them.

Bush announced two weeks ago that 14 terrorism suspects in CIA custody, including the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, had been transferred to Defense Department custody at the naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Negroponte's remarks confirmed that the questioning of those suspects had all but ceased by the time the Supreme Court issued its June ruling in the case of Hamdan vs. Rumsfeld, which essentially rejected the Bush administration argument that Al Qaeda suspects were unlawful combatants not entitled to Geneva protections.

Asked whether the CIA would interrogate any future captive in the fight against terrorism, Negroponte said, "That person may be questioned, but using the kinds of aggressive techniques, the tough techniques … may be problematic because of the uncertainty that has been introduced by the current situation."

McCain, In New Hampshire, Gets An Earful From The Right (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

CONCORD, N.H., Sept. 17 — Senator John McCain, who is battling with the White House over the interrogation and trial of terrorism suspects, on Sunday flew to New Hampshire — and right into a blistering editorial from the conservative Manchester Union-Leader that assailed him for standing up to President Bush on the issue.

Mr. McCain, Republican of Arizona, responded with a spirited defense, invoking his experience as a prisoner of war as he vowed to block the White House effort.

"This issue is not them — this issue is about us," he said of terrorists, facing an audience sipping cocktails on a lush lawn next to a pool. "The United States has always been better than our enemies. I'll tell you right now: one of the things in prison, in North Vietnam, that kept us strong was that we knew we were not like our enemies. That we came from a better nation, with better values, with better standards."

After months of orchestrated peace, the battle with Mr. Bush over the administration's effort to reinterpret the Geneva Conventions has put Mr. McCain back into a familiar position: bucking the White House and at odds again with some conservatives, who had already been wary of his ideological views.

The dispute is shaping up as an early chapter in a shift of influence in the Republican Party away from Mr. Bush as he approaches the final two years of his administration, and toward its presidential nominee of 2008. And it is spotlighting divisions in the party as prospective presidential candidates jockey for support from the conservative wing.

One of them, Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, said in an interview that he disagreed with Mr. McCain, and offered a forceful endorsement of Mr. Bush.

"I am foursquare behind the president on this," Mr. Romney said. "I believe that we should do everything possible to support those people at the front line who are responsible for enforcing the war on terrorism."

Mr. McCain said Sunday that he was acting out of conscience, not political calculation, to reinforce an image of independence that has been questioned in recent months as he has supported Mr. Bush on issues like the war in Iraq. Still, he said his office had been deluged with critical phone calls, and that he had picked up enough buzz from conservative radio talk stations to conclude that he might have once again rattled his support among conservatives.

"I would imagine so," he said, riding in a helicopter rumbling over the New Hampshire hills as it took him to a Nascar race at the New Hampshire International Speedway. "The radio talk show hosts have already been very critical."

Mr. McCain appears to be in a strong position politically as he takes on this battle. He has methodically been signing up supporters in crucial states in preparation for a 2008 campaign, part of a strategy to create a stampede to his candidacy. Although Mr. Bush has sharply challenged Mr. McCain and the other senators supporting him in the debate on interrogation tactics, the president and his aides have taken care not to attack Mr. McCain, in clear deference to his position in the party.

"There is no acrimony with the White House," Mr. McCain said. "I certainly consider him a friend. And I hope he considers me as one. We just have a disagreement."

Dan Bartlett, the White House communications director, said, "We would agree and believe the close working relationship and constant communication has kept it strictly to a difference over substance, and nothing more."

Conservatives are another matter. Senator John E. Sununu, Republican of New Hampshire, said conservatives would judge Mr. McCain on many issues, and that they did not expect to agree with a political leader on every issue — a reality he said Mr. McCain appreciated.

Still, many conservatives have criticized Mr. McCain for his support for campaign finance legislation, his backing of what they believe are permissive immigration laws, and now this. "The question is being asked: in the midst of the most difficult and challenging war we have ever faced, can the nation afford a President McCain?" The Union-Leader — the largest newspaper in the state, which holds the nation's first presidential primary — asked in a front-page editorial on Saturday. It was one of two editorials it published this weekend attacking Mr. McCain's views.

Mr. Romney has been making an increasingly vigorous challenge for conservative votes and is viewed by many Republicans as the strongest challenger to Mr. McCain, at least for now. He saw the interrogation debate as an opportunity to draw contrasts with Mr. McCain among conservative voters.

Asked if this was his sharpest difference with Mr. McCain, Mr. Romney said: "No. There are a number of things. We have different views on McCain-Feingold, differing views on immigration policy, differing views on the interrogation of terrorists. There are also many other areas where we see eye to eye."

Told about Governor Romney's position on the treatment of terrorism suspects, Mr. McCain noted tartly, "He doesn't have a vote."

Mr. McCain said he was not overly concerned about the criticism. When an aide offered him a copy of the editorial as he rode in a car to the cocktail party here, he at first refused it, but a second later took it back and read it. And at the reception, he aggressively raised the issue, to decidedly light applause.

"We do not believe we should change the Geneva Conventions that we have adhered to for 57 years," he said. "I hold no brief for Al Qaeda. No."

"What is this all about?" he continued. "It's all about the United States of America and what is going to happen to Americans who are taken prisoner in future wars."

DOJ_NMG_0063930

Mr. McCain's efforts have complicated one political component of the White House's strategy: trying to bait Democrats into a battle that might allow Republicans to portray them as weak on terrorism. But Mr. McCain said he had not heard any objection from the White House, on political grounds, about what he was trying to do.

"They know better than that," he said.

King Of Pain (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

A lot has been written and said about President Bush's demand that Congress "clarify" the part of the Geneva Conventions that, in effect, outlaws the use of torture under any circumstances.

We know that the world would see this action as a U.S. repudiation of the rules that bind civilized nations. We also know that an extraordinary lineup of former military and intelligence leaders, including Colin Powell, have spoken out against the Bush plan, warning that it would further damage America's faltering moral standing, and end up endangering U.S. troops.

But I haven't seen much discussion of the underlying question: why is Mr. Bush so determined to engage in torture?

Let's be clear what we're talking about here. According to an ABC News report from last fall, procedures used by C.I.A. interrogators have included forcing prisoners to "stand, handcuffed and with their feet shackled to an eye bolt in the floor for more than 40 hours"; the "cold cell," in which prisoners are forced "to stand naked in a cell kept near 50 degrees," while being doused with cold water; and, of course, water boarding, in which "the prisoner is bound to an inclined board, feet raised and head slightly below the feet," then "cellophane is wrapped over the prisoner's face and water is poured over him," inducing "a terrifying fear of drowning."

And bear in mind that the "few bad apples" excuse doesn't apply; these were officially approved tactics — and Mr. Bush wants at least some of these tactics to remain in use.

I'm ashamed that my government does this sort of thing. I'd be ashamed even if I were sure that only genuine terrorists were being tortured — and I'm not. Remember that the Bush administration has imprisoned a number of innocent men at Guantánamo, and in some cases continues to imprison them even though it knows they are innocent.

Is torture a necessary evil in a post-9/11 world? No. People with actual knowledge of intelligence work tell us that reality isn't like TV dramas, in which the good guys have to torture the bad guy to find out where he planted the ticking time bomb.

What torture produces in practice is misinformation, as its victims, desperate to end the pain, tell interrogators whatever they want to hear. Thus Ibn al-Shaykh al-Libi — who ABC News says was subjected to both the cold cell and water boarding — told his questioners that Saddam Hussein's regime had trained members of Al Qaeda in the use of biochemical weapons. This "confession" became a key part of the Bush administration's case for invading Iraq — but it was pure invention.

So why is the Bush administration so determined to torture people?

To show that it can.

The central drive of the Bush administration — more fundamental than any particular policy — has been the effort to eliminate all limits on the president's power. Torture, I believe, appeals to the president and the vice president precisely because it's a violation of both law and tradition. By making an illegal and immoral practice a key element of U.S. policy, they're asserting their right to do whatever they claim is necessary.

And many of our politicians are willing to go along. The Republican majority in the House of Representatives is poised to vote in favor of the administration's plan to, in effect, declare torture legal. Most Republican senators are equally willing to go along, although a few, to their credit, have stood with the Democrats in opposing the administration.

Mr. Bush would have us believe that the difference between him and those opposing him on this issue is that he's willing to do what's necessary to protect America, and they aren't. But the record says otherwise.

The fact is that for all his talk of being a "war president," Mr. Bush has been conspicuously unwilling to ask Americans to make sacrifices on behalf of the cause — even when, in the days after 9/11, the nation longed to be called to a higher purpose. His admirers looked at him and thought they saw Winston Churchill. But instead of offering us blood, toil, tears and sweat, he told us to go shopping and promised tax cuts.

Only now, five years after 9/11, has Mr. Bush finally found some things he wants us to sacrifice. And those things turn out to be our principles and our self-respect.

The Kafka Strategy (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

The president seemed about to lose it at times last week. He was fighting with everybody — tenacious reporters frustrated by the absence of straight answers about the treatment of terror suspects; key Republican senators who think it's crazy for a great country like the U.S. to become a champion of kangaroo courts and the degradation of defendants; even his own former secretary of state, Colin Powell, who worries that the world is coming to "doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

It seemed that the only people the president wasn't fighting with were the Democrats, who have gone into a coma, and the yahoos who never had much of a problem with such matters as torture and detention without trial.

As Marvin Gaye once sang, "What's going on?"

The people at the top are getting scared, that's what's going on. The fog of secrecy is lifting, and the Bush administration is frightened to death that it will eventually have to pay a heavy price for the human rights abuses it has ordered or condoned in its so-called war on terror.

The Supreme Court has ruled that the Geneva Conventions apply to the prisoners seized by the administration, which means that abusing those prisoners — as so many have said for so long — is unquestionably illegal. And there is also the possibility that the Democrats, if they ever wake up, may take control of at least one house of Congress, giving them the kind of subpoena power and oversight that makes the administration tremble.

Bush, Cheney & Co. are desperately trying to hold together a house of cards that is ready to collapse because their strategy and tactics for fighting terrorism were slapped together with no real regard for the rule of law. What we've seen over the past few years has been a nightmare version of the United States. Torture? Secret prisons? Capital trials in which key evidence is kept from the accused? That's the stuff of Kafka, not Madison and Jefferson.

The reason President Bush has been trying so frantically to get Congressional passage of his plan to interrogate and try terror suspects is that he needs its contorted interpretations of the law to keep important cases from falling apart, and to cover the collective keisters of higher-ups who may have authorized or condoned war crimes.

There's no guarantee that the administration can properly bring to justice even the worst of the bad guys, people like Khalid Shaikh Mohammed and 13 other high-profile prisoners who were recently transferred from a secret C.I.A. program to the detention center at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. These are men accused of the most heinous of offenses, crimes that would subject them to the death penalty.

But it's widely believed that some or all of them were tortured. In civilized countries, evidence obtained by torture is inadmissible in a court of law.

The Bush administration would also like to deny terror suspects, even those facing the death penalty, the right to see evidence against them that is classified. This is a concept that is so far beyond the pale it makes most legal scholars gasp.

"We don't charge people — particularly in capital offenses, but in minor offenses, as well — without letting them see the evidence that is being offered against them," said Scott Horton, a prominent New York attorney and Columbia law professor who has done extensive human rights work.

"Let's imagine you're a prosecutor," said Mr. Horton. "Are you going to seek the death penalty against someone and convict them and let them be sentenced to death without letting them know what the evidence is against them? No way. What prosecutor wants that?"

One of the biggest concerns of the administration is the possibility of evidence emerging that could lead to charges of war crimes against high-ranking officials. The president and others in the administration have argued that they are seeking changes in the law in order to protect soldiers and ordinary interrogators in the field against war crimes accusations.

But there are already clear guidelines — short of war crimes prosecutions — for dealing with soldiers and civilian interrogators who abuse prisoners. The Abu Ghraib prosecutions are a good example.

The people who would have to worry, if war crimes were found to have been committed, would be those at the top of the command structure who crafted policies that were illegal and ordered them carried out — or who turned a blind eye to atrocities.

"Those are the ones," said Mr. Horton, "who are vulnerable."

Call Cruelty What It Is (WP)

By Tom Malinowski

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

President Bush is urging Congress to let the CIA keep using "alternative" interrogation procedures -- which include, according to published accounts, forcing prisoners to stand for 40 hours, depriving them of sleep and use of the "cold cell," in which the prisoner is left naked in a cell kept near 50 degrees and doused with cold water.

Bush insists that these techniques are not torture -- after all, they don't involve pulling out fingernails or applying electric shocks. He even says that he "would hope" the standards he's proposing are adopted by other countries. But before he again invites America's enemies to use such "alternative" methods on captured Americans, he might benefit from knowing a bit of their historical origins and from hearing accounts of those who have experienced them. With that in mind, here are some suggestions for the president's reading list.

He might begin with Robert Conquest's classic work on Stalin, "The Great Terror." Conquest wrote: "When there was time, the basic [Soviet Secret police] method for obtaining confessions and breaking the accused man was the 'conveyor' -- continual interrogation by relays of police for hours and days on end. As with many phenomena of the Stalin period, it has the advantage that it could not easily be condemned by any simple principle. Clearly, it amounted to unfair pressure after a certain time and to actual physical torture later still, but when? . . . At any rate, after even twelve hours, it is extremely uncomfortable. After a day, it becomes very hard. And after two or three days, the victim is actually physically poisoned by fatigue. It was as painful as any torture."

Conquest stated: "Interrogation usually took place at night and with the accused just roused -- often only fifteen minutes after going to sleep. The glaring lights at the interrogation had a disorientating effect." He quoted a Czech prisoner, Evzen Loebl, who described "having to be on his feet eighteen hours a day, sixteen of which were devoted to interrogation. During the six-hour sleep period, the warder pounded on the door every ten minutes. . . . If the banging did not wake him, a kick from the warder would. After two or three weeks, his feet were swollen and every inch of his body ached at the slightest touch; even washing became a torture."

Conquest quoted a Polish prisoner, Z. Stypulkowski, from 1945: "Cold, hunger, the bright light and especially sleeplessness. The cold is not terrific. But when the victim is weakened by hunger and sleeplessness, then the six or seven degrees above the freezing point make him tremble all the time. . . . After fifty or sixty interrogations with cold and hunger and almost no sleep, a man becomes like an automaton -- his eyes are bright, his legs swollen, his hands trembling. In this state, he is often convinced he is guilty."

Next on the list: Aleksander Solzhenitsyn's "The Gulag Archipelago." Solzhenitsyn describes the experience of prisoner Anna Skripnikova in 1952: "Sivakov, Chief of the Investigative Department of the Ordzhonikidze State Security Administration, said to her: 'The prison doctor reports you have a blood pressure of 240/120. That's too low, you bitch! We're going to drive it up to 340 so you'll kick the bucket, you viper, and with no black and blue marks; no beatings; no broken bones. We'll just not let you sleep.' And if, back in her cell, after a night spent in interrogation, she closed her eyes during the day, the jailer broke in and shouted: 'Open your eyes or I'll haul you off that cot by the legs and tie you to the wall standing up."

Elsewhere, Solzhenitsyn writes: "Sleeplessness . . . befogs the reason, undermines the will, and the human being ceases to be himself, to be his own 'I.' "

Finally, the president might review the memoirs of former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin, who describes experiencing sleep deprivation in a Soviet prison in the 1940s: "In the head of the interrogated prisoner a haze begins to form. His spirit is wearied to death, his legs are unsteady, and he has one sole desire: to sleep, to sleep just a little, not to get up, to lie, to rest, to forget. . . . Anyone who has experienced this desire knows that not even hunger or thirst are comparable with it. . . . I came across prisoners who signed what they were ordered to sign, only to get what the interrogator promised them. He did not promise them their liberty. He promised them -- if they signed -- uninterrupted sleep!"

The Soviets understood that these methods were cruel. They were also honest with themselves about the purpose of such cruelty -- to brutalize their enemies and to extract false confessions, rather than truthful intelligence. By denying this, President Bush is not just misleading us. He appears to be deceiving himself.

U.S. War Prisons Legal Vacuum For 14,000 (AP)

By Patrick Quinn

AP, September 18, 2006

In the few short years since the first shackled Afghan shuffled off to Guantanamo, the U.S. military has created a global network of overseas prisons, its islands of high security keeping 14,000 detainees beyond the reach of established law.

Disclosures of torture and long-term arbitrary detentions have won rebuke from leading voices including the U.N. secretary-general and the U.S. Supreme Court. But the bitterest words come from inside the system, the size of several major U.S. penitentiaries.

"It was hard to believe I'd get out," Baghdad shopkeeper Amjad Qassim al-Aliyawi told The Associated Press after his release — without charge — last month. "I lived with the Americans for one year and eight months as if I was living in hell."

Captured on battlefields, pulled from beds at midnight, grabbed off streets as suspected insurgents, tens of thousands now have passed through U.S. detention, the vast majority in Iraq.

Many say they were caught up in U.S. military sweeps, often interrogated around the clock, then released months or years later without apology, compensation or any word on why they were taken. Seventy to 90 percent of the Iraq detentions in 2003 were "mistakes," U.S. officers once told the international Red Cross.

Defenders of the system, which has only grown since soldiers' photos of abuse at Abu Ghraib shocked the world, say it's an unfortunate necessity in the battles to pacify Iraq and Afghanistan, and to keep suspected terrorists out of action.

Every U.S. detainee in Iraq "is detained because he poses a security threat to the government of Iraq, the people of Iraq or coalition forces," said U.S. Army Lt. Col. Keir-Kevin Curry, a spokesman for U.S.-led military detainee operations in Iraq.

But dozens of ex-detainees, government ministers, lawmakers, human rights activists, lawyers and scholars in Iraq, Afghanistan and the United States said the detention system often is unjust and hurts the war on terror by inflaming anti-Americanism in Iraq and elsewhere.

Building for the Long Term

Reports of extreme physical and mental abuse, symbolized by the notorious Abu Ghraib prison photos of 2004, have abated as the Pentagon has rejected torture-like treatment of the inmates. Most recently, on Sept. 6, the Pentagon issued a new interrogation manual banning forced nakedness, hooding, stress positions and other abusive techniques.

The same day, President Bush said the CIA's secret outposts in the prison network had been emptied, and 14 terror suspects from them sent to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to face trial in military tribunals. The U.S. Supreme Court has struck down the tribunal system, however, and the White House and Congress are now wrestling over the legal structure of such trials.

Living conditions for detainees may be improving as well. The U.S. military cites the toilets of Bagram, Afghanistan: In a cavernous old building at that air base, hundreds of detainees in their communal cages now have indoor plumbing and privacy screens, instead of exposed chamber pots.

Whatever the progress, small or significant, grim realities persist.

Human rights groups count dozens of detainee deaths for which no one has been punished or that were never explained. The secret prisons — unknown in number and location — remain available for future detainees. The new manual banning torture doesn't cover CIA interrogators. And thousands of people still languish in a limbo, deprived of one of common law's oldest rights, habeas corpus, the right to know why you are imprisoned.

"If you, God forbid, are an innocent Afghan who gets sold down the river by some warlord rival, you can end up at Bagram and you have absolutely no way of clearing your name," said John Sifton of Human Rights Watch in New York. "You can't have a lawyer present evidence, or do anything organized to get yourself out of there."

The U.S. government has contended it can hold detainees until the "war on terror" ends — as it determines.

"I don't think we've gotten to the question of how long," said retired admiral John D. Hutson, former top lawyer for the U.S. Navy. "When we get up to 'forever,' I think it will be tested" in court, he said.

The Navy is planning long-term at Guantanamo. This fall it expects to open a new, $30-million maximum-security wing at its prison complex there, a concrete-and-steel structure replacing more temporary camps.

In Iraq, Army jailers are a step ahead. Last month they opened a $60-million, state-of-the-art detention center at Camp Cropper, near Baghdad's airport. The Army oversees about 13,000 prisoners in Iraq at Cropper, Camp Bucca in the southern desert, and Fort Suse in the Kurdish north.

Neither prisoners of war nor criminal defendants, they are just "security detainees" held "for imperative reasons of security," spokesman Curry said, using language from an annex to a U.N. Security Council resolution authorizing the U.S. presence here.

Questions of Law, Sovereignty

President Bush laid out the U.S. position in a speech Sept. 6.

"These are enemy combatants who are waging war on our nation," he said. "We have a right under the laws of war, and we have an obligation to the American people, to detain these enemies and stop them from rejoining the battle."

But others say there's no need to hold these thousands outside of the rules for prisoners of war established by the Geneva Conventions.

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan declared last March that the extent of arbitrary detention here is "not consistent with provisions of international law governing internment on imperative reasons of security."

Meanwhile, officials of Nouri al-Maliki's 4-month-old Iraqi government say the U.S. detention system violates Iraq's national rights.

"As long as sovereignty has transferred to Iraqi hands, the Americans have no right to detain any Iraqi person," said Fadhil al-Sharaa, an aide to the prime minister. "The detention should be conducted only with the permission of the Iraqi judiciary."

At the Justice Ministry, Deputy Minister Busho Ibrahim told AP it has been "a daily request" that the detainees be brought under Iraqi authority.

There's no guarantee the Americans' 13,000 detainees would fare better under control of the Iraqi government, which U.N. officials say holds 15,000 prisoners.

But little has changed because of these requests. When the Americans formally turned over Abu Ghraib prison to Iraqi control on Sept. 2, it was empty but its 3,000 prisoners remained in U.S. custody, shifted to Camp Cropper.

Life in Custody

The cases of U.S.-detained Iraqis are reviewed by a committee of U.S. military and Iraqi government officials. The panel recommends criminal charges against some, release for others. As of Sept. 9, the Central Criminal Court of Iraq had put 1,445 on trial, convicting 1,252. In the last week of August, for example, 38 were sentenced on charges ranging from illegal weapons possession to murder, for the shooting of a U.S. Marine.

Almost 18,700 have been released since June 2004, the U.S. command says, not including many more who were held and then freed by local military units and never shipped to major prisons.

Some who were released, no longer considered a threat, later joined or rejoined the insurgency.

The review process is too slow, say U.N. officials. Until they are released, often families don't know where their men are — the prisoners are usually men — or even whether they're in American hands.

Ex-detainee Mouayad Yasin Hassan, 31, seized in April 2004 as a suspected Sunni Muslim insurgent, said he wasn't allowed to obtain a lawyer or contact his family during 13 months at Abu Ghraib and Bucca, where he was interrogated incessantly. When he asked why he was in prison, he said, the answer was, "We keep you for security reasons."

Another released prisoner, Waleed Abdul Karim, 26, recounted how his guards would wield their absolute authority.

"Tell us about the ones who attack Americans in your neighborhood," he quoted an interrogator as saying, "or I will keep you in prison for another 50 years."

As with others, Karim's confinement may simply have strengthened support for the anti-U.S. resistance. "I will hate Americans for the rest of my life," he said.

As bleak and hidden as the Iraq lockups are, the Afghan situation is even less known. Accounts of abuse and deaths emerged in 2002-2004, but if Abu Ghraib-like photos from Bagram exist, none have leaked out. The U.S. military is believed holding about 500 detainees — most Afghans, but also apparently Arabs, Pakistanis and Central Asians.

The United States plans to cede control of its Afghan detainees by early next year, five years after invading Afghanistan to eliminate al-Qaida's base and bring down the Taliban government. Meanwhile, the prisoners of Bagram exist in a legal vacuum like that elsewhere in the U.S. detention network.

"There's been a silence about Bagram, and much less political discussion about it," said Richard Bennett, chief U.N. human rights officer in Afghanistan.

Freed detainees tell how in cages of 16 inmates they are forbidden to speak to each other. They wear the same orange jumpsuits and shaven heads as the terrorist suspects at Guantanamo, but lack even the scant legal rights granted inmates at that Cuba base. In some cases, they have been held without charge for three to four years, rights workers say.

Guantanamo received its first prisoners from Afghanistan — chained, wearing blacked-out goggles — in January 2002. A total of 770 detainees were sent there. Its population today of Afghans, Arabs and others, stands at 455.

Described as the most dangerous of America's "war on terror" prisoners, only 10 of the Guantanamo inmates have been charged with crimes. Charges are expected against 14 other al-Qaida suspects flown in to Guantanamo from secret prisons on Sept. 4.

Plans for their trials are on hold, however, because of a Supreme Court ruling in June against the Bush administration's plan for military tribunals.

The court held the tribunals were not authorized by the U.S. Congress and violated the Geneva Conventions by abrogating prisoners' rights. In a sometimes contentious debate, the White House and Congress are trying to agree on a new, acceptable trial plan.

Since the court decision, and after four years of confusing claims that terrorist suspects were so-called "unlawful combatants" unprotected by international law, the Bush administration has taken steps recognizing that the Geneva Conventions' legal and human rights do extend to imprisoned al-Qaida militants. At the same time, however, the new White House proposal on tribunals retains such controversial features as denying defendants access to some evidence against them.

In his Sept. 6 speech, Bush acknowledged for the first time the existence of the CIA's secret prisons, believed established at military bases or safehouses in such places as Egypt, Indonesia and eastern Europe. That network, uncovered by journalists, had been condemned by U.N. authorities and investigated by the Council of Europe.

The clandestine jails are now empty, Bush announced, but will remain a future option for CIA detentions and interrogation.

Louise Arbour, U.N. human rights chief, is urging Bush to abolish the CIA prisons altogether, as ripe for "abusive conduct." The CIA's techniques for extracting information from prisoners still remain secret, she noted.

DOJ_NMG_0063935

Meanwhile, the U.S. government's willingness to resort to "extraordinary rendition," transferring suspects to other nations where they might be tortured, appears unchanged.

Prosecutions and Memories

The exposure of sadistic abuse, torture and death at Abu Ghraib two years ago touched off a flood of courts-martial of mostly lower-ranking U.S. soldiers. Overall, about 800 investigations of alleged detainee mistreatment in Iraq and Afghanistan have led to action against more than 250 service personnel, including 89 convicted at courts-martial, U.S. diplomats told the United Nations in May.

Critics protest that penalties have been too soft and too little has been done, particularly in tracing inhumane interrogation methods from the far-flung islands of the overseas prison system back to policies set by high-ranking officials.

In only 14 of 34 cases has anyone been punished for the confirmed or suspected killings of detainees, the New York-based Human Rights First reports. The stiffest sentence in a torture-related death has been five months in jail. The group reported last February that in almost half of 98 detainee deaths, the cause was either never announced or reported as undetermined.

Looking back, the United States overreacted in its treatment of detainees after Sept. 11, said Anne-Marie Slaughter, a noted American scholar of international law.

It was understandable, the Princeton University dean said, but now "we have to restore a balance between security and rights that is consistent with who we are and consistent with our security needs."

Otherwise, she said, "history will look back and say that we took a dangerous and deeply wrong turn."

Back here in Baghdad, at the Alawi bus station, a gritty, noisy hub far from the meeting rooms of Washington and Geneva, women gather with fading hopes whenever a new prisoner release is announced.

As she watched one recent day for a bus from distant Camp Bucca, one mother wept and told her story.

"The Americans arrested my son, my brother and his friend," said Zahraa Alyat, 42. "The Americans arrested them October 16, 2005. They left together and I don't know anything about them."

The bus pulled up. A few dozen men stepped off, some blindfolded, some bound, none with any luggage, none with familiar faces.

As the distraught women straggled away once more, one ex-prisoner, 18-year-old Bilal Kadhim Muhssin, spotted U.S. troops nearby.

"Americans," he muttered in fear. "Oh, my God, don't say that name," and he bolted for a city bus, and freedom.

Look Away! Look Away! (RC)

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

Either way you slice it, Sen. Saxby Chambliss (R-Ga.) argued last week that the South could have won the war between the states if the Confederates had just had better intelligence.

During Thursday's closed-door Senate Armed Services Committee hearing on trials, interrogation and detention of foreign terrorism suspects, Chambliss made an analogy between the current war on terror and the Civil War. He made the point that history would have been altered dramatically if only the South had had better intel.

Democratic sources expressed outrage that he compared the Civil War to the Bush administration's war on terror. "It's a little disgusting" to be equating the two, one Democratic source said, adding, "You can't figure out whether he didn't understand the Civil War, or the war on terror, or both."

When sources first contacted HOH, they thought they remembered Chambliss say, "We need better intelligence. If we had better intelligence in the Civil War we'd be quoting Jefferson Davis, not Lincoln."

Not quite, according to Chambliss spokeswoman Lindsay Mabry. She says what he really said was, "If Gen. JEB Stuart had had better intelligence, we'd all be meeting in Richmond right now."

No biggie, Mabry said. Her boss simply "made a historical analogy" that "intelligence is important to ultimate victory in wartime. And the side that knows better wins."

Sen. Macaca? A party's never a party until the host insults one of the guests. Such was the case Thursday at the anniversary party for "The Chris Matthews Show" on the tented rooftop of The Hay-Adams hotel.

The hyperactive TV gabber got up to thank everyone for coming out to celebrate his Sunday morning show's success. Suddenly he got that boyishly devilish grin — you know the one — and stopped mid-sentence to send a shout-out to Sen. George Allen (R-Va.).

Allen had that deer-in-the-headlights look as the entire party stood at attention. Matthews continued, "I'm not going to call you Sen. Ma... ." He paused a beat, then continued his joke with, "Caucasian."

The term he didn't call Allen would have been "macaca," the one word Allen wishes he had never uttered. The Senator has been dogged by critical media coverage, including on Matthews' MSNBC show "Hardball," for weeks now, ever since he referred to a young Indian-American staffer on the campaign of his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb, as "macaca," a word that can mean monkey.

Allen's spokesman wouldn't directly address what the Senator thought of Matthews' joke, saying only, "Sen. Allen was happy to go by and congratulate Chris on a successful five years."

Senator Slams Tom Cruise. Actress Brooke Shields has a friend in Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.).

Smith, chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Aging, slammed actor Tom Cruise for criticizing Shields' use of the antidepressant Paxil when she suffered from postpartum depression. The comments by Cruise — an adherent of the Church of Scientology, which frowns on the use of antidepressants — were widely criticized as unscientific and potentially harmful to women who have the condition.

During Thursday's hearing on senior suicide, Gordon posed a non sequitur question to guest David Steffens, head of geriatric psychiatry at Duke University Medical Center.

"Would you agree with me: Tom Cruise is a great actor?" Gordon, tongue-in-cheek, asked his witness.

"He is a fantastic actor," Steffens replied, kind of chuckling.

"What kind of a mental health physician do you think he is?"

"I think that ... um," Steffens wasn't really sure how to answer, though before Smith posed the question a different way, Steffens said, "I think he needs to be better informed."

"Is postpartum depression real? Is it a legitimate medical condition?"

"Yes, sir," Steffens replied.

"Bipolar condition — is that a real condition?"

"Yes, sir."

"How about schizophrenia?"

"Yes, sir," the doctor responded.

"And they're identifiable medical conditions with treatments?" the Senator asked.

"Yes, sir, very effective treatments."

"I wanted that on the record," Smith said.

OK, there you have it, Brooke. Smith is on your side, too.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bid To Stockpile Bioterror Drugs Stymied By Setbacks (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — The last of the anthrax-laced letters was still making its way through the mail in late 2001 when top Bush administration officials reached an obvious conclusion: the nation desperately needed to expand its medical stockpile to prepare for another biological attack.

The result was Project BioShield, a $5.6 billion effort to exploit the country's top medical and scientific brains and fill an emergency medical cabinet with new drugs and vaccines for a host of threats. "We will rally the great promise of American science and innovation to confront the greatest danger of our time," President Bush said in starting the program.

But the project, critics say, has largely failed to deliver.

So far, only a small fraction of the anticipated remedies are available. Drug companies have waited months, if not years, for government agencies to decide which treatments they want and in what quantities. Unable to attract large pharmaceutical corporations to join the endeavor, the government is instead relying on small start-up companies that often have no proven track record.

The troubles have been most acute with the highest priority of all: a $900 million push to add a new anthrax vaccine to the stockpile. What had begun as an effort to test and manufacture a safer, faster-acting vaccine has turned into an ugly battle between two biotech businesses.

Each has hired Washington lobbyists to attack its rival's product and try to win over lawmakers and administration officials. Delivery of the new vaccine is far behind schedule, and a dispute between the Department of Health and Human Services and VaxGen, the company chosen to make the vaccine, could even end the deal. The only doses that have been added to the stockpile are of a decades-old vaccine that has generated complaints of serious side effects.

Health department officials acknowledge some problems but say they have made progress. "Medical discovery is an unpredictable process," said Bill Hall, a spokesman. "It is the nature of science."

But some companies on the sidelines say the experience with the anthrax vaccine is exactly why they do not want to do business with Washington. Once optimistic about the president's promise, many biotech companies and public health experts are now discouraged.

"The inept implementation of the program has led the best brains and the best scientists to give up, to look elsewhere or devote their resources to medical initiatives that are not focused on biodefense," said Michael Greenberger, director of the Center for Health and Homeland Security at the University of Maryland.

Even some former department officials who helped create BioShield are dismayed.

"I find this all rather repugnant," said D. A. Henderson, a former top bioterrorism official. "You have people here who, in the face of a problem of serious import, are using every tactic they can to line their own pockets." Risk and Disappointment

From the start, officials in Washington knew that Project BioShield would be a risky venture — for the government, the companies involved and even ordinary Americans, who might be asked to take relatively untested treatments in an emergency.

Officials hoped $5.6 billion in federal money would entice companies to develop new drugs and vaccines for anthrax, smallpox, botulism, Ebola and other deadly diseases.

Because of the perceived urgency of the threat, the project suspends some traditional standards. It allows new vaccines or drugs to be used in emergencies before completing the lengthy Food and Drug Administration approval process. Full testing on humans is also not required because it is too dangerous, even though that means no one will know with certainty whether the vaccines will work until used in a crisis.

For their part, the companies have to take all the risks of developing and manufacturing new products; they get paid only upon delivery.

At the top of the government's threat list was anthrax, which killed five people, created panic and disrupted the mail system after letters filled with the powder were sent through the mail. No one has been charged in the attacks, which affected places including a tabloid publication in Florida, a New York television network and several lawmakers' offices on Capitol Hill.

"The top three threats, in fact, are anthrax, anthrax, anthrax," Dr. Gerald Parker, a senior health agency official, said in an interview. If properly dispersed through the air, just a few hundred pounds of anthrax powder could endanger tens of thousands of people.

After the letter attacks, the health agency bought enough antibiotics for 41 million Americans, but the recommended treatment augments those drugs with a vaccine. The government already had an anthrax vaccine to inoculate military personnel, but it involved six shots over 18 months, an unusually long course of treatment. While the F.D.A. says it is safe and effective, it can have nasty side effects. There have been reports among military personnel of six deaths and serious complications, including lymphoma and multiple sclerosis. The military stopped mandatory vaccinations in 2004 after some soldiers balked and filed lawsuits.

"It is 1950's technology," said Dr. Philip K. Russell, the former acting director of the office that started Project BioShield. "We don't drive Model T Fords anymore."

The first disappointment with the new anthrax vaccine occurred in early 2004 when bids to test and manufacture it came in. None were from big pharmaceutical companies; they considered the effort unappealing because the potential market was relatively small and profits limited. They were also concerned about liability if someone became ill or died after being inoculated. Project BioShield did not offer immunity from lawsuits.

That left a handful of companies in the running, relatively small outfits with limited experience. VaxGen, for example, had never taken a drug to market. Its first major product, an AIDS vaccine, flopped in 2003. The company also had financial troubles; it was barred from Nasdaq in 2004 after managers uncovered accounting errors.

The situation was hardly ideal, federal health officials acknowledged.

"We are going to be working consistently with these smaller firms, and it's going to require an enormous amount of government effort to get this product licensed," said Stewart Simonson, then an assistant health secretary overseeing the anthrax vaccine effort.

VaxGen argues that a company does not have to be large to successfully produce a vaccine. "We've repeatedly demonstrated that we have the capacity, expertise and infrastructure to meet the government's needs," said Lance Ignon, a vice president of the company, which is based in Brisbane, Calif.

Instead of hedging its bets by dividing the work among several vendors, Health and Human Services awarded the entire $887 million order to VaxGen. It was to produce 75 million doses, enough to inoculate 25 million Americans.

That decision fed doubts about Project BioShield in Congress and drew loud complaints that would grow into sharp opposition from Emergent BioSolutions, the maker of the old vaccine, which is based in Gaithersburg, Md.

Then known as BioPort and based in Lansing, Mich., the company did not submit a bid for the new vaccine. Instead, it had been trying for months to persuade the federal government to buy hundreds of millions of dollars of the existing vaccine, its only major product. When executives learned that one competitor was getting all the work, they knew the company's future was in peril.

Soon, though, they found an important weapon for a campaign to recapture business.

Competition Heats Up

VaxGen's vaccine was based on a modified version of the old one; Army scientists had genetically re-engineered it in hopes of making it safer and faster, with three shots instead of six. But VaxGen tests in early 2005 showed that an ingredient added to the vaccine caused it to decompose. It would not survive long in the emergency stockpile.

VaxGen officials played down the setback, which delayed delivery to 2007 from 2006. "We are being called on to develop a vaccine in roughly half the time it normally takes," Mr. Ignon said. "When you do that, you have to accept the fact that there are going to be some unexpected turns."

But Emergent officials capitalized on VaxGen's stumble. They had already gotten health agency officials to agree to buy five million doses of their vaccine to add to the stockpile. Now they began pushing for a much larger deal, possibly replacing VaxGen's vaccine altogether, company documents show.

To lead its lobbying effort, which has cost more than $1 million since 2005, Emergent turned to Jerome M. Hauer, a top official at the health department until late 2003. While at the agency, he supported the push for a new vaccine. Now he was trying to persuade Congress and his former employer to buy the old vaccine.

Explaining his shift, Mr. Hauer said VaxGen's problems convinced him that Emergent's vaccine was the best choice. In retrospect, he said, "The advice we were given was wrong."

Emergent hired nearly a dozen other lobbyists, some of whom had similarly useful connections. They included John M. Clerici, a lawyer who had helped shape the BioShield legislation; John Hishta, former chief of staff to Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia; and Allen Shofe, a former tobacco industry lobbyist.

The lobbyists argued that quality control problems at Emergent's plant in Michigan had been corrected and that reports of serious side effects from the vaccine were unfounded. But mostly, they tried to undermine confidence in VaxGen.

In a series of meetings with lawmakers and administration officials, they attacked their rival. "VaxGen has a history of failure and irregularities," their briefing books said. "VaxGen has never produced an F.D.A.-approved product," and its "vaccine is based on unproven technology," leaving "the health and protection of the American public on a company with a history of scientific failure and financial scandal."

The lobbyists also criticized the officials involved in administering BioShield. In speeches and news interviews, Mr. Hauer questioned the credentials of Mr. Simonson, the health department official in charge of the program, and once called him the "Mike Brown of H.H.S.," a reference to the disgraced former director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. (Mr. Simonson, who resigned this year, had worked as an Amtrak lawyer and as legal counsel to Gov. Tommy G. Thompson of Wisconsin, who was later head of the federal health department.)

The lobbyists also charged that Dr. Russell, who helped start Project BioShield, had a conflict of interest. They said he had helped develop the vaccine as former director of the Walter Reed Army Institute of Research and then been instrumental in awarding the manufacturing contract after moving to the health department. (Dr. Russell says he retired from the Army before it began research on the VaxGen vaccine.)

Fearful of losing the public relations battle, VaxGen increased its own lobbying effort. It hired Robert Housman, who had worked with Mr. Hauer to help Emergent open its anti-VaxGen campaign and then switched sides. But VaxGen, which spent $200,000 on lobbying last year, was outmanned by Emergent and put on the defensive.

Senator Charles E. Grassley, an Iowa Republican and focus of Emergent's lobbying, sent a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt that closely echoed criticisms of VaxGen that had first been raised in Emergent documents.

Representative Davis scheduled a hearing last summer at which Emergent's chief executive was invited to testify, but no one was invited from VaxGen. Mr. Davis said Mr. Hishta, his former aide, apparently did contact his office about Emergent. But he said he was not sure why only Emergent was asked to testify.

Under pressure from Congress, the health agency agreed in May to double its order of Emergent's vaccine to 10 million doses, worth $243 million. The next day, health officials demanded what VaxGen says are additional safety and efficacy tests that will further delay delivery by a year or two. Threatening to sue, VaxGen is seeking upfront payments from the health department or other concessions. If no agreement is reached, company officials say, the entire deal could collapse.

"We understand this program is new and changes will have to be made," said Piers Whitehead, a vice president of VaxGen. "But in our case, the goalposts were moved much farther than they needed to be."

Words of Determination

Health officials said they were determined to see the anthrax contract — and other BioShield endeavors — through to the end.

"There are people out there who feel like they are not getting a piece of the pie or that this is not running the right way," said Mr. Hall, the department spokesman. "That may be. But to come in and criticize BioShield as a failing program because we have not spent all the money and don't have all the products in the warehouse is completely and sorely misguided."

The maneuvering has been so intense, with lobbyists and media consultants helping the companies undermine the competition, even some of the people who have profited now express disgust.

"This ought be driven by the science, by efficacy and threat, not lobbyists," Mr. Housman said. "It has been shanghaied. And the implication is our national security is compromised."

Next week, agency officials will meet with industry representatives to discuss a new strategy for Project BioShield. Mr. Greenberger, the University of Maryland expert, and others argue that government agencies must determine more quickly what is needed for the stockpile and provide more financial incentives to lure the big companies and better support the start-up companies.

Some in Congress say the improvements are much needed because Project BioShield has proven so disappointing.

"A torturous labyrinth of federal fiefdoms into which billions disappear," Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, said of the program. "Yet few antidotes have yet to emerge."

Bluegill On Guard In Region's Water Supply (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

The bluegill is a freshwater fish of many talents, able to elude predators by hiding in submerged tree stumps and to survive for weeks without food.

Now, with the help of a scientific contraption developed by the U.S. Army and a private company, the fish also is keeping vigil over the Washington region's water supplies, where it might be able to save millions of lives in the event of a terrorist attack.

The scaly sentinels are a key component of the IAC 1090 Intelligent Aquatic Biomonitoring System, a new water-monitoring device that electronically analyzes the behavior of eight captive bluegills to detect the presence of chemical toxins or other contaminants. The system is also in use in New York City and San Francisco.

If the fish show signs of distress in response to something in the water, the system automatically trips an alarm, takes samples, and summons authorities by e-mail and pager so that they can investigate whether there is a threat to humans. It costs $45,000 to $110,000.

"We're basically using it as part of an early-warning contaminant-monitoring system for water in the national capital region," said Stuart A. Freudberg, director of environmental programs for the Metropolitan Washington Council of Governments. "This is another tool in the arsenal, if you will, that water utilities use to make sure the water in this region is safe."

Freudberg said the system has been in place for at least six months and monitors water for a number of Washington area utilities serving 4.5 million people. He declined to reveal how many devices are in place, citing security needs.

Ever since Sept. 11, 2001, governments at all levels have sought ways to deter and defend against the next terrorist attack. One scenario that officials fear is an attempt by terrorists to dump chemicals or other toxic agents into the water supply, an attack that could kill or sicken millions of people.

Utilities have always taken routine steps to ensure the quality of the water they provide, including the regular testing of samples and the treatment of water to kill pathogens. Such measures continue, and experts point out that poisoning a city's water supply would be difficult because the sheer volume would dilute and overwhelm most chemicals. Yet the risk of such an attack has prompted officials to search for every tool they can find.

For the past six months, the San Francisco Public Utilities Commission has used bluegills in its treatment plant south of the city to monitor water provided to about half of its 2.4 million customers, spokesman Tony Winnicker said.

"It's another layer of protection," he said. "The fish are extremely sensitive to minute changes in the source water quality, so even if we don't know what the fish react to, we know that they are reacting to something. . . . With traditional sampling, you can only find what you are looking for. The fish might pick up something that you are maybe not specifically looking for."

DOJ_NMG_0063940

The biomonitoring system is a 2-by-3-foot device developed for commercial use by Intelligent Automation Corp. of Poway, Calif., with technology patented by the Army. The device resembles a luggage trunk shot through with cables and tubes and hooked up to a monitor.

Eight juvenile bluegills swim in a row of solitary compartments the size of a large mail slot, each fish submersed in piped-in water and separated from the others by a pane of frosted glass. Electrodes attached to each compartment convey data about the fish's movements and breathing patterns to a nearby computer, which monitors the data and sounds the alarm if at least six of the fish show signs of distress.

"It's kind of similar to a doctor putting a stethoscope on your chest -- it's to look for something that's not normal," said Tom Shedd, a research biologist with the U.S. Army Center for Environmental Health Research at Fort Detrick, who helped invent the system. "It's the same thing here, only what you are looking at is . . . the breathing apparatus of the fish."

The sensors do not touch the bluegills' chests, of course, Shedd said. Instead, when the fish use muscles to breathe, the action sends a low-level electrical impulse through the water that can be picked up by the two electrodes attached to each fish chamber. From those signals, scientists can tell how quickly and deeply the fish are breathing and can detect when they "cough," or try to discharge an irritant from their gills, Shedd said. All of which, along with the fish's movements, can signal the presence of a toxin.

The system uses bluegills because the fish are sedentary, Shedd said, and because the Environmental Protection Agency has a "huge" database showing how various toxins affect them. Although adult bluegills can grow to be 13 inches long, the system relies on juveniles that are generally no longer than four inches. It requires that they remain in the chamber, unfed, for two-to-three-week tours of duty, Shedd said.

Such conditions do not upset the fish, said William A. Lawler, an executive with Intelligent Automation, who noted that the system wouldn't work if the device itself made the fish agitated. "We want them very calm and very happy," he said. "We're monitoring against stress."

The company's key contribution was to add software that automated the analysis of the raw data and the sending of alerts, because scientists cannot be on hand all the time, Lawler said.

The system can monitor either untreated or treated water as long as chlorine is removed. It also can be configured to directly measure water temperature and acidity, which can agitate fish without posing a threat to humans. The system cannot detect bacteria such as anthrax, E.coli and fecal coliform, but utilities have other tests for such things, Lawler said.

So far none of the municipal systems has found signs of a terrorist attack, although a few have had alerts for disruptions in algae levels and the like, officials said. One city received an alert after janitors opened the device to check on the fish, spooking them, Lawler said.

More serious was the "substantial alarm" at Fort Detrick in the spring of 2004, when fish at the facility's water treatment plant on the Monocacy River signaled a problem, Shedd said. The fish died, and testing showed the presence of materials typically used in pesticides and herbicides. Officials never found the source, but the toxins never got into the drinking water.

"We had confidence that that didn't take place," Shedd said.

Lawler said the bluegills don't always have to give their lives to be of service. "The idea is to prevent harm to the fish and get a handle on something before there is a problem," he said.

The Path To Hysteria (WSJ)

By Cyrus Nowrasteh

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

I am neither an activist, politician or partisan, nor an ideologue of any stripe. What I am is a writer who takes his job very seriously, as do most of my colleagues: Also, one who recently took on the most distressing and important story it will ever fall to me to tell. I considered it a privilege when asked to write the script for "The Path to 9/11." I felt duty-bound from the outset to focus on a single goal -- to represent our recent pre-9/11 history as the evidence revealed it to be. The American people deserve to know that history: They have paid for it in blood. Like all Americans, I wish it were not so. I wish there were no terrorists. I wish there had been no 9/11. I wish we could squabble among ourselves in assured security. But wishes avail nothing.

My Iranian parents fled tyranny and oppression. I know and appreciate deeply the sanctuary America has offered. Only in this country could a person such as I have had the life, liberty and opportunity that I have had. No one needs to remind me of this -- I know it every single day. I know, too, as does everyone involved in the production, that we kept uppermost in our minds the need for due diligence in the delivery of this history. Fact-checkers and lawyers scrutinized every detail, every line, every scene. There were hundreds of pages of annotations. We were informed by multiple advisers and interviews with people involved in the events -- and books, including in a most important way the 9/11 Commission Report.

It would have been good to be able to report due diligence on the part of those who judged the film, the ones who held forth on it before watching a moment of it. Instead, in the rush to judgment, and the effort to portray the series as the work of a right-wing zealot, much was made of my "friendship" with Rush Limbaugh (a connection limited to two social encounters), but nothing of any acquaintance with well-known names on the other side of the political spectrum. No reference to Abby Mann, for instance, with whom I worked on "10,000 Black Men Named George" (whose hero is an African-American communist) or Oliver Stone, producer of "The Day Reagan Was Shot," a film I wrote and directed. Clearly, those enraged that a film would criticize the Clinton administration's antiterrorism policies -- though critical of its successor as well -- were willing to embrace only one scenario: The writer was a conservative hatchetman. * * *

In July a reporter asked if I had ever been ethnically profiled. I happily replied, "No." I can no longer say that. The L.A. Times, for one, characterized me by race, religion, ethnicity, country-of-origin and political leanings -- wrongly on four of five counts. To them I was an Iranian-American politically conservative Muslim. It is perhaps irrelevant in our brave new world of journalism that I was born in Boulder, Colo. I am not a Muslim or practitioner of any religion, nor am I a political conservative. What am I? I am, most devoutly, an American. I asked the reporter if this kind of labeling was a new policy for the paper. He had no response.

The hysteria engendered by the series found more than one target. In addition to the death threats and hate mail directed at me, and my grotesque portrayal as a maddened right-winger, there developed an impassioned search for incriminating evidence on everyone else connected to the film. And in director David Cunningham, the searchers found paydirt! His father had founded a Christian youth outreach mission. The whiff of the younger Mr. Cunningham's possible connection to this enterprise was enough to set the hounds of suspicion baying. A religious mission! A New York Times reporter wrote, without irony or explanation, that an issue that raised questions about the director was his involvement in his father's outreach work. In the era of McCarthyism, the merest hint of a connection to communism sufficed to inspire dark accusations, the certainty that the accused was part of a malign conspiracy. Today, apparently, you can get something of that effect by charging a connection with a Christian mission.

"The Path to 9/11" was intended to remind us of the common enemy we face. Like the 9/11 Report itself, it is meant to enable us to better defend ourselves from a future attack. Past is prologue, and 9/11 is merely another step in an escalating Islamic fundamentalist reign of terror. By dramatizing the step-by-step increase in attacks on America -- all of which, in fact, occurred -- we are better able to see the pattern and anticipate the future. That was the point of the series, its only intention. Call it the canary in the coal mine. Call it John O'Neill in the FBI.

Despite intense political pressure to pull the film right up until airtime, Disney/ABC stood tall and refused to give in. For this -- for not buckling to threats from Democratic senators threatening to revoke ABC station licenses -- Disney CEO Rober Iger and ABC executives deserve every commendation. Hence the 28 million viewers over two nights, and the ratings victory Monday night (little reported by the media), are gratifying indeed.

"The Path to 9/11" was set in the time before the event, and in a world in which no party had the political will to act. The principals did not know then what we know now. It is also indisputable that Bill Clinton entered office a month before the first attack on the World Trade Center. Eight years then went by, replete with terrorist assaults on Americans and American interests overseas. George W. Bush was in office eight months before 9/11. Those who actually watched the entire miniseries know that he was given no special treatment.

It's good to have come to something approaching the end of this saga, whose lessons are worth remembering. It gave us, for one thing, a heartening glimpse (these things don't come along every day) of corporate backbone in the face of phenomenal pressure -- and an infinitely more chilling one testifying to the power and reach of politically driven hysteria. A ripe subject for a miniseries, if ever there was one.

Mr. Nowrasteh wrote the screenplay for "The Path to 9/11."

Freedom Tower Moves Closer To Being Filled Despite Hurdles (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- New York state and the federal government have moved closer to committing to help fill the long-troubled Freedom Tower, the iconic skyscraper planned at the World Trade Center site. The moves are necessary to make the $2 billion tower financially viable, but several hurdles remain to secure actual leases.

New York state's Office of General Services has signed a nonbinding "term sheet" that will be the basis for negotiations to take 415,000 square feet in the 2.6-million-square-foot tower. The agency, which is the state government's property manager, would pay an initial annual rent of $59 a square foot. The lease would last 15 years. The term sheet includes an option for the state to expand to one million square feet over 50 years.

Meantime, the federal government's property-management arm, the General Services Administration, has signed the third in a series of nonbinding "memorandums of agreement" to take 600,000 square feet in the Freedom Tower. This latest document specifies the initial rent, also $59 a square foot. A final deal would likely need congressional approval.

The rent represents a substantial premium to current rental rates in lower Manhattan. Average rents for office space downtown were $35.18 in the second quarter, according to real-estate brokerage Cushman & Wakefield Inc. Moody's Investors Service signed a lease to take 15 floors in the rebuilt 7 World Trade Center for the high-$30 to low-$40-a-square-foot range, after government incentives that apply to the Freedom Tower, which is scheduled to open in 2012.

If the state and federal commitments turn into actual leases, it would put the Freedom Tower on stronger financial footing, since the leases can be used as collateral to back construction bonds. The project will be paid for with insurance proceeds and money the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey collects from tolls at its bridges and tunnels.

The project appears to be gaining political support, too. New York state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, the leading candidate in New York's coming gubernatorial election, who in the past has derided the Freedom Tower as a "white elephant," called Sunday's announcement a "crucial step in ensuring the financial viability of the Freedom Tower."

The Freedom Tower rentals are one piece of a larger rebuilding pact under negotiation and meant to be finalized later this week. That plan would divide responsibility for building the site's five towers and retail mall between private developer Larry Silverstein and the site's owner, the Port Authority.

A joint announcement by New York Gov. George E. Pataki, New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine, and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, indicates that despite bickering, the sides involved in the rebuilding seem to be working hard to finalize an overall rebuilding pact by Thursday's Port Authority board meeting. Gov. Pataki, in a statement Sunday said the deal helps "ensure downtown's future as the financial capital of the world."

It is unclear if the new World Trade Center will attract private business. The only tentative commitments to fill space there have been from government agencies. In addition to the state and federal governments, the Port Authority and New York City are negotiating to lease 1.2 million square feet in one of the smaller office towers at the site, which will be controlled by Mr. Silverstein. People familiar with the negotiations say the parties are close to agreeing on rents in the high-$50-a-square-foot range.

WAR NEWS:

Officials Deny Plans For Baghdad Berms (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah

USA Today, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's Defense Ministry said Sunday that plans to fortify the 28 entrances to Baghdad do not include encircling the city with trenches, as has been reported.

Col. Qassim Atta, a ministry spokesman, denied that Iraqi and U.S. forces planned to set up a perimeter of new trenches and berms to try to staunch one of the bloodiest periods in the capital since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

“The 28 entrances to Baghdad will be tightly controlled by the Iraqi police,” Atta said. “But to besiege Baghdad with trenches is total exaggeration.”

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman here, said the plan had been “mischaracterized” in the media. “There are plans for a security belt around Baghdad in order to constrict movement through authorized checkpoints,” he said. “This will help stem the flow of criminal activity in and out of the city, such as transporting illegal weapons and kidnap victims. This has been mischaracterized by some media as a giant trench around the city. This is not what's happening.”

Johnson said existing barriers such as canals and ditches “will be tied together with new obstacles to keep traffic moving through manned checkpoints … to reduce violence in Baghdad.”

On Sunday, more violence rocked the capital, where the Associated Press reported more than 180 people had died since Wednesday. A bomb left in a plastic bag exploded on the commercial Jumhouriyah Street in central Baghdad. Two people were killed and eight were wounded, police 1st Lt. Ahmed Mohammed Ali said.

Also, the bullet-riddled bodies of four unidentified men were found in separate neighborhoods in eastern Baghdad. All were blindfolded and had their hands and legs tied, police Maj. Mahir Hamad Mussa said.

Brig. Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf al-Kenani, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the plan to secure Baghdad with a perimeter of trenches and berms had been floated — and rejected.

DOJ_NMG_0063943

"Gen. Rashid Flayeh, the commander of the Iraqi police commandos, suggested this idea," al-Kenani said. "We made a mistake of talking about it to the media because this idea has been rejected by the ministry. … A plan like this is very difficult to be applied in a big city like Baghdad."

Saleh al-Mutlaq, head of the National Dialogue Front, the second-largest Sunni Arab party, said trying to protect Baghdad from insurgents by surrounding the city won't address the problem of violence from within.

"The booby-trapped cars don't come from outside Baghdad only," he said in a phone interview from the United Arab Emirates. "The gangs of death squads exist inside Baghdad."

Al-Mutlaq said money that would have been used to build a security perimeter should be directed to improving services and helping the poor.

"What is the meaning of digging trenches around Baghdad?" asked Hassan Rashid, 42, who runs a clothing shop in central Baghdad. "Are the Persians or Greeks going to invade Baghdad on their horses? Why don't they build hospitals and restore the local services instead of digging trenches?"

Ammar Ahmad, 31, who works in the Ministry of Trade, said the security problem in Baghdad could be solved only by political, not military, measures.

"Surrounding Baghdad with trenches is one of the funniest jokes I have ever heard," he said. "The danger coming from Baghdad is not from outside. The problem is between the politicians."

Blasts In Kirkuk Kill 27; Police Bureau Destroyed (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 17 -- A wave of seven suicide car bombs and explosions rocked the oil-rich city of Kirkuk on Sunday, killing at least 26 people and wounding 85 others, police said.

The restive northern city -- considered a likely flash point for sectarian violence because of its combustible mix of Kurds, Arabs and Turkmens -- declared a state of emergency and hastily put up dozens of checkpoints to thwart further attacks, police Maj. Jalal Mahmood Aras said.

The attacks were the most recent bloodshed in a bitter struggle between Arabs and Kurds to take control of Kirkuk, the country's third-largest city. Iraq's new constitution calls for a referendum to determine whether the Kirkuk region will become a part of the Kurdish north.

In the deadliest attack, a suicide truck bomb exploded about 10 a.m. outside the Kirkuk police department's bureau of major crimes, which is between the offices of the country's two major Kurdish parties. The blast killed 18 people and wounded 58, said Maj. Gen. Hazim al-Khazraji, the general inspector of the Kirkuk police.

"The explosion was so big that it flattened the whole bureau building to the ground," Khazraji said from the hospital, where he was being treated for injuries suffered during the attack.

Minutes later, two blasts targeting police patrols in southern and central Kirkuk killed one person and wounded 12 others, Khazraji said.

Another car bomb exploded in front of the house of Sheik Wassfy al-Assy, a tribal leader who has called for the release of Saddam Hussein. Two people were killed and five others wounded, police Col. Taha Salahaldeen said.

Two minutes later, a remote-controlled car bomb exploded near a security company in central Kirkuk, killing two people and wounding three. As U.S. forces gathered at the scene, a suicide bomber exploded his Toyota near the crowd, killing three people and wounding seven others, police Capt. Farhad Mahmood said.

The string of attacks in Kirkuk came as police in Baghdad reported the discovery of 24 bullet-riddled corpses that had been dumped in various parts of the capital. Armed men also assassinated Muhammad Shihab al-Dulaimi, an official with the Iraqi Accordance Front, the largest Sunni political bloc in parliament, while he was driving his car in the capital's Mansoor district, said Brig. Gen. Fadhil Abdul Muhsin of the Interior Ministry.

In Fallujah, a volatile city in the Sunni Arab insurgent stronghold of western Anbar province, two suicide car bombs exploded within minutes as the drivers tried to ram into a U.S. military base, killing at least three Iraqi police officers and wounding five others, police Capt. Ammar Yasser Halbousy said.

Al-Qaeda in Iraq asserted responsibility for the two attacks in a statement distributed at mosques in Fallujah.

U.S. forces sealed off the entrances to the city and imposed a curfew on some neighborhoods. Messages blasted on loudspeakers warned residents to remain in their homes until further notice.

Also on Sunday, tribal leaders in Anbar province denied news reports that local chieftains had gathered recently and agreed to join forces to fight al-Qaeda.

DOJ_NMG_0063944

"All the talk and rumors that you may hear about alliances or new initiatives to wipe out al-Qaeda by the tribes in Anbar is all pure nonsense," Sheik Faraj Khalid Essawi said. "We wish that we could build a strong tribal alliance against al-Qaeda to defeat them and reestablish security in our area and rebuild the dignity and the stature of the tribal sheiks. But frankly, we are unable to stand up to or to confront al-Qaeda because even the American army itself has not succeed in defeating it."

Also Sunday, the U.S. military announced that a sailor assigned to the 1st Marine Logistics Group died Saturday from combat injuries in Anbar province.

Most Tribes In Anbar Agree To Unite Against Insurgents (NYT)

By Khalid Al-Ansary And Ali Adeeb

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Sept. 17 — Nearly all the tribes from Iraq's volatile Sunni-dominated Anbar Province have agreed to join forces and fight Al Qaeda insurgents and other foreign-backed "terrorists," an influential tribal leader said Sunday. Iraqi government leaders encouraged the movement.

Twenty-five of about 31 tribes in Anbar, a vast, mostly desert region that stretches westward from Baghdad to the borders of Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, have united against insurgents and gangs that are "killing people for no reason," said the tribal leader, Sheik Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi.

"We held a meeting earlier and agreed to fight those who call themselves mujahadeen," Mr. Rishawi said in an interview. "We believe that there is a conspiracy against our Iraqi people. Those terrorists claimed that they are fighters working on liberating Iraq, but they turned out to be killers. Now all the people are fed up and have turned against them."

It is unclear how quickly or forcefully the tribal fighters will confront Al Qaeda and other insurgents, who mostly operate in and around the provincial capital, Ramadi, despite recurrent American military efforts to stop them. But for American and Iraqi officials, who have tried to persuade the Sunni Arab majority in Anbar to reject the insurgency and embrace Iraqi nationalism, Mr. Rishawi's comments are seen as an encouraging sign.

Word of the tribal agreement came on a day when coordinated suicide bombings rocked Kirkuk and Falluja, and graphic evidence of more sectarian killings surfaced in Baghdad.

In Kirkuk, an oil-rich city in the north bordering the autonomous Kurdish region, suicide bombers detonated four cars and one truck laden with explosives, killing more than two dozen people and wounding more than 100, Iraqi and American officials said. In Falluja, a Sunni-controlled city in Anbar, 30 miles west of Baghdad, five suicide car bombs exploded within 15 minutes, an American military official said, killing five people and wounding 23.

The police in Baghdad reported finding 36 bodies in several neighborhoods, an Interior Ministry official said. Eight were discovered in one area with gunshot wounds to the head and bearing marks of torture. But an American military spokesman said her office was aware of only 11 bodies found.

Also Sunday, the American military said a sailor with the First Marine Logistics Group died Saturday from wounds in fighting in Anbar Province.

Mr. Rishawi said the 25 tribes counted 30,000 young men armed with assault rifles who were willing to confront and kill the insurgents and criminal gangs that he blamed for damaging tribal life in Anbar, dividing members by religious sect and driving a wave of violent crime in Ramadi.

"We are in battle with the terrorists who kill Sunnis and Shiites, and we do not respect anyone between us who talks in a sectarian sense," said Mr. Rishawi, the leader of the Rishawi tribe, a subset of the Dulaimi tribe, the largest in Anbar. Half the Rishawi are Shiite Arabs and half are Sunni, he said.

Mr. Rishawi estimated that the insurgents had about 1,300 fighters, many of them foreigners, and are backed by other nations' intelligence services, though he declined to specify them.

On Sunday, he said the coalition of 25 tribes sent letters to the prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, and other top government officials to seek their support.

Sheik Fassal al-Guood, a prominent tribal leader from Ramadi, said Sheik Khalid al-Attiya, the deputy speaker of Parliament and a Shiite, met with the tribal leaders Thursday and gave them a "positive response."

In addition to the government's blessing, Mr. Rishawi said, the tribes also wanted weapons, equipment and tactical help from an Iraqi Army brigade. "The terrorists have different kinds of weapons while we have only AK-47's," Mr. Rishawi said. He predicted that with sufficient help, "their force will collapse in one month."

Ali Dabbagh, a government spokesman, said Mr. Maliki supported "any operations that try to resist terrorism and aims to maintain security in this dear and important part from the country."

DOJ_NMG_0063945

Government officials are weighing an official response to the tribes, Mr. Dabbagh said, but there has not been any agreement to supply them. “We are grateful to them for their desire to protect their cities,” he said, “and we are encouraging them.”

An American military official said tribes had fought Sunni insurgents in Anbar in the past but had never formed a united front. “This would be the first we’ve seen of tribes banding together,” said the official, who asked for anonymity because the subject was a delicate one.

Last month, a Marine intelligence report described Al Qaeda as an “integral part of the social fabric” of Anbar, and said the American military, with about 30,000 troops there, did not control vast reaches of the province, roughly the size of Louisiana.

In Kirkuk, Iraqi and American military officials said they could not immediately tell which groups were behind the suicide bomb attacks. Kirkuk has become a violent battleground between Iraqi Arabs — Shiite and Sunni — and Kurds who control Kirkuk’s police and government.

The deadliest of the Kirkuk bomb attacks, by a truck laden with explosives that blew up between the offices of two Kurdish political parties, killed at least 18 people and wounded 55, said Lt. Col. Urhan Abdullah of the Kirkuk police. Two minutes later, a car bomb, apparently intended for a private security firm, killed two people and wounded three others, said Maj. Farhad Mahmoud of the Kirkuk police.

A third suicide car bomb detonated near an Iraqi police checkpoint about 15 miles south of Kirkuk, the police said. A fourth car bomb exploded in front of the house of Sheik Wasfi al-Asi, who had recently publicly called on the government to release Saddam Hussein, who is currently being tried on genocide charges. The house was empty, the police said, but the bomb killed two people and wounded five others.

Death Squads Target The Iraqi Next Door (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

.

BAGHDAD — On that scorching afternoon last month, Ahmed Kamel was playing soccer with his two children outside his home here when three men drove up in a Chevy Caprice, pulled out their guns and dragged him away.

"You will see your father tomorrow behind the levee," one advised Kamel's 13-year-old, Mustafa, as the boy clung desperately to the escaping car.

Four hours later, the family later learned, police found Kamel's body where the kidnappers said he would be: a notorious dumping ground for the dead in northeast Baghdad. His crime? He had served in the Iraqi army for more than a decade and lived in a neighborhood where Shiite Muslim militias are pushing out Sunnis like him.

Evidence enough in the cold calculation of life and death in this capital of fear. A wrong turn, a detour, an untoward stare, a pointed finger, an anonymous denunciation, a nod of the head — these can, and do, lead regularly to death.

Sectarian death squads snatch victims off the street or from their cars, from their homes or their offices, from mosques or hospitals. The killers come at night or day. They come in uniforms or civilian garb.

"They say this is God's will, but this is not God's will," said Nisreen Yaseri, mourning the killing last week of her cousin Mohammed Jabbar, 26. "This is people's will. It's not about God."

Jabbar's mistake? He was a Shiite house painter who was riding in a taxi through a mostly Sunni west Baghdad neighborhood when gunmen at an improvised checkpoint stopped the cab last Monday. He and four co-workers, all Shiite, were taken away.

Their bullet-ridden corpses, trussed and showing signs of torture, were found Tuesday on the streets of the same Adil district where their taxi had been stopped.

Their loved ones next saw them in the morgue of Kadhimiya Hospital.

"Hamoodi," as Jabbar was known, had taken precautions: He had recently obtained a new identification card, omitting his tribal name — and thus blurring his sect, at least theoretically. "If they want me to be a Sunni, I'll be a Duleimi if they like!" Jabbar had told friends, referring to a major Sunni clan, his cousin recalled. "I'll be a Shia. Anything."

Others seek to erase their name altogether; newspapers here daily contain legal ads from men seeking to change their given name from Omar, a trademark Sunni name.

"But if they stop you, they ask you questions — what tribe do you come from? Who is your uncle? It is impossible to escape," lamented Omar Hirmizi, a shopkeeper in the largely Sunni Adhamiya district who had contemplated the ruse and decided it was no solution.

DOJ_NMG_0063946

Some feel a false sense of security. Such apparently was the case with Muatiz Qaisi, a Sunni who was a longtime grocery shop owner in the largely Shiite enclave of Sadr City. He had many Shiite friends and acquaintances and was well liked. Gunmen came for him one day last spring after the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, the event that sparked the current wave of violence.

He was thrown into the trunk of a sedan, but the kidnappers forgot to take his cellphone.

"I was taken by armed men, and I'm inside the trunk of their car," he told his relatives in a telephone call, according to a nephew.

Later that evening, the kidnappers used the cellphone to call the nephew, saying they were from the "central crime bureau," although the nephew had never heard of the agency, and doubted its existence.

"We have information that your uncle used to kill Shia during the time" of Saddam Hussein, the kidnappers told the nephew, according to the nephew's account.

"When did my uncle have time to kill those people?" the nephew responded. "My uncle had a shop for 15 years that used to be open from 7 in the morning until 8:30 at night."

The uncle's body turned up the next morning, along with four others. Bullets had disfigured all five faces in a similar pattern of mutilation.

In the anxious hours after a disappearance, frantic relatives of the missing embark on a now-ritualized hunt: to police stations, government ministries, to shady contacts who may know something.

When men in fatigues arrested Feraz Abbas Kubais, a Sunni electrician, at his home, his cousin placed a telephone call. The cousin knew someone close to the Badr Brigade, a Shiite, Iranian-trained militia that has ties to the Interior Ministry.

"I'll see what I can do," the cousin was told, a friend recalled. Two hours later, the Badr man called back. "I'm sorry, it's too late," the cousin was told. "You'll find him in the morgue."

Some bodies are never found, perhaps tossed in a clandestine grave, or decomposed beyond recognition, or dumped in the Tigris River or an irrigation canal from which they never emerge.

So many corpses were clogging the capital's main sewer plant last spring that authorities launched an inquiry, with U.S. technical assistance. Investigators discovered a macabre pattern: Manholes from as far as several miles away had been used as disposal sites, allowing the remains to course underground through broad concrete pipes along with the city's subterranean effluvia.

"It's possible some bodies were minced by the pumping system, and we never knew about them," said Ahmed Abdil Elah, assistant general manager of the city sewage system. "There is no trace of them."

The city battened down the manholes, and the ghoulish torrent ceased.

Other remains are identified only after they have been interred with the anonymous.

Such was the case with Muayid Rahman Batawi, 28, a Sunni living in Al Khatib neighborhood, where Shiites have been displacing Sunnis as the majority.

Batawi was afraid to leave the house on foot, though he occasionally ventured out in his car, his brother recalled. That was his misstep. He disappeared after stopping at a gas station July 3, his brother said. His corpse turned up six days later in the mostly Shiite Shula section of Baghdad.

Morgue officials would not release the body without a letter from the police. By the time the family secured the needed document, it was too late. Batawi's body had been taken with others of "unknown identity" to the Shiite burial grounds of Najaf, 90 miles south of the capital — not a place where Sunnis would opt to send their loved ones, especially in these days of mutual enmity.

"We immediately sent our mother, alone, to Najaf to get the body, since we thought it was safer for a woman," his brother recalled. "But they wouldn't give her the body."

Batawi's corpse remains entombed in the gray earth of Najaf.

At the Wadi al Salam (Valley of Peace) cemetery complex in Najaf last week, gravediggers were gouging holes for 63 more bodies, the latest no-name victims shipped down in a refrigerator truck from the capital.

"I feel a very deep sadness. Those killed are our brothers," said Mehdi Asadi, who oversees disposal at the so-called Cemetery of the Unidentified, a kind of potter's field.

Workers paint a number on a stone at each grave of the unknown, a reference should someone wish to claim the remains. Relatives who identify the dead from digital morgue photographs regularly seek to have the bodies disinterred and moved.

For the families left behind, there is little consolation in the discovery of a body, only the quelling of lingering doubt.

Although police found Kamel's body at the levee just hours after he was spirited away, his family members didn't discover his fate until last week because his body hadn't been identified. They finally recognized him in a morgue photograph.

Kamel's remains had been dispatched for burial as an "unknown" to the Shiite holy city of Karbala.

His Sunni family decided to leave him there in peace. Loved ones plan to make their graveside pilgrimage 40 days after his death, respecting a venerable Muslim custom that transcends Iraq's sectarian divide.

Violence Changes Fortunes Of Storied Baghdad Street (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD -- A silence has fallen upon Mutanabi Street.

In the buttery sunlight, faded billboards hang from old buildings. Iron gates seal entrances to bookstores and stationery shops. On this Friday, like the past 13 Fridays, the violence has taken its toll. There is not a customer around, only ghosts.

Perched on a red chair outside a closet-sized bookshop, the only one open, Naim al-Shatri is nearly in tears. Short, with thin gray hair and dark, brooding eyes, his voice is grim. This is normally his busiest day, but he hasn't had a single sale. A curfew is approaching.

Soon, his sobs break the stillness. "Is this Iraq?" he asked no one in particular, pointing at the gritty, trash-covered street as the scent of rotting paper and sewage mingled in the air.

It is a question many of the booksellers on Mutanabi Street are asking. Here, in the intellectual ground zero of Baghdad, they are the guardians of a literary tradition that has survived empire and colonialism, monarchy and dictatorship. In the heady days after the U.S.-led invasion, Mutanabi Street pulsed with the promise of freedom.

Now, in the fourth year of war, it is a shadow of its revered past. Many of the original booksellers have been forced to shut down. Others have been arrested, kidnapped or killed, or have fled Iraq. "We are walking with our coffins in our hands," said Mohammad al-Hayawi, the owner of the Renaissance book store, one of the street's oldest shops. "Nothing in Iraq is guaranteed anymore."

In a city known across the Arab world for its love affair with books, such emotions reflect the decline of a vibrant community. For the residents of Baghdad, Mutanabi Street is a link to their city's past glory, less a place than an extension of their souls.

"It is the lungs that I breathe with," said Zaien Ahmad al-Nakshabandi, another bookseller. "I'm choked now."

Three months ago, the government imposed the midday curfew on Islam's holiest day to stop attacks on mosques. That was a major setback for Mutanabi Street, named after a 10th-century poet. For most Iraqis, Friday is their only day off from work and a time to head to the book market.

In earlier days, a multiethnic stew of secondhand booksellers would lay their wares out and carefully swipe the dust off. Inside the famed Shahbandar cafe, intellectuals would gather to wax about politics and culture over cups of tar-black coffee and glasses of lemon tea, even during the most repressed of times.

Under former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein, Mutanabi Street was the nexus for resistance and freewheeling debates, where underground writers published illegal books that denounced Hussein.

"I wish you could see how it used to be on Fridays," Shatri spoke before he broke down in tears. "You could not even walk. The whole street was filled with books and people. Mutanabi Street is a part of how great Baghdad is."

Then, in a reverent tone, he uttered a proverb known across the Arab world: "Cairo writes. Beirut publishes. And Baghdad reads."A Futile Protest

Since 1963, Shatri has peddled books on Mutanabi Street, like a faithful friend, through military rule and political oppression, wars and embargo. Of all the eras he has watched ebb and flow, it is today's Iraq, with its violent nature, that most mocks the proud legacy of Mutanabi Street, he said.

"It means the death of education, the death of the history of the street, the death of the culture of Baghdad," Shatri said.

Two Fridays ago, Shatri took action. He and other members of his writers union gathered in front of his shop. They sipped breakfast tea. Then, at around 9:30 a.m., they poured kerosene over a pile of books and set them aflame.

"I cried when I was burning the books," Shatri said.

"It's a message to the government," said Nakshabandi, who also took part. "It's an S.O.S. Help us. An important part of Baghdad is dying. And it is on its last breath."

"But no one got the message. There was no action."'Better Under Saddam'

After the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, once-banned Western magazines were displayed openly. Religious books, especially those catering to Iraq's long-oppressed Shiite Muslims, flourished. Hayawi, a burly man with intense, honey-colored eyes, said what the booksellers earned on Fridays was double all the other days combined. Back then, he was optimistic about his future.

Now, the street is still a hive of activity on every other day. But poor security has altered its character, said many of its old booksellers. Before the invasion, they used to stay open till evening. No longer.

"By 2 p.m., we close our shops and run away fast," said Abdullah Gumar al-Ogaeli, 85, who opened a stationery shop in 1947. Thin and frail with a gray mustache, Ogaeli said he knew about 200 merchants in the months after the invasion. Now, he knows three. Some died of natural causes, others lost their lives to the violence.

Several booksellers, he said, were kidnapped by gunmen, but were later released. In Baghdad, the elite and the educated are often targets of criminals, who seek ransom, and of extremists, who seek to shred the city's cultural and intellectual fabric. "Many of our merchants have left Iraq and opened shops in Egypt, Syria and Jordan," said Ogaeli. "The business is weak now."

Today, a new generation of merchants sells paper and other supplies. Several original booksellers said the newcomers were looters who thrived during the chaos of the invasion. Now, they have tarnished the legacy of Mutanabi Street, they said. "At work, I am always honest," said Ogaeli, who calls Mutanabi Street "a holy name."

The sectarian violence is also blemishing a place where Shiite and Sunni Muslims have always worked side by side. "I am Shiite," Ogaeli said. "All my daughters are married to Sunnis. And my son is married to a Sunni woman. No one used to mention Sunni and Shiite. This is all new to us."

When he thinks of the few lasting friendships he has left on Mutanabi Street, "I feel sad. I feel uncomfortable," said Ogaeli, his voice disappearing in the noise of the street outside.

On a recent Saturday, Hayawi and his older brother Nabil, both Sunni Muslims, sat at a neatly kept desk inside their store. On an iron staircase, next to a sign that read "40 to 50% off on all books," hung a portrait of their late father.

They were once five brothers. Four, including Nabil, left Iraq after the February bombing of a Shiite holy shrine in Samarra, which triggered an avalanche of reprisal killings. Nabil, who now lives in Cairo, travels back and forth to Baghdad. They said the family business was suffering. It took the first half of this year, Mohammad lamented, to earn what they did in one month after the invasion.

"We asked the new government to improve the street, like providing services and cleaning it," said Mohammad, puffing a cigarette. "What happened was the opposite. The street was neglected."

"It was better under Saddam," said Nabil, who is balding and has a sharp nose and a white beard. "On Fridays, even when we had electricity problems, they didn't switch the electricity off. There was a system and order."

He has always resented the U.S. occupation. But now he outright blames the Americans for the violence that is tearing apart their lives. "The Americans are the reasons for it. This is the truth. You must hear it. Sectarian strife is like a fire. When the fire starts, it eats everything."

A year ago, the store imported 1,000 boxes of books from Jordan, Syria, Lebanon and Egypt, said Nabil. Then he pointed at some boxes in a corner of the store. "Now, in August, we imported 20 boxes."

After the invasion, the family paid 6,000 Iraqi dinars for 20 liters of gasoline to use for their generator. Now, it costs 30,000 dinars. The government gives them electricity for one hour a day, Mohammad said. Now, it's not certain if they can get to work or return home safely, Mohammad said. He knew 25 merchants on the street who were either arrested for unknown reasons, kidnapped or killed.

"Yesterday, we were expecting today will be better. But today is worse than yesterday," Mohammad said. "Now, if you ask me, 'Are you optimistic?' I would say, 'No'. I don't have a single ounce of optimism."A Dying Street

Across the street on a recent Wednesday, the century-old Shahbandar cafe, its walls covered with black-and-white photos of Baghdad, is empty, save for two men. They silently smoke their water pipes. It is 1:30 p.m.

"At this time, you could not find a place to sit down," said Fahim al-Khakshali, whose father owns this legendary cafe.

That was before gunmen a few months ago killed two professors after they left the cafe, Khakshali said. And before men entered the nearby Al-Sadim bookshop last August. As they exited, they left a suitcase by the door. It exploded, killing the owner's son.

Three months ago, strangers threatened Khakshali and ordered him to shut down the cafe. He refused. He says he doesn't know why the Shahbandar is a target, but he can guess. "Maybe it is because educated people come here," he said.

At 1:40 p.m., Nakshabandi, the bookseller, entered the cafe. Pear-shaped and bald with owlish spectacles, he reminisced about the artists and actors, the writers and poets who once frequented the cafe.

"During the Iran-Iraq war, when the bombs were falling on top of our heads, the cafe was filled with people," he said. "No one was afraid."

Today, those Iraqi writers, artists and intellectuals who are still here have no time to come to Mutanabi Street when daily life means waiting for five hours in a gas line or risking death in a traffic jam.

"Now, the load on your back is heavier than ever before," Nakshabandi said. He sadly remembers how elderly intellectuals would sit here and pass down stories to a younger generation, a tradition now extinct. On Fridays, Nakshabandi sometimes still sees Iraqis walk to the cafe. They stare at the shuttered doors, then walk back. "You feel they are broken, like they have lost someone they loved," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0063949

It's nearly 2:30 p.m. Khakshali has closed every door but one. He looked at his visitor and gently said: "You should leave now. It is getting dangerous for you."

From his red chair, Shatri watched Iraq's latest chapter unfold. He has clung to what little he has. His shop. His memories. His street. That helps explain why he is out here this Friday, outside the only shop open on a dying street.

Some days, his mind skips to the future. "Bring back the security, and I'll give you back the greatness of Mutanabi Street," he says to anyone who cares to ask.

But most days, his mind flips back to the past. And that's when he starts to cry.

"All the educated people have left," said Shatri, as he reached into his pocket to pull out a neatly folded, gray handkerchief.

"Iraq," he said, as he wiped his eyes, "it is the first country. It set the laws of Hammurabi." He was referring to the first ruler of Babylon, which was built in what is now modern-day Iraq. Hammurabi created the world's first legal codes.

"And now," he said, "there are no laws."

His voice faded. He wiped his eyes.

And silence fell upon Mutanabi Street again.

Is War In Iraq A Shield Against Attacks At Home? (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON

The war in Iraq constitutes a perimeter defense of the United States. Simply put, the US is fighting Al Qaeda and other extremists there, so it doesn't have to fight them on American soil.

That's the way President Bush sees the situation, anyway. In his speech to the nation on Sept. 11, he said that terrorists wouldn't quit fighting if the US pulled out of Iraq. Instead, they'd pursue their target, in essence pouring through a gap in US lines. "They will not leave us alone. They will follow us," said Mr. Bush. "The safety of America depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Is that really the case? Many critics of the administration think Iraq is not the foremost trench in a global war on terrorism. The enemy there, they say, is only loosely related to the one that struck at the American heartland five years ago.

Most insurgents in Iraq are natives, not wandering members of a terrorist international. It's unlikely they'd look for further ways to target the US if it left, say some terrorism experts.

"It's like in the Vietnam era, when they said we'd be fighting communists in San Diego if we pulled out," says John Mueller, a professor of national-security studies at Ohio State University in Columbus. "It's a preposterous argument."

The White House has long argued that the war in Iraq needs to be judged as part of a larger historical context. And one lesson of 9/11, Bush said in his speech on the fifth anniversary of the attacks, is that the US must confront threats before they reach its shores.

Saddam Hussein did not have anything to do with 9/11, Bush added in his speech. But after Al Qaeda successfully slammed airliners into US targets, Mr. Hussein's very existence posed a risk the US could no longer afford to take - hence the invasion that drove him from power.

Now "Al Qaeda and other extremists from across the world" have come to Iraq to fight the rise of democracy, said Bush. They've joined remnants of Hussein's regime to try to drive the US out. If America left, Osama bin Laden and his allies would gain a haven and new resources, according to the president. "We will not allow this to happen," said Bush. "America will stay in the fight."

Iraq today is indeed a strategically vital front in the war on terror, say some experts. Al Qaeda's own statements show it wants to establish a state-within-a-state there, to use as a haven and training base, according to James Phillips, a research fellow in Middle Eastern studies at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

Arab-dominated Al Qaeda would find it easier to operate in the Sunni Arab regions of Iraq than it does in Pakistan or Afghanistan, where Arab travelers stand out, writes Mr. Phillips in a recent analysis. "If the US abandons Iraq, it will become the next Afghanistan - a major source of terrorism, subversion, and warfare for decades to come," writes Phillips.

But other experts say this line of reasoning lumps together many kinds of enemies under the general category of "terrorist."

It's true that foreign fighters are in Iraq, such as the late Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. But they are a small minority of the insurgent force, say administration critics. Most Iraqi mujahideen are Sunnis who fear their interests will be ignored under Iraq's Shiite-dominated government. They are fighting for concrete, local political goals - not the destruction of America.

"If the Iraqi Sunni nationalists could take over their own territory, they would not put up with the few hundred foreign volunteers blowing things up, and would send them away or slit their throats," writes Juan Cole, professor of modern Middle East and South Asian history at the University of Michigan, in his blog "Informed Comment."

DOJ_NMG_0063950

Nor are Islamist terrorists just burning to break through the US lines in Iraq and race to America, say some. They are fighting a battle of ideas, not a battle for territory. Operations in Iraq allow Al Qaeda to appear to many sympathizers in the region as if it is struggling on behalf of an oppressed Muslim people.

"Getting us to fight in a Muslim country is something they want to do," says Jessica Stern, a terrorism expert at Harvard's John F. Kennedy School of Government in Cambridge, Mass.

Finally, critics say that even if the US did pull out of Iraq, the result might be more fighting there, not less. A Sunni-Shiite civil war would explode throughout the country, they say.

In general, the administration talks as if the US is fighting a monolithic terrorist army, with a command hierarchy and a final goal of replicating 9/11. In fact, Islamist terrorism is a loose amalgam of regional groups and local cells, with cross-cutting political goals, say some experts.

The reason there have not been more major attacks in the US may not be because terrorism's legions are pinned down in Iraq. "We've made headway on surveillance," says Dr. Stern. "It would be very hard for terrorists to come from another country and pull off another 9/11 today."

To Recapture A City (NSWK)

By Rod Nordland

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

Gen. George Casey, the senior U.S. military officer in Iraq, convenes a battlefield conference in a Baghdad street. Maps are flapping in the rotor wash from the helicopter that has just set him down in Adhamiya—a place that has been known for years as the worst neighborhood in Baghdad. American officers gather around the general, together with their U.S.-trained Iraqi counterparts. They all speak the same language now. "Some of the bad guys left and are trying to infiltrate again," says Brig. Gen. Imad Ismail, Iraq's top police commander, poking the map as he speaks. "We're patrolling 24/7 here, and here."

"You think you can hold this?" Casey asks. He looks Ismail in the eye.

"We're working day and night," the Iraqi says. "I haven't slept in 48 hours."

Adhamiya is on the front line of what may be America's best hope of victory in Iraq: the "clear, hold and build" strategy. Casey was confident enough of success to take a NEWSWEEK reporter along on a tour of the neighborhood. Only 10 days before his visit, U.S. and Iraqi forces began the job of retaking Adhamiya from the gunmen who ruled its streets. The place is quiet now, but there's no guarantee it will stay that way when the soldiers move on to other neighborhoods.

The "clear" phase began on Sept. 4, when troops cordoned off the entire area, home to 300,000 mostly Sunni Iraqis. Checkpoints kept Shiite death squads out and Sunni insurgents immobile while every house and building was searched for weapons and insurgents. As the operation went on, Iraqi forces took on "hold" duties while the Americans began the "build" phase, restoring public services after months if not years of neglect. Other Baghdad neighborhoods get six hours of electricity a day; Adhamiya was lucky to get one. For the past month, much of the area had none at all.

Casey's convoy of up-armored Humvees makes its way through a warren of alleyways. On a narrow street, the Americans have installed a generator to power the block until repair crews from the Ministry of Electricity can be persuaded to enter the neighborhood. "Thanks to God, things are safer now," an Iraqi engineer says. "There is a difference." A young Iraqi civilian is hanging out near the generator, and the general asks his opinion of the project.

"It's not enough," the Iraqi snaps.

"For what?" the general asks. "Your videogames and Game Boy?" Everyone laughs, but Casey understands what the young man is talking about. The machine can supply the 40 houses on this block with enough power for refrigerators, fans, lights, even Game Boys—but not for air conditioning. Temperatures here still climb to triple digits just about every day.

Casey moves on to a session of the district advisory council. A few local administrators are gathered around a huge, mostly empty conference table. After voicing eloquent thanks for America's help to Adhamiya, the council's chairman, Sheik Hassan Sabri, launches into a list of complaints—particularly allegations that the Shiite-dominated central government is deliberately neglecting the neighborhood. "Give them a chance," Casey replies. "They've only been [in power] for 100 days." The room is sweltering. There's no air conditioning, no fans, no electricity—not even cold drinks. "Is this so you can keep the meetings short?" Casey jokes.

"General, I have a personal request," says the sheik. "Two of my brothers were killed by the Mahdi Army militia. My other brother is in the airport [at the American detention center, Camp Cropper]. I am sure he is innocent. We are all against terrorism, but now I am feeding four families." With that, the man breaks down in tears. Casey promises to look into the case and give him an answer within 48 hours.

The team heads back toward the helicopters. Casey says he's pleased with the progress he's seeing. "It has worked," Casey says. "You see the reactions of the people on the streets." Even so, the general acknowledges, "there's a long way to go." He says Iraq will need 12 to 18 months more before it's ready to take charge of its own security.

Casey can still take comfort in small victories: he's able to help Sheik Hassan even sooner than promised. The detained brother's case is reviewed the very next day, and orders are issued to free him. If only all of Iraq's problems were so easy to solve.

Hell To Pay (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

The fifth anniversary of the 9/11 attacks was marked with the sadness and solemnity appropriate to the day, with President Bush sharing the rituals of public mourning at ground zero, at the farmer's field in Shanksville, Pa., and at the Pentagon. But it was clearly another troubled place that weighed on him, as he capped the commemoration with a prime-time TV address that drew on 9/11 emotions to appeal for greater public support on Iraq. "The safety of America," the president declared, "depends on the outcome of the battle in the streets of Baghdad."

Most Americans, though, don't seem to see it that way. Polls show that a majority believes that the country is, in fact, now less safe from terrorism because of the war in Iraq. At every opportunity, Bush is pressing his case that things in Iraq are headed in the right direction-and that the war must be won. But with elections just weeks away, some vulnerable lawmakers may have shuddered after opening the Washington Post last week to see a column by influential conservatives William Kristol and Rich Lowry calling for the president to send "substantially more" troops to Iraq to "improve the chances of winning a decisive battle at a decisive moment."

The mean streets of Iraq last week saw some 130 bodies, most bullet-riddled and bearing signs of torture, collected in just one 48-hour period, even as U.S. and Iraqi troops launched neighborhood-by-neighborhood security sweeps. Despite a "spike" in sectarian killings, U.S. military officials in Baghdad cited progress in security operations by 12,000 American and Iraqi soldiers in other areas of the capital. Iraqi officials also unveiled a security plan to encircle the capital with trenches and route all vehicle and pedestrian traffic through just 28 entry checkpoints.

But nothing in Iraq, it seems, is simple. Congress's Government Accountability Office last week reported that the Pentagon's own Defense Intelligence Agency concluded that sectarian tensions have been fueled in part by the same national elections that Washington has hailed as milestones. Even amid spiraling Sunni-Shiite violence, the GAO report said, U.S.-led coalition forces remained the main target of attacks, which increased nearly 60 percent during the first six months of this year over a year ago.

That came as no surprise to marines in Anbar province in western Iraq, an area the size of Louisiana. A Marine intelligence assessment, details of which were first disclosed in the Washington Post, describes a political and military vacuum in Anbar, where an undersized American force of some 30,000 troops is unable to impose security much beyond the perimeters of its bases. Whether or not the answer is more troops, many in the Pentagon were more struck by the report's stark candor than its conclusions. "It's like, 'yeah,'" a general who read the report told U.S. News, "'no kidding.'"

On the heels of the Post's story, the Pentagon called a press briefing with Gen. Richard Zilmer, commander of the Marines in Anbar, who provided less damage control than might have been expected. "I do concur with that assessment," he said. But Zilmer qualified his remarks by saying that the report was meant to give an unvarnished picture without dwelling on positive developments, which he attempted to describe. "We have come a long way in terms of the strength of the police and the [Iraqi] Army," he noted. However, "in both cases," he acknowledged, "we are not where we intended to be."

6 Bombs Leave 2 Dozen Dead In North Iraq (USAT/AP)

By Yahya Barzanji

USA Today, September 18, 2006

KIRKUK, Iraq — Six bombs killed 24 people and wounded 84 Sunday in Kirkuk, a northern oil city the Kurds want added to their self-ruled region.

There was no indication who was behind the bombings in Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad. The city is in the center of Iraq's vast northern oil fields and is claimed by the region's Arabs, Kurds and Turkmen.

The worst assault involved a suicide truck bomb. The explosion in the city center killed 18 and wounded 55, police Brig. Sarhat Qadir said. A few hours later, a car bomb was rammed by a suicide attacker into a joint U.S.-Iraqi army patrol in the south of the city. At least three bystanders died and eight people were injured. Two roadside bombs and two parked car bombs went off in other parts of the city, killing three civilians and wounding 21 people, including two policemen and four soldiers, police told the Associated Press.

Police said a gunman fired on civilians before the truck bomb exploded near the headquarters of the two main Kurdish political parties: the Kurdistan Democratic Party and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, headed by Massoud Barzani, who also is president of the autonomous Kurdistan region. Barzani angered many Iraqis on Sept. 1 when he ordered that the national flag be replaced by the Kurdish banner on all government buildings in the self-rule zone.

Kurds want to incorporate Kirkuk into their autonomous region, an idea that has been caught up in the heated debate over a proposal to transform Iraq into a federate state.

The idea of federalism is enshrined in the Iraqi constitution, which was adopted last fall. Before it can be implemented, the mechanics have to be legislated and approved in a national referendum.

The second-largest Sunni Arab party, the National Dialogue Front, rejected on Sunday proposed legislation to pave the way for a federal system, arguing that it would divide the country. The party's call for the bill to be dropped came a day before a planned informal meeting of leaders from all parties in the parliament to discuss the legislation, proposed last week by the main Shiite Muslim alliance.

Some Shiites want to create an autonomous region in the oil-rich south where they are dominant. The Kurds already have their region in the north. Sunni Arabs would be left with Iraq's western provinces, which are mostly desert.

“This country, which has been united in its entire history, cannot be divided into regions. It is a step toward dividing Iraq into mini-states,” Mishan al-Saadi, a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, told the Associated Press.

Blasts In Kirkuk Kill 23; 36 Die Elsewhere In Iraq (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

BAGHDAD — At least five bombings in Kirkuk killed 23 bystanders and wounded 76 others Sunday in what appeared to be coordinated attacks on police as well as Kurdish and Sunni Arab politicians in the oil-rich northern city, bringing the day's toll in Iraq to at least 59 dead.

There has been an upsurge in attacks during recent weeks in Kirkuk, where Kurds and Sunni Arabs have struggled for control of the city's oil wealth. Late Friday night, a bomb exploded in the Tiseen neighborhood, injuring three people. Sunday's attacks, however, were unusual in their scale and toll.

In the first and deadliest attack, a driver drove a truck loaded with concrete barriers toward the entrance of a police building near Kurdish political offices, shooting at guards as he steered with one hand. Witnesses said that as the guards returned fire, the attacker detonated the bomb, killing himself and 17 others.

Salim Sabbah, 44, threw himself on the ground behind a car as the explosives went off. When he opened his eyes, the normally tranquil street had been transformed into a gory mess of shattered concrete, metal and flesh. Charred bodies were strewn across the road as fires burned in several buildings.

"Why is this happening to us?" Sabbah asked, distraught. He blamed Sunni extremists and foreign fighters. But the diversity of targets during the day made it difficult to determine who might be behind the explosions.

At least four subsequent car bombs struck the city, including another suicide attack. The second blast of the day hit a Sunni sheik's office and the third a Sunni mosque. The other attacks targeted Iraqi and American security forces. Elsewhere in Iraq, 36 people were killed in assassinations and explosions or were found dead, authorities said.

Two civilians and three Iraqi police officers were killed in Fallouja in a series of attacks against American and Iraqi security forces involving mortars and several bombs. An American sailor was killed in the town, west of Baghdad, on Saturday, the U.S. military said in a statement.

A roadside bomb killed two security guards in Baqubah, and gunmen in Taji fired at a police patrol, killing two officers, according to Iraqi authorities.

In the capital, two bombs killed two people and injured 12 in separate attacks.

Mohammed Shihab Dulaimi, a Sunni politician and vocal critic of the election that brought the current Shiite Muslim-dominated government to power, was assassinated on a road in an upscale area along the Tigris River after he left the Palestine Hotel following a television interview.

Authorities also recovered the bodies of at least 24 people from Baghdad neighborhoods. Most of the victims were found shot, blindfolded and with their hands tied behind their backs. A headless corpse and another body were fished out of the Tigris River near the Sinak Bridge after they had drifted into some reeds along the riverbank.

Iraqi Police Find Large Munitions Cache (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0063953

AP, September 18, 2006

Iraqi police have uncovered a large munitions cache in southern Iraq, near the area where a roadside bomb killed two British soldiers earlier this month, a spokesman said Sunday.

Police received a tip that munitions were being stored in the town of Ad Dayr, near the southern city of Basra, Maj. Charlie Burbridge said.

A raid early Saturday uncovered dozens of artillery and mortar rounds, as well as 100 rounds of high explosive shells of various caliber, Burbridge said.

Roadside bombs are often constructed by using explosives recovered from old munitions.

On Sept. 4, two British soldiers were killed and a third was seriously wounded by a roadside bomb in Ad Dayr.

Although that device was completely destroyed in the explosion and it was unclear whether it had been made using this method, "we do know that munitions are being used to create" roadside bombs, Burbridge said.

The munitions cache was uncovered at a disused army barracks.

"Initially we thought they were from the armory. But it transpired that it was more than that," Burbridge said.

The Iraqi police acted without assistance from coalition forces, he added. They recovered the munitions and took them to Qurnah, about 35 miles north of Basra, where they are to be destroyed.

Around 7,200 British troops are based in Iraq, mostly in the south, and 117 have been killed since the 2003 invasion.

U.S. Holds AP Photographer In Iraq 5 Mos (AP-Y)

By Robert Tanner, Ap National Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

The U.S. military in Iraq has imprisoned an Associated Press photographer for five months, accusing him of being a security threat but never filing charges or permitting a public hearing.

Military officials said Bilal Hussein, an Iraqi citizen, was being held for "imperative reasons of security" under United Nations resolutions. AP executives said the news cooperative's review of Hussein's work did not find anything to indicate inappropriate contact with insurgents, and any evidence against him should be brought to the Iraqi criminal justice system.

Hussein, 35, is a native of Fallujah who began work for the AP in September 2004. He photographed events in Fallujah and Ramadi until he was detained on April 12 of this year.

"We want the rule of law to prevail. He either needs to be charged or released. Indefinite detention is not acceptable," said Tom Curley, AP's president and chief executive officer. "We've come to the conclusion that this is unacceptable under Iraqi law, or Geneva Conventions, or any military procedure."

Hussein is one of an estimated 14,000 people detained by the U.S. military worldwide — 13,000 of them in Iraq. They are held in limbo where few are ever charged with a specific crime or given a chance before any court or tribunal to argue for their freedom.

In Hussein's case, the military has not provided any concrete evidence to back up the vague allegations they have raised about him, Curley and other AP executives said.

The military said Hussein was captured with two insurgents, including Hamid Hamad Motib, an alleged leader of al-Qaida in Iraq. "He has close relationships with persons known to be responsible for kidnappings, smuggling, improvised explosive device (IED) attacks and other attacks on coalition forces," according to a May 7 e-mail from U.S. Army Maj. Gen. Jack Gardner, who oversees all coalition detainees in Iraq.

"The information available establishes that he has relationships with insurgents and is afforded access to insurgent activities outside the normal scope afforded to journalists conducting legitimate activities," Gardner wrote to AP International Editor John Daniszewski.

Hussein proclaims his innocence, according to his Iraqi lawyer, Badie Arief Izzat, and believes he has been unfairly targeted because his photos from Ramadi and Fallujah were deemed unwelcome by the coalition forces.

That Hussein was captured at the same time as insurgents doesn't make him one of them, said Kathleen Carroll, AP's executive editor.

"Journalists have always had relationships with people that others might find unsavory," she said. "We're not in this to choose sides, we're to report what's going on from all sides."

AP executives in New York and Baghdad have sought to persuade U.S. officials to provide additional information about allegations against Hussein and to have his case transferred to the Iraqi criminal justice system. The AP contacted military leaders in Iraq and the Pentagon, and later the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad.

DOJ_NMG_0063954

The AP has worked quietly until now, believing that would be the best approach. But with the U.S. military giving no indication it would change its stance, the news cooperative has decided to make public Hussein's imprisonment, hoping the spotlight will bring attention to his case and that of thousands of others now held in Iraq, Curley said.

One of Hussein's photos was part of a package of 20 photographs that won a Pulitzer Prize for breaking news photography last year. His contribution was an image of four insurgents in Fallujah firing a mortar and small arms during the U.S.-led offensive in the city in November 2004.

In what several AP editors described as a typical path for locally hired staff in the midst of a conflict, Hussein, a shopkeeper who sold cell phones and computers in Fallujah, was hired in the city as a general helper because of his local knowledge.

As the situation in Fallujah eroded in 2004, he expressed a desire to become a photographer. Hussein was given training and camera equipment and hired in September of that year as a freelancer, paid on a per-picture basis, according to Santiago Lyon, AP's director of photography. A month later, he was put on a monthly retainer.

During the U.S.-led offensive in Fallujah in November 2004, he stayed on after his family fled. "He had good access. He was able to photograph not only the results of the attacks on Fallujah, he was also able to photograph members of the insurgency on occasion," Lyon said. "That was very difficult to achieve at that time."

After fleeing later in the offensive, leaving his camera behind in the rush to escape, Hussein arrived in Baghdad, where the AP gave him a new camera. He then went to work in Ramadi which, like Fallujah, has been a center of insurgent violence.

In its own effort to determine whether Hussein had gotten too close the insurgency, the AP has reviewed his work record, interviewed senior photo editors who worked on his images and examined all 420 photographs in the news cooperative's archives that were taken by Hussein, Lyon said.

The military in Iraq has frequently detained journalists who arrive quickly at scenes of violence, accusing them of getting advance notice from insurgents, Lyon said. But "that's just good journalism. Getting to the event quickly is something that characterizes good journalism anywhere in the world. It does not indicate prior knowledge," he said.

Out of Hussein's body of work, only 37 photos show insurgents or people who could be insurgents, Lyon said. "The vast majority of the 420 images show the aftermath or the results of the conflict — blown up houses, wounded people, dead people, street scenes," he said.

Only four photos show the wreckage of still-burning U.S. military vehicles.

"Do we know absolutely everything about him, and what he did before he joined us? No. Are we satisfied that what he did since he joined us was appropriate for the level of work we expected from him? Yes," Lyon said. "When we reviewed the work he submitted to us, we found it appropriate to what we'd asked him to do."

The AP does not knowingly hire combatants or anyone who is part of a story, company executives said. But hiring competent local staff in combat areas is vital to the news service, because often only local people can pick their way around the streets with a reasonable degree of safety.

"We want people who are not part of a story. Sometimes it is a judgment call. If someone seems to be thuggish, or like a fighter, you certainly wouldn't hire them," Daniszewski said. After they are hired, their work is checked carefully for signs of bias.

Lyon said every image from local photographers is always "thoroughly checked and vetted" by experienced editors. "In every case where there have been images of insurgents, questions have been asked about circumstances under which the image was taken, and what the image shows," he said.

Executives said it's not uncommon for AP news people to be picked up by coalition forces and detained for hours, days or occasionally weeks, but never this long. Several hundred journalists in Iraq have been detained, some briefly and some for several weeks, according to Scott Horton, a New York-based lawyer hired by the AP to work on Hussein's case.

Horton also worked on behalf of an Iraqi cameraman employed by CBS, Abdul Ameer Younis Hussein, who was detained for one year before his case was sent to an Iraqi court on charges of insurgent activity. He was acquitted for lack of evidence.

AP officials emphasized the military has not provided the company concrete evidence of its claims against Bilal Hussein, or provided him a chance to offer a defense.

"He's a Sunni Arab from a tribe in that area. I'm sure he does know some nasty people. But is he a participant in the insurgency? I don't think that's been proven," Daniszewski said.

Information provided to the AP by the military to support the continued detention hasn't withstood scrutiny, when it could be checked, Daniszewski said.

For example, he said, the AP had been told that Hussein was involved with the kidnapping of two Arab journalists in Ramadi.

But those journalists, tracked down by the AP, said Hussein had helped them after they were released by their captors without money or a vehicle in a dangerous part of Ramadi. After a journalist acquaintance put them in touch with Hussein, the photographer picked them up, gave them shelter and helped get them out of town, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0063955

The journalists said they had never been contacted by multinational forces for their account.

Horton said the military has provided contradictory accounts of whether Hussein himself was a U.S. target last April or if he was caught up in a broader sweep.

The military said bomb-making materials were found in the apartment where Hussein was captured but it never detailed what those materials were. The military said he tested positive for traces of explosives. Horton said that was virtually guaranteed for anyone on the streets of Ramadi at that time.

Hussein has been a frequent target of conservative critics on the Internet, who raised questions about his images months before the military detained him. One blogger and author, Michelle Malkin, wrote about Hussein's detention on the day of his arrest, saying she'd been tipped by a military source.

Carroll said the role of journalists can be misconstrued and make them a target of critics. But that criticism is misplaced, she said.

"How can you know what a conflict is like if you're only with one side of the combatants?" she said. "Journalism doesn't work if we don't report and photograph all sides."

Compact For Iraq (WSJ)

By Robert M. Kimmitt

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Ministers from around the world will meet today to discuss the International Compact for Iraq, an Iraqi government-led initiative to transform Iraq's economy and achieve financial independence within five years. If the Iraqis map out a credible and promising plan, the international community will support it, investing in Iraq's future. Additional assistance will be expressly conditional on Iraq achieving the benchmarks it has set out.

A most important issue to be covered is how to develop Iraq's oil sector and immense oil reserves in a manner that benefits all the Iraqi people and serves as a unifying force across sectarian lines. Today's meetings, at the U.N. in New York and the annual meetings of the World Bank and IMF in Singapore, follow a successful Sept. 10 conference in Abu Dhabi. There, Iraqi leaders presented the outline of a hydrocarbon law now under review by their cabinet and being discussed between central and regional governments. In the compact, they will commit to pass a law developed through a consensus-building process that will share oil revenue among all Iraqi regions, enable development and delineate significant opportunities for private investors.

The compact will begin to reverse the stagnation and suppression resulting from years of a command economy. A premium will be placed on creating jobs to offer a lasting alternative to violence. Iraq will take steps to improve the business climate and promote private investment. Agricultural reforms will begin restoring that sector's vital influence on growth and employment and Iraq's former status as breadbasket of the Middle East.

In spite of the challenges faced by the Iraqi government, there are good reasons to believe this initiative will succeed. First, it's the economic component of a strategy that also includes the Iraqi government's security and political initiatives, including national reconciliation. Second, though inflation and budget execution are continuing concerns, the Iraqi economy has made consistent progress, with strong foreign-currency reserves, growing revenues, a recently enacted fuel-import liberalization law, and an investment law to be passed this month. Third, the Iraqis have already taken difficult steps, including reducing fuel subsidies, maintaining fiscal discipline and an extensive audit of the Central Bank, as part of their standby arrangement with the IMF. The Compact will add a strong oversight mechanism. All of this should further compel us to remain steadfast in our support of an initiative that deserves the urgent support of the entire international community.

Mr. Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary, is a presidential emissary for the Iraq compact.

A Christian View Of War (USAT)

By Oliver “Buzz” Thomas

USA Today, September 18, 2006

“Pray for our troops.”

Millions of signs and bumper stickers carry the message, and part of me likes it. But part of me keeps waiting for another bumper sticker — the one I still haven't seen. Whether Jesus would drive an SUV, I'm still not sure. Truth is he'd probably ride the bus. Or the subway. But if he had money for a car and didn't give it all away to the hookers and the homeless before he got to the used-car lot, I'm pretty sure that his bumper sticker would say “pray for our enemies.”

Before you write me off as a left-wing crackpot, consider what we know. During his famous Sermon on the Mount, Jesus said three things relevant to the subject of war:

·Blessed are the peacemakers.

·Turn the other cheek.

DOJ_NMG_0063956

·Pray for your enemies.

Here's something else we know. Three-quarters of the U.S. population consider themselves Christian. That translates into about 224 million Americans.

So why are so few of us taking the teachings of Jesus seriously when it comes to this latest war? Out here in the heartland, only a handful of churches are even talking about it.

The most plausible explanation is that we're scared. Some things, it seems, may trump religion. Fear is one of them. If Christians are afraid (and who could blame them after 9/11?), it's not surprising that they're listening to other voices besides Jesus' when it comes to the war in Iraq. So what should the three-fourths of Americans who identify themselves as "Christian" make of the Iraq war?

We could spend a lot of time debating whether St. Augustine's "Just War Theory" can be stretched to accommodate our invasion of Iraq, but at this late date it really doesn't matter. We invaded. And, if the Just War Theory means anything, it means that we shouldn't leave Iraq in a bigger mess than we found it. Americans of faith, it would seem, are obligated to do at least the following:

·Express concern for all suffering, including that of our enemies. That means more than paying lip service. As James, the brother of Jesus, said, it does not suffice to tell a hungry man "God bless you!" or "We will pray for you!" We must address his hunger. The same can be said for the additional food, health care, police and countless other things the Iraqi people need. And, though an immediate withdrawal would be precipitous, we must work diligently to respond to the Iraqis' desire that our troops leave as quickly as possible.

·Recommit ourselves to the fundamental principles of justice and human rights that have been a hallmark of our faith, as well as of our nation. That means no more secret prisons, no more secret trials and no more torture. America cannot resort to the worst practices of the Gulag (where citizens were declared "enemies of the state" and whisked away to Siberian work camps without the benefit of a fair trial or the assistance of counsel) and expect to be an accepted member of the world community, much less a leader of it.

·Repudiate the statements of any religious or political leader who suggests that America has a special claim on God. He may have a special claim on us, but we do not have a special claim on him. Our beloved nation is a civil state, not a religious one. There are no references to God in our Constitution. The only reference to religion — other than in the First Amendment — is found in Article VI, which proclaims that there will be no religious test for public office in the USA. The Founding Fathers gave us a secular state in which all religions are free to flourish or flounder on their own initiative without interference by the government. Those running around claiming we are "in the army of God" or slapping up copies of the Ten Commandments on government buildings threaten to turn us into the very sort of society we are fighting against in this new war.

·Force our elected officials to address the conditions that have given rise to global terrorism in the first place. Terrorism exists for a reason. One of those reasons is that our society has been far too unconcerned about the plight of Muslim people around the world. Why, for example, have we not instituted a mini-Marshall Plan for the millions of Palestinians who have often gone without adequate land, roads, hospitals and schools since the 1967 war with Israel? Corruption among Palestinian leaders has squandered billions in the past, but responsible partners on the ground can and must be found. Private foundations with a long history of engagement might be a good place to start.

We need not and should not repudiate our long-standing alliance with Israel to accomplish this. It's simply that our religious traditions teach us that to whom much is given, much is required. The irony, of course, is that it's in our best interest to relieve Palestinian suffering. True, some terrorist leaders come from affluent families and cite Western worldliness and decadence as their motivation for jihad, but the economic factor cannot be ignored. There is no better recruiting ground for the troops of terror than the maddening monotony and grinding poverty of a refugee camp.

In ancient times, particular gods were associated with particular nations. "Tribal deities," we call them. Today we know better. God is not the mascot of Republicans, Democrats or, for that matter, Americans. God transcends all national and political affiliations. His precinct is the universe.

America is in the deep woods. Never have we been less popular in the eyes of the world. Never have we faced so unsettling an enemy. But before we circle the wagons, Christians should get serious about following the teachings of the one by whose name we are called. He might just know the way out.

Violence Persists After Afghan Offensive (AP)

By Fisnik Abrashi

AP, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063957

NATO said Sunday that its two-week offensive in south Afghanistan was a "significant success" that had driven Taliban insurgents from their positions and opened the way for development. But violence was unabated, with suicide bombers killing three civilians and wounding six soldiers.

Militants also took control of a district in the west of the country after chasing away the police, an official said, in an apparent attempt to open a new front.

The developments came as the country is going through its bloodiest phase since the U.S.-led invasion ousted the hard-line Taliban from power in 2001.

Lt. Gen. David Richards, head of the 20,000-strong NATO-led force in Afghanistan, said the insurgents have been forced out of the volatile former Taliban heartland, and reconstruction and development efforts there would soon begin.

Alliance officials have said more than 500 militants were killed during the two-week operation, centered mainly in Panjwai, Pashmul and Zhari districts of southern Kandahar province.

Two foreign military convoys in different areas came under attack from suicide bombers, a method frequently used by insurgents in Iraq.

A 17-year-old youth carrying explosives jumped in front of a U.S. military convoy east of Kabul, killing a bystander, Afghan police said.

Earlier in the day, a suicide bomber plowed his explosive-laden vehicle into a Canadian military convoy west of Kandahar in southern Afghanistan, killing one civilian and wounding three soldiers, authorities said. Eight civilians also were wounded, said Zulmai Khan, a police official at the scene.

Most of Afghanistan's recent surge in violence has taken place in volatile southern provinces, where some 8,000 NATO forces took military control from the U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1. NATO commanders say they need another 2,500 troops plus greater air support to crush the Taliban threat more quickly.

Richards said the end of the southern offensive should open the way for much needed reconstruction and development in areas where the central government has been unable to reach.

But some 400 heavily armed Taliban crossed into the western Farah province, taking control of its Gulistan district after chasing away the police and burning the district headquarters and a local clinic, provincial police chief Gen. Sayed Aqa Saqib said. No casualties were reported.

"We are hoping the government will send more troops, because there are too many Taliban in the area," Saqib told The Associated Press over the phone.

Gen. Sher Mohammad Karimi, the Afghan army's chief of operations, acknowledged that the Taliban "were not all destroyed" and that some have simply slipped away into other areas. "They may reorganize but our troops will follow," Karimi said.

Richards ruled out immediately pursuing the Taliban holdouts.

"We will not dance to the Taliban's tune," Richards said. "They want to deflect us and take us away. We won't let them do that."

The end of one operation coincided with a start of a new U.S. and Afghan offensive in the east of the country.

Dubbed Operation Mountain Fury, the new offensive involves 7,000 U.S. and Afghan soldiers in the central and eastern provinces of Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktya and Logar, the military said. Fighter planes and helicopters will back the ground forces.

A separate U.S.-led operation called Big Northern Wind has been under way in Kunar province's Korangal Valley since late August.

The Taliban, al-Qaida and other Islamic extremist groups are known to operate in the east, especially in the area bordering Pakistan where the reach of the government is weak and militants find sanctuaries.

The renewed American push to defeat the Taliban-led insurgency comes nearly five years after the hard-line militia was ousted from power.

Separately, the mutilated body of an Afghan engineer who had worked for a local aid agency was found Sunday in Ghazni province, where he had been kidnapped earlier in the week by suspected Taliban militants, said Ali Ahmad Fakuri, the provincial governor's spokesman.

David Richards said the Taliban will not be allowed to regroup in the volatile southern Kandahar province. “This time, we're not leaving,” he said.

The end of the operation in the south coincided with the start of an offensive in the east, where 7,000 U.S. and Afghan troops moved against insurgents in Paktika, Khost, Ghazni, Paktia and Logar provinces. Also Sunday, about 400 Taliban fighters seized and burned the Gulistan district headquarters in Farah province, said Gen. Sayed Aqa Saqib, the provincial police chief.

Indicted Ugandan rebel leader surfaces

Ugandan rebel leader Joseph Kony, who is wanted by the International Criminal Court for alleged war crimes, surfaced at a camp in southern Sudan where rebels are assembling as part of a truce to end 19 years of conflict, a rebel official said. Martin Ojul, a negotiator with the rebel Lord's Resistance Army, said Kony showed up at Ri-Kwangba camp but didn't say when.

The peace deal with the Ugandan government calls for the rebels to gather at two camps in Sudan where they will be protected while a broader peace is negotiated. Kony is accused of civilian massacres and recruiting children to fight in a war that has killed tens of thousands of people and displaced nearly 2 million.

Palestinian unity talks stall over Israel

Talks between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas, the militant group that runs the government, have stalled over U.S. demands that a unity government recognize Israel, Palestinian officials said. Western nations insist Hamas recognize Israel and renounce violence as a condition for ending sanctions that have crippled the Palestinian economy. “What's the point of forming a government if this government is saying that it won't recognize agreements signed with Israel?” Palestinian lawmaker Saeb Erekat asked.

NATO Faces Growing Hurdle As Call For Troops Falls Short (WP)

By Molly Moore And John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

BRUSSELS -- More than a week after NATO's top leaders publicly demanded reinforcements for their embattled mission in southern Afghanistan, only one member of the 26-nation alliance has offered more troops, raising questions about NATO's largest military operation ever outside of Europe and the goal of expanding its global reach.

The plea for more soldiers and equipment to fight resurgent Taliban insurgents comes as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's forces are suffering the highest casualty rates of the nearly five-year-long conflict in Afghanistan, and as European governments are feeling stretched by the demands for troops there and in Iraq, Lebanon, the Balkans and in several African countries.

"NATO's credibility and future are at stake in Afghanistan," said Pierre Lellouche, president of the French delegation in NATO's parliamentary assembly. "They can't fail, otherwise NATO will lose its credibility."

"It's our most important mission, it's our first priority," NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said in an interview at his office here, describing the ongoing combat with the Taliban in southern Afghanistan as "the most intense battle NATO has fought in its history."

Some members of the alliance complain that others are not contributing enough soldiers or equipment, leaving a handful of countries shouldering most of the burden for a high-stakes mission that is becoming increasingly treacherous.

Although no members have criticized others by name, eight of the 26 countries are providing more than three-fourths of the alliance's 20,000 troops now in Afghanistan. Many members are providing fewer than 200 troops. Poland, for example, has contributed 10 soldiers to the mission, according to NATO officials, although it pledged last week to send about 1,000 more.

"It is important that the whole of NATO regards this as their responsibility," British Prime Minister Tony Blair said last week.

The United States has 21,000 soldiers in Afghanistan, more than any other NATO member, but only 1,300 are part of the alliance's operation; the remainder are under exclusive U.S. command. Britain is currently the largest contributor to NATO's force in Afghanistan, with 5,000 troops.

Other countries have complained that their forces are already overstretched.

"Many countries are in the Balkans, in Bosnia and Kosovo, and then in Iraq and Afghanistan and the African countries, and now the Middle East -- Lebanon is taking a lot of resources," said Kimmo Lahdevirta, director of security policy in the Foreign Ministry of Finland, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union but is not a member of NATO.

"There are not many countries with troops that are up to the tasks that they might face in Afghanistan, a high-intensity conflict with the Taliban," said Antonio Missiroli, chief policy analyst at the European Policy Center, a research organization based in Brussels. "If you look at the picture across Europe . . . we are reaching the limits of what we can do."

Scheffer, the NATO secretary general, said military commanders took the highly unusual step about a week ago of publicizing their shortfall of troops, aircraft and other equipment after 18 months of fruitless private pleas with alliance members.

"From time to time, public pressure is necessary," Scheffer said. "You need those headlines to convince nations to step up to the plate . . . I want to ask nations to do what they promised -- and we're not there yet."

Scheffer said he expected the situation in Afghanistan to dominate a gathering of NATO foreign ministers this week in New York, a defense ministers' meeting the following week and a NATO summit in Latvia in November.

NATO took command of Afghanistan's restive southern provinces from a U.S.-led coalition on Aug. 1.

The alliance had about 85 percent of the forces and equipment that field commanders said they needed to carry out their dual mission of maintaining security and carrying out reconstruction projects such as building roads, schools and medical clinics, according to NATO officials.

With Taliban fighters becoming bolder in their attacks, the alliance's newly arrived troops launched Operation Medusa this month, but without enough forces to conduct the operations as quickly or effectively as commanders had desired. On Sunday, suicide bombers attacked Canadian and U.S. troops in separate incidents, killing two civilians and wounding six soldiers, the Associated Press reported.

With about 10,000 troops -- half of NATO's entire Afghan force -- Operation Medusa is the biggest combat operation in Afghanistan since the U.S.-led invasion dislodged the Taliban government in late 2001.

Although NATO troops in recent days have ousted Taliban fighters from positions near a vital transportation route west of Kandahar, officials said the battle could have been fought more quickly and with less risk to NATO forces with more troops and equipment -- particularly airlift capacity.

NATO commanders are seeking about 2,500 additional troops, a squadron of about 18 attack helicopters and three C-130 transport planes.

Poland responded to NATO's admonitions last week, announcing it would offer a mechanized battalion of about 900 soldiers in addition to the 100 soldiers previously promised but not yet delivered.

But Poland does not want to send the troops until February and is balking at allowing them to be used where NATO says it needs them most -- in southern Afghanistan. Romania reportedly is considering offering about 200 soldiers in addition to the 560 it now has in Afghanistan, NATO officials said.

Scheffer and other NATO officials said field commanders' hands are tied as much by a shortage of troops as by individual countries' prohibitions on how their forces can be used. Germany, for example, has mandated that its 2,750 troops can be stationed only near the capital of Kabul and cannot be diverted to the more dangerous southern provinces.

Michael Williams, who heads the transatlantic program at London's Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies, said politicians who played down the dangers troops would face in Afghanistan were responsible for withering public support in some European countries for the mission.

Even in the Netherlands, where generals and politicians warned of the dangers of the mission in protracted public debates earlier this year, officials said they have been taken aback by the deteriorating security conditions and the risks their 2,000 soldiers are facing.

"The Dutch government always made clear that it was not going to be an easy ride," said Herman van Gelderen, the Dutch foreign ministry spokesman. Now, he said, it's not a question of fighting only the Taliban. "It seems the Taliban is working together with local Afghan criminals and drug lords, so it's a very serious situation. We always knew it would be hard, but it's even a bit more than we expected."

European public opinion on troop involvement in Afghanistan is also tainted by the war in Iraq, and a general frustration that President Bush's fight against terrorism has led to a deteriorating global security situation, according to public officials and analysts.

"The fight against terrorism united all the nations five years ago, but today, things are not going as well as what we had expected, therefore certain countries question the durability of their commitment," said Serge Vincon, who heads the foreign affairs, defense and armed forces committee of the French Senate.

But Robert Hunter, U.S. ambassador to NATO during the Clinton administration and a senior adviser at the Rand Corp., said, "Some Europeans are hiding behind the Iraq issue and the public's unhappiness with the U.S. in order to shirk their own responsibilities in Afghanistan."

Troops In Afghan District Find Anger At Lax Government (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

ANDAR DISTRICT, Afghanistan, Sept. 17 — American and Afghan forces moved Sunday into this district, one of the areas most troubled by insurgents in recent months, as part of a broader operation to reassert control in Ghazni, a strategically important province near the capital, Kabul. But while they encountered little insurgent activity, they did face anger and frustration from the local population.

The new operation, involving about 10,000 troops, began just as NATO forces declared that they had successfully taken control of Panjwai District, southeast of here near the city of Kandahar, after more than two weeks of heavy fighting.

"Afghan, ISAF and coalition forces have successfully cleared the Panjwai area, forcing insurgent forces to abandon their positions," the NATO commander in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, said in a statement released by the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force.

The extended battle and heavy bombardment in the district left an estimated 500 Taliban fighters dead, and five dead and many more wounded among NATO troops, including members of a unit hit by fire from allies. The remnants of the insurgents are thought to have escaped west into Helmand, a neighboring province, one senior military official said.

Since May, Taliban forces had tried to hold Panjwai, a rich suburb of vineyards and orchards, and make it a permanent base from which to expand their presence in the south and even threaten Kandahar, the military official said.

At the same time, more insurgents swarmed into Ghazni Province in a natural movement away from the border regions with Pakistan, where American and Afghan forces were concentrating much of their military might over recent months, into the more remote highlands.

Local residents in Andar said the Taliban were "everywhere around," but American and Afghan Army forces have so far not encountered much resistance, after an initial fight south of Ghazni that left 36 Taliban dead on Sept. 12.

They entered Andar without a shot fired and held a meeting with elders and townspeople on Sunday to announce that they had come to bring stability and security.

They found a population anxious about security and resentful of the government and the police, whom they accused of preying on the people.

"Please bring security and stability," pleaded one man, Daulat Khan, interrupting the opening speech of the provincial governor, Hajji Sher Alam. He said the police mistreated people, accusing them first of being with a rogue commander, and then of belonging to the Taliban.

Another man said: "Four months ago we had order and justice here. And now I don't know what is the cause, but it has gone."

As soon as he arrived for the town meeting, Muhammad Jan, 35, a mason, said: "There are a lot of Taliban. They are causing a lot of problems. If they come here and fight, it will affect us all."

A white-bearded man, glowering at the governor, shouted, "The governor has done nothing for us!" Another man thundered that the police chief was a bad man and that his police force treated the people badly and profaned their homes.

"The schools have no teachers, no tents, the children sit under the sun, the teachers don't get paid," said Sayed Muhammad, a shopkeeper. "Corruption exists in this district. The members of Parliament promised us a lot, but they did not fulfill even 2 percent of their promises."

"In some districts, the people are receiving a lot of assistance because they know the governor. Their roads are being built and repaired, and here we don't have anything," Mr. Muhammad said to loud applause. The district, badly hit by flooding several months ago, received none of the emergency flood aid that came to the province, he added.

The governor replied, "If anyone harms or mistreats you, come and tell us."

Soldiers of the United States Army 10th Mountain Division listened impassively, even as the gathering of some 200 Afghan men rumbled loudly with discontent.

Bringing security is only part of what the people in these remote, insurgent-ridden districts need and want, said Maj. Gen. Ben Freakley, the operational commander for American and NATO forces in Afghanistan. He said there was an equal need for good governance and development, something the government and the donors, rather than the military, had to achieve.

"If we have to fight, we will fight," he said after the meeting. "We could fight insurgents here for 10 years, but we don't want to."

"The biggest thing is changing the environment," he continued. "Where we have a decent district chief and district police chief, there is optimism, potential and such capability." But, he said, "Andar has been neglected by all of us."

That changed this week with the arrival of an American and an Afghan National Army brigade that will stay in the region until a new police force can be trained and deployed. They found only 70 police officers still working, hunkered down in the police station, frequently under attack, and with many deserting as the Taliban threatened them and their families, extending their warnings even to their cousins.

The neglect was such that many people had sided with the Taliban, since the alternative was a venal, scared police force, said the newly appointed district chief, Hajji Abdul Rahim. "Some of the people are very hungry for government," he said. "We have to work with the people."

Violence continued with two suicide bombers striking Sunday, killing a Pakistani laborer in Kandahar and wounded eight civilians. Another suicide bomber threw himself at an American convoy on the east side of Kabul, wounding two American engineers and two of their Afghan colleagues.

DOJ:

Margolis Is The DOJ's Ultimate 'Inside Man' (LEGALT)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 18, 2006

It's never easy to indict a senator, but this time federal prosecutors thought they had the goods.

In the summer of 2004 prosecutors in the U.S. Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia had assembled evidence they believed would lead to a criminal indictment against Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.). The charge: that Shelby had leaked classified information to reporters about messages intercepted by the National Security Agency on the eve of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The prosecutors had been called in to investigate a June 2002 report by CNN, which, citing two congressional sources, stated that on Sept. 10, 2001, the NSA had intercepted two Arabic messages that said, "the match is about to begin" and "tomorrow is zero hour." The messages weren't translated, however, until Sept. 12. The anonymously sourced report came almost immediately after intelligence officials had presented the information to the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, of which Shelby was a member. Armed with information gleaned from FBI interviews with reporters and congressional staff, prosecutors had gone so far as to type up a draft of the indictment.

What was needed to bring the charges, according to two sources with direct knowledge of the investigation, was grand jury testimony by the reporters who spoke with Shelby after the hearing. In order to subpoena the journalists, prosecutors needed approval from David Margolis, an assistant deputy attorney general and the Justice Department's most powerful career lawyer.

But at a meeting in a fourth-floor conference room at Justice Department headquarters along Constitution Avenue Northwest, Margolis turned down the request. The decision effectively killed the investigation. "Without the subpoenas you just couldn't do a grand jury," says one of the sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, citing the sensitivity of internal DOJ deliberations.

In theory the prosecutors could have appealed Margolis' decision to then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. But that would have meant taking on Margolis, one of the Justice Department's most respected officials, a lawyer with a sterling reputation earned over 42 years of service at the department. "Taking him on is a losing battle," says the source. "The guy is Yoda. Nobody fucks with the guy."

In many ways, comparing the 66-year-old Margolis to the quirky and ancient Jedi Master is apt. Margolis is widely described as the "institutional knowledge" of the Justice Department. A notorious straight shooter known more for his love of country music and outlaw garb than his politics, he's managed to navigate the shifting sands of Washington to retain a powerful voice under Attorney Generals Janet Reno, John Ashcroft, and now Alberto Gonzales. Though Margolis is technically outranked by more than a dozen political appointees at DOJ headquarters and all 94 U.S. attorneys scattered throughout the country, his influence on the department extends far beyond his title, say both current and former Justice officials.

Margolis' bulletproof reputation and lack of partisan stripes also mean that the presidentially appointed attorneys general and deputy attorneys general at the top often turn to Margolis when Justice Department investigations venture into the swirl of national politics. From the investigation after former White House lawyer Vincent Foster's suicide to the ethics of Kenneth Starr's Lewinsky probe to the leak of Valerie Plame's identity, Margolis has played a major role in the DOJ's attempts to show that its law enforcement actions aren't motivated by political concerns.

That was certainly the case in the Shelby investigation, where a Republican-led Justice Department was probing one of the closest congressional allies of a Republican president. "You can see why in a situation like that it's better to have a Dave Margolis supervising those [investigations] than a Larry Thompson," says Thompson, Bush's deputy attorney general at the time of the Shelby probe and now general counsel at PepsiCo.

Margolis' office is littered with photographs of him with Democratic and Republican politicians alike. FBI Director Robert Mueller once joked that as elections approach, Margolis shuffles the pictures based on who he thinks will win. Like President George W. Bush, he bestows nicknames on favored colleagues. Janet Reno was the "Old Lady." Former Deputy Attorney General Jamie Gorelick was the "Bionic Babe." The studious-looking Chuck Rosenberg, now the U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia, was "Tex," for a previous stint in Texas.

Margolis, who last week was given a lifetime achievement award by Gonzales, declined to comment on the Shelby probe. But his influence goes far beyond merely making recommendations on media subpoenas and overseeing the investigations that stir up Washington's chattering classes. "I have an eclectic portfolio," he says.

And a lengthy one. Margolis serves as the Justice Department's chief disciplinarian of its federal prosecutors, helps choose U.S. attorneys and U.S. marshals, vets top FBI officials, advises prosecutors on when to recuse themselves from investigations, authorizes travel requests for the director of the FBI and the administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and approves requests by political appointees to attend campaign events. In addition, on the rare occasion when a nominee for a presidential appointment is part of a criminal investigation, it falls to Margolis to decide how much of the investigation's information should be shared with the White House and the Senate.

MR. CLEAN

Margolis cut his teeth as an organized-crime prosecutor, and he often uses mob analogies in talking about his career at the Justice Department. When asked by an incoming attorney general what his job duties entailed, Margolis responded: "I'm the department's cleaner. I clean up messes."

The analogy calls to mind the character of Winston Wolfe, played by Harvey Keitel in the 1994 film "Pulp Fiction." In the movie, Wolfe is called in by mob honchos to dispose of the evidence after two foot soldiers accidentally kill a murder witness in the back of their car. But Stephen Trott, who served as Margolis' boss in the Criminal Division during the Reagan administration, sees Margolis' role slightly differently.

"Margolis is the guy who comes in and makes sure the brains don't get splattered all over the car," says Trott, who's now a senior judge on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit in Boise, Idaho. "He keeps people out of those situations."

One example of his efforts to head off trouble came on July 21, 1993. On that day, Margolis, who had recently been promoted from the Criminal Division to become assistant deputy attorney general, took a call from his boss, then-Deputy Attorney General Philip Heymann. "I want you to go over to the White House with [federal prosecutor] Roger Adams. Vince Foster is dead. There's an investigation of it," Margolis recalled Heymann as saying, in testimony before the Senate Whitewater Committee in 1995.

The death of Foster, a deputy counsel in the Clinton White House, had come at a sensitive time in the Whitewater investigation. Republicans in Congress had long suspected the White House was withholding embarrassing information about the Clintons' involvement with a failed Arkansas savings and loan. Immediately after Foster's death the White House had promised the Justice Department that law enforcement officials would be able to review Foster's files in order to look for a suicide note or evidence of extortion.

But when Margolis arrived, then-White House counsel Bernard Nussbaum changed his mind. Instead of allowing Margolis and others from the DOJ to search Foster's files and briefcase, Nussbaum would review them for any relevant material to be turned over while Margolis and other investigators sat across from him in Foster's office. Margolis objected to the change in plans, but after consulting with Heymann, he unhappily acceded. "I explained to Mr. Nussbaum that to do it his way would be a big mistake," Margolis later testified. "I said, 'It was your mistake . . . but it is a big mistake.' "

Margolis' prediction would turn out to be prescient. Nussbaum reviewed the files but didn't find evidence of a suicide note. Almost a week later, however, White House officials would discover a torn note in Foster's briefcase that attested to his unhappiness with life under the Washington microscope. The belated discovery of the note, and Nussbaum's efforts to shield Foster's briefcase and files from Margolis and other investigators, would stoke Republican suspicions that the White House had something to hide. Margolis' own testimony about the episode before the Senate Whitewater Committee in 1995 would only contribute to that perception.

The Foster episode wasn't the only time Margolis tried to head off trouble for his political bosses. In September 1994 the White House contacted the FBI in order to run a name-check on Arthur Coia, the head of the Laborer's International Union, who was being considered for an appointment to a presidential advisory council. But there was a problem. As was later spelled out in a 1997 report by the House Judiciary Committee, the Criminal Division had concerns that Coia was linked to the Patriarca family, a New England organized-crime group. Margolis, according to the report, would repeatedly contact the White House over the next few months to ward off Coia's nomination. Coia would remain close to the White House, but, according to news reports, would subsequently be forced to resign from his post at the union as part of a plea deal with the Justice Department.

Today, Margolis says he has little recollection of the Coia incident. "One of the reasons I'm here is to handle controversial stuff," he says. "And I do and I have, and I thrive on it."

George Terwilliger III, who served as deputy attorney general under President George H.W. Bush, says the reason that Margolis has been so valuable is that he "sees the trainwreck coming." Adds Terwilliger, "He sees the people who could potentially be problems."

HELLBENT AND WHISKEY-BOUND

DOJ_NMG_0063963

Margolis was reared in Hartford, Conn. The son of a school administrator and a teacher, he graduated from Harvard Law School in 1964 and was hired as an assistant U.S. attorney in Hartford the following year. He distinguished himself in 1969, when he personally persuaded an armed fugitive wanted for two bank robberies to surrender to him during a meeting at a deserted baseball field. At the time, Margolis was given to long sideburns and Edwardian suits, and, according to a report in the Hartford Courant, left a marked impression on a policeman who observed the negotiations. "When I first saw the kid sometime back, I thought he looked like a draft-card burner," the policeman was quoted as saying. "But now I know the kid's got moxie."

From Hartford, Margolis joined the Justice Department's Organized Crime Strike Force, working labor-racketeering and other Mafia cases during stints in Hartford, Cleveland, and Brooklyn.

In 1976 he would come to Washington, where future Attorney General Richard Thornburgh, then head of the DOJ's Criminal Division, appointed Margolis as a deputy chief of the organized crime section. In 1979 he took over as section chief, a job he'd hold for the next 11 years. By that time, Margolis had earned a reputation not only as a hard-charging prosecutor but something of a long-haired iconoclast amid the DOJ's button-down culture. He kept an oversize portrait of Elvis Presley on the wall of his office and a jailhouse photo of Hank Williams Sr. naked to the waist. The dapper suits had disappeared and were replaced by T-shirts with slogans like "Hellbent and whiskey-bound."

"He would come to work in blue jeans with a giant leather belt and silver Elvis Presley belt buckle," says Paul Coffey, Margolis' former deputy. "As chief of the organized crime section, he had this huge, huge office on the second floor. As you walked in you saw the pictures and the painting, and Dave's desk was on the right. What you immediately noticed were four or five half-full coffee cups. In each cup would be the carcass of a cigarette; on the floor would be thousands of remains of popcorn, because [he] ate popcorn all day.

"We'd let a defense attorney come in from time to time and [they] would all come in looking like a million bucks and smelling like a million bucks, and you could tell they were shocked," Coffey continues. "You could hear their feet crunching the popcorn kernels. They'd walk across, they'd see the pictures, the popcorn-strewn carpet, the cups of coffee all over the place, and a guy dressed in T-shirt and jeans."

During the Reagan years, Margolis also got a taste of the glare of the media. As head of the organized crime section, Margolis supervised the long-running investigation of Teamsters Union President Jackie Presser. Presser had been a prominent supporter of Ronald Reagan's presidential campaigns, but also led a double life as both FBI informant and mob-connected union boss. In 1985, when prosecutors were set to indict Presser on labor-law violations, Margolis turned down the prosecution — a move that quickly drew attacks from those who saw the decision as politically motivated. "I've been accused of being a handmaiden," Margolis says.

Under criticism, Margolis was later forced to reveal to the media that a group of FBI agents had said they had authorized Presser's conduct. Later, the Justice Department would conclude that the FBI agents had been lying. Presser was eventually indicted, and he died while awaiting trial in 1989.

Despite the controversy, Margolis emerged with his reputation intact. "David was like a beacon pointing true north on the case," says Trott, his former boss in the Criminal Division from 1983 to 1986.

THE GODFATHER

In 1990, Margolis left the organized crime section to become a deputy assistant attorney general in the Criminal Division. After Bill Clinton was elected, in 1993, he was promoted again, this time to the deputy attorney general's office. He no longer oversaw organized-crime cases but took on a range of new duties, including that of supervising the DOJ's Office of Professional Responsibility. In effect, Margolis became the Justice Department's internal affairs chief, the guy you didn't want showing up at your office unannounced. He was a key player in the decision to prosecute Michael Abbell, a former federal prosecutor turned lawyer for the Cali cartel. More recently, he was involved in the investigation of Richard Convertino, the Detroit federal prosecutor now facing charges for his role in a botched terrorism prosecution.

During the Clinton administration he was also asked to examine certain questions about the propriety of some of Kenneth Starr's actions in the independent counsel investigation, according to Eric Holder Jr., one of Clinton's former deputy attorneys general. But little has been publicly revealed about Margolis' role in the matter, and Margolis calls it an "internal" one he won't discuss.

Clinton DOJ officials expected Margolis to be demoted after Bush's election victory in 2000. But Thompson, who served as Bush's first deputy attorney general and had known Margolis since Thompson's days as a U.S. attorney in Atlanta in the 1980s, kept him on. "There wasn't any question as to whether I was going to keep him," Thompson says. "You don't make decisions; you let Dave make decisions."

That may be an exaggeration, but Margolis' power doesn't appear to have waned even late in his seventh decade of life. Margolis was influential in the selection of Mueller as FBI director, in 2001, says Michael Bromwich, a friend of Margolis' who served as the DOJ's inspector general in the 1990s. He's also influenced a number of U.S. attorney appointments in the current administration, including that of Rosenberg in Virginia. "His opinion is weighed heavily," says Kenneth Wainstein, the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia who previously served as the director of the DOJ's Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys.

As the Shelby case demonstrates, his role hasn't been limited to personnel. Thompson was succeeded by James Comey, and when Comey resigned, in the summer of 2005, he handed supervisory authority of the department's most politically sensitive case — the leak investigation involving CIA agent Valerie Plame — to Margolis. After Paul McNulty succeeded Comey, he made a point of keeping Margolis in that role.

Those who've worked with Margolis attribute his sustained influence at the Justice Department to predictable traits — namely, good judgment and intelligence. But his remarkable devotion to the culture of the department itself is no doubt a factor in his success. In 1995, Margolis suffered a massive heart attack in his office. Then-Deputy Attorney General Gorelick recalls hearing the crack of Margolis' head hitting a coffee table from her desk several doors away. Margolis was rushed to the hospital for quadruple-bypass surgery. Five weeks later, he was back at work. Friends say the heart attack has mellowed Margolis. He's quit smoking, gained weight, and given up wearing T-shirts in the office. He has no plans to retire, and still puts in nearly a full day of work on Saturdays.

Over the years he could have no doubt traded the relative anonymity and government salary of his Justice Department post for the gilt halls of Washington's white-shoe law firms or a slot on the judiciary. But he hasn't. "There's so many games played in Washington with people angling for things," says Trott. "People are trying to become judges, senators, presidents. That doesn't happen with David. In Washington you need somebody like that."

"I stay because this is what I do," Margolis says.

"In 'The Godfather,' Hyman Roth says to Michael Corleone, 'This is the business I've chosen,' " he says. "This is the business I've chosen."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Sentencings Await (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, September 18, 2006

Highest-profile case will be ex-CEO Jeff Skilling's

Open season for the Enron era's criminal sentencings is about to get into full swing.

A few former executives-turned-felons have already received their punishments for crimes they committed within the disgraced energy company's walls, and two have lived in a prison cell.

But this month launches a string of sentencings for those who helped prosecutors as well as those who fought them and lost since Enron cratered nearly five years ago.

The most high-profile sentencing comes next month for former Enron CEO Jeff Skilling, barring any last-minute delays. Andrew Fastow, the former finance chief who is among the most notorious felons to emerge from the Enron rubble, also is expected to garner attention when he is sentenced later this month.

A jury convicted Skilling in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors in the government's foremost case to emerge from its sprawling Enron investigation. He aims to appeal.

Skilling's potential punishment of 20 to 30 years in prison is comparable to the 25 years awaiting WorldCom founder Bernard Ebbers, who was convicted last year of engineering an $11 billion fraud that undercut the company.

Another Enron defendant convicted by a jury this year, former broadband unit finance chief Kevin Howard, is slated to be sentenced a week after Skilling. He faces a maximum of 30 years, but likely will serve half that or less, for one count of conspiracy, three counts of wire fraud and a count of falsifying books and records.

And a slew of Skilling's former underlings whose cooperation helped prosecutors win his conviction face punishments for their own crimes, ranging from probation to 15 years behind bars, depending on the offense and whether prosecutors recommend leniency.

Some prison terms are already determined. Fastow, who orchestrated schemes to manipulate the company's books while skimming millions of dollars for himself on the side, agreed to serve the maximum 10-year term when he pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy. And Richard Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, agreed to serve seven years when he pleaded guilty to securities fraud in December. Prosecutors can recommend he serve only five years if pleased with his help.

However, unlike Fastow and others, Causey didn't testify against Skilling and former Enron Chairman Ken Lay — who died July 5. Causey was bound for trial alongside them, but cut a plea deal just weeks before the jury was seated.

The rest are expected to try to avoid incarceration.

"That's just the reality of it," said Philip Hilder, a former federal prosecutor in Houston who represents several Enron defendants and witnesses. "There are cooperators who may get a reduced sentence, and it's up to the defense to hold their feet to the fire. That's the way the system works."

Defense attorneys for Skilling and Lay have repeatedly accused cooperators of lying for the government in hopes of getting lenient sentences after cutting deals to avoid expensive and risky prosecution.

"Their real crimes were committing perjury at trial, and for that they should be sentenced accordingly," lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli said.

The government has already filed notice it will seek leniency for some cooperators, and more may come. Hilder said such requests often influence judges, particularly those who would otherwise adhere to advisory federal sentencing guidelines.

"In many courts, it holds great weight because the judge has the ability, and the cover, if you will, to go below the guidelines and give the defendant anything ranging from the guideline to probation," Hilder said.

Those include David Delainey, a Canadian citizen and former head of Enron's retail energy arm, who will be sentenced Monday for insider trading. Delainey pleaded guilty in 2003 and was among the government's more significant witnesses against Skilling, saying the ex-CEO pressured management to fudge Enron's reported finances and hide losses. He faces anywhere from probation to 10 years behind bars.

In a court filing late last month, Delainey asked to serve probation or be confined at his home in Canada. In the filing, his lawyers described Delainey's help as "exemplary," and that he gave "powerful, credible testimony that has helped to expose one of the greatest frauds ever committed in this country."

Fastow comes next on Sept. 26, followed by eight more through the end of the year, including Skilling and Causey. Specific sentencing dates have not been set for three former California Enron traders.

Two cooperators who never participated in any court proceedings beyond their own plea hearings have already been sentenced. In June, Larry Lawyer, a former midlevel broadband unit executive, received probation for two years for failing to report kickbacks as income. And on Friday Timothy DeSpain, a former assistant treasurer, was sentenced to probation for four years for helping obfuscate Enron's financial health to credit-rating agencies.

The first Enron guilty plea came in 2002, and Causey's was the last.

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches at the Washington University School of Law, said it's not unusual for defendants to wait years between pleading guilty and receiving their punishment, because the more a defendant cooperates, the more information judges have to consider in sentencing. Most sentencings were put off until after the Lay-Skilling trial.

Also, until sentencing, the government can prosecute cooperators if they lie or otherwise break their plea deals.

"If the witness has already been sentenced, those adverse consequences are no longer a factor," Buell said.

The two exceptions were Ben Glisan Jr., former Enron treasurer, and Fastow's wife, Lea.

Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 and went straight to prison for the five-year maximum. He later began helping prosecutors and testified in two trials — including Skilling's.

His prison term was reduced only through means available to all inmates — credit for good behavior and completion of an alcohol abuse treatment program.

Glisan is expected to be released from prison this month to serve his last few months confined at home.

Lea Fastow pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor tax crime in 2004 for helping her husband hide illegal kickbacks from his Enron schemes and served a year in prison.

House Committee Awaits HP Documents Related To Scandal (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, September 18, 2006

Hewlett-Packard has until today to turn over a massive stack of documents related to its snooping scandal to Congress, which has also asked four key players to testify.

The House Committee on Energy and Commerce is investigating whether HP illegally obtained the home phone records of nine journalists and at least two board members. It wants the computer giant to voluntarily hand over nearly all related documents.

Friday, the panel also requested testimony from HP Chairman Patricia Dunn, general counsel Ann Baskins and outside counsel Larry Sonsini, who works for prominent Silicon Valley law firm Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

DOJ_NMG_0063966

Additionally, it summoned Ronald DeLia, a private investigator. HP has admitted hiring detectives who pretended to be reporters and board members to access their phone records, a trick that may be illegal under fraud laws.

HP won't say who those detectives are. But committee spokesman Terry Lane says DeLia has relevant information to the case.

On its company website, Security Outsourcing Solutions identifies DeLia as its managing director. The site says the firm helps other companies address internal and external security concerns.

The phone number and address listed actually belong to Boston law firm Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata. Attorneys there did not return phone calls. DeLia did not return e-mails.

HP spokesman Mike Moeller says his company is cooperating with the committee. But he wouldn't say whether employees would turn over documents or testify. As of Friday afternoon, the committee had not received anything, Lane says.

Sonsini's office had no comment.

The committee's requests have so far been voluntary. But it can issue subpoenas if necessary.

On Saturday, HP officials acknowledged they improperly accessed the phone records of Moeller and another employee during the leaks probe. Moeller said Dunn and HP CEO Mark Hurd apologized to him.

Other agencies are interested in HP. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer has said he has enough evidence to charge employees of HP and its subcontractors. The Department of Justice, Securities and Exchange Commission and FBI have also launched inquiries.

The requests will make it tougher for HP to move past the scandal, says business professor Eric Johnson at Dartmouth College. Last week, HP said that Dunn would step down as chairman in January.

Dunn hired the detectives earlier this year to figure out which board member was leaking information to the press. She says she told the detectives to do everything legally and didn't know about the subterfuge until after the fact.

“They were hoping things would blow over,” Johnson says. “But there are more shoes dropping.”

Hewlett Review Is Said To Detail Deeper Spying (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

A secret investigation of news leaks at Hewlett-Packard was more elaborate than previously reported, and almost from the start involved the illicit gathering of private phone records and direct surveillance of board members and journalists, according to people briefed on the company’s review of the operation.

The effort received some degree of supervision from three officials — Patricia C. Dunn, the company’s chairwoman, along with its general counsel and another staff attorney — but was quickly farmed out to a network of private investigative firms early last year, according to descriptions of the findings. It is still unclear how much they knew of the details.

Those briefed on the company’s review of the operation say detectives tried to plant software on at least one journalist’s computer that would enable messages to be traced, and also followed directors and possibly a journalist in an attempt to identify a leaker on the board.

The revelations at Hewlett-Packard, the computer and printer maker that helped define Silicon Valley, have provided a rare glimpse of boardroom turmoil — resulting in Ms. Dunn’s agreement to step down as chairwoman in January, and two resignations from the board.

But they have also cast a harsh light on the questionable and possibly illegal techniques used in the episode, raising the possibility of criminal charges.

The account of those briefed on Hewlett-Packard’s review of the matter sheds new light on the scope and timing of the investigative methods, establishing that invasive and possibly illegal techniques were used far earlier than previously known and that the company’s chief ethics officer was among those providing supervision.

The hunt for a boardroom leaker began as early as January 2005, with a focus on disclosures immediately preceding the ouster of Carleton S. Fiorina as chairwoman and chief executive, with a second phase that began a year later. Hewlett-Packard has said that as a public company, it had a responsibility to stop unauthorized disclosures.

But the review reveals that the investigation by its detectives was notable for a lack of close supervision by company officials.

Those briefed on the internal review said that at various times, questions were raised about the legality of the methods used. They did not identify who raised the questions, when, or to whom they were addressed. But a crucial legal opinion, its origins previously undisclosed, was supplied by a Boston firm that shares an address and phone number with a detective firm on the case.

DOJ_NMG_0063967

Those speaking about the company's review would do so only if they were not identified. A Hewlett-Packard spokesman yesterday declined to comment on their account.

In addition to scrutiny by prosecutors, a House subcommittee has entered the case, asking for documents on the internal investigation to be delivered today in advance of a Sept. 28 hearing in Washington.

Some of those documents are expected to reveal that detectives made several attempts at direct surveillance of some directors, and were given photos of reporters to help identify them.

At least one reporter, Dawn Kawamoto of the online technology news service CNET, may have been followed as part of the 2006 investigation, said a person briefed on the investigation. Ms. Kawamoto was a co-author of an article on a senior management meeting in January.

The detectives also tried to plant software in the computer of an unspecified CNET reporter that would communicate back to the detectives, people briefed on the company review said. Ms. Kawamoto said in an interview this month that prosecutors had told her that such a ploy may have been used, but said she was not aware of any surveillance.

Representing themselves as an anonymous tipster, the detectives e-mailed a document to a CNET reporter, according to those briefed on the review. The e-mail was embedded with software that was supposed to trace who the document was forwarded to. The software did not work, however, and the reporter never wrote any story based on the bogus document.

On Saturday, the company identified one of two employees who it said had been a target of scrutiny in the internal operation. It said the private phone records of the employee, Michael Moeller, director of corporate media relations, were taken.

It is not clear why Mr. Moeller, whose job it is to speak with reporters, was included in the operation. Robert Sherbin, Hewlett-Packard's vice president for external communications and Mr. Moeller's boss, said yesterday, "Investigators' suspicions were misdirected and were unfounded." He would not elaborate.

Although the company said others outside the company were also targets of detectives, it has not identified those people.

According to those briefed on the internal review, the Hewlett-Packard investigation had two stages: from January to August 2005, when nothing of substance was turned up, and again in January 2006, after the CNET article appeared.

The first call for an investigation from the board came in January 2005 after The Wall Street Journal published an article that cited discussion of the board about a management reorganization and changes in the responsibilities of Ms. Fiorina, then chairwoman and chief executive.

An article in The New York Times on Feb. 10, recounting Ms. Fiorina's ouster by the board, contained extensive details of a directors' meeting and fueled the desire to plug leaks.

Reporters from those two newspapers, CNET and Business Week have been told by the California attorney general's office that they were targets in the operation.

Within 60 days, the investigation into the leaks was up and running, according to those briefed on the company review. Responsibility for the investigation was delegated to the company's global investigations unit, based in the Boston area. Those company officials turned the effort over to Security Outsourcing Solutions, a two-person agency that hires specialists for investigations.

That firm hired Action Research Group, an investigative firm in Melbourne, Fla. The actual work of obtaining the phone records was given to other subcontractors, one of which is said to have worked in or near Omaha. The methods were said to have included the use of subterfuge, a practice known as pretexting, in which investigators pose as those whose records they are seeking.

Previous accounts of the Hewlett-Packard operation have focused on the use of such methods in the 2006 phase of the investigation, but not in its earlier phase.

Federal and California prosecutors, as well as the Congressional subcommittee, are examining the chain of detectives for possible criminal wrongdoing in obtaining phone records. The California attorney general said last week that he had enough evidence to indict people inside and outside the company.

Hewlett-Packard has steadfastly refused to identify any of the investigators it used, including its own.

People briefed on Hewlett-Packard's review of its internal investigation say that it was authorized by Ms. Dunn, the chairwoman, and put under the supervision of Kevin Hunsaker, a senior counsel who is the company's director of ethics. But it is not clear what level of supervision he gave to the project.

Ms. Dunn has said in recent interviews that she could not supervise the investigation because she was also a potential target. She has said she turned to the company's security department in April or May 2005 for an initial investigation, then asked Ann O. Baskins, the company's general counsel, for help in the further investigation last January. Ms. Baskins supervises a team of more than 100 lawyers around the world.

At at least one point, the company's lawyers sought a legal opinion. But it did not come from Hewlett-Packard's own outside counsel, Larry W. Sonsini of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, an eminent Silicon Valley law firm.

Instead, the company asked one of its contractors, Security Outsourcing Solutions, which turned to a Boston lawyer, John Kiernan of Bonner Kiernan Trebach & Crociata, for the opinion. Mr. Kiernan's office shares a Boston address and phone number with Security Outsourcing Solutions.

The company, in a recent filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, said it had received an outside counsel's opinion that the investigative methods were legal, but it did not identify the source.

It is also not clear whether company lawyers were aware of the close business and personal ties between Mr. Kiernan, Ronald R. DeLia, the owner of Security Outsourcing Solutions, and Anthony R. Gentilucci, the Boston-based manager of global investigations for Hewlett-Packard.

Executives and lawyers back in the company's Palo Alto, Calif., headquarters remained in the dark even after a summary report was produced for them about each of the two phases of the operation, according to those briefed on the review. Neither of the reports, they said, outlined the methods used.

There were discussions of phone numbers and calls in the report. But it is not clear why that fact apparently did not raise alarm among any Hewlett-Packard lawyers about the means used to gain the information.

The findings were presented to the board at a meeting in May, with George A. Keyworth II, the board's longest-serving member, identified as a source of leaks. He refused an initial request to resign, though he ultimately agreed to do so last week. But a fellow director, Thomas J. Perkins, a Silicon Valley venture capitalist, resigned immediately over the handling of the investigation.

It was only through subsequent inquiries to Mr. Sonsini that Mr. Perkins learned more about the methods used. It was his determination to get the company to acknowledge the reasons for his departure that brought the internal investigation into the spotlight this month.

In an e-mail message to Mr. Sonsini on June 19 , Mr. Perkins asked about the legality of obtaining private phone records without a subpoena. Mr. Sonsini responded that Ms. Baskins had "looked into the legality of every step of the inquiry and was satisfied that it was conducted properly."

According to those briefed on the company's review of its investigation, there is no indication that Mr. Sonsini, considered the most powerful lawyer in Silicon Valley, was involved in seeking outside investigators for Hewlett-Packard in 2005 or 2006. He became involved, they said, only when the board asked him for a legal opinion of the investigation and the methods used.

Mr. Sonsini has said that his direct involvement in helping the board trace news leaks was limited to interviews with directors in early 2005.

Mr. Sonsini told the board in August, after his firm's investigation of the detectives' methods, that the use of pretexting "was not generally unlawful." The law firm could not say whether the detective agencies hired by Hewlett-Packard, or the subcontractors any of them used, "complied in all respects with applicable law."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Another One Bites The Dust (USNEWS)

By Edward T. Pound

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

For months, whenever questions arose about an influence-peddling investigation, Rep. Robert Ney, an Ohio Republican, was adamant: He did nothing wrong and wouldn't resign. But all that was so much smoke. First, Ney announced he would retire. Then, last week, he agreed to plead guilty to criminal charges linked to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ney acknowledged his guilt on charges of conspiring to defraud the public of his "honest services" and making false statements. According to prosecutors, Ney accepted trips worth more than $170,000 from Abramoff, his lobbyists, and their clients. The Abramoff team showered him with campaign gifts, meals, and sports and concert tickets; Ney gave them legislative help. Separately, Ney admitting taking "thousands of dollars" in gambling chips from a foreign executive who wanted his help.

Rep. Ney Pleads Guilty In Ongoing Abramoff-Related Corruption Probe (LAW)

By Anna Palmer And Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, September 18, 2006

Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, pleaded guilty Friday to criminal fraud charges as part of the government's ongoing public corruption probe stemming from the business deals of convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

DOJ_NMG_0063969

In the two-count plea, filed in the U.S. District Court for the D.C. Circuit, Ney, 52, admitted to making false statements and to being part of a conspiracy to violate congressional gift bans by accepting handouts and free trips from Abramoff and his clients in exchange for pushing their legislative agenda beginning in 2000 until April 2004.

Ney is the first member of Congress to face charges in a lobbying scandal that has already ensnared six other lobbyists and government officials. Abramoff and his associates Michael Scanlon, former Ney Chief of Staff Neil Volz, Adam Kidan and Tony Rudy all pleaded guilty to bribery charges. David Safavian, former chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstructing justice in connection with his work with Abramoff. (Judge Paul Friedman denied Safavian's motion for a new trial this week.)

Lawyers familiar with the investigation say the government is likely to bring charges against other government officials, former Hill staffers and lobbyists in the coming months.

Ney's lawyers, Mark Tuohey and William Lawler of Vinson & Elkins, did not return calls. A spokesperson at Ney's office declined to comment on the future of Ney's congressional office. But even though the Ohio congressman soundly won his primary election in May, the state Republican Party moved quickly to remove him from the November ballot and named Joy Padgett, a former state representative, on Thursday as his replacement. The New York Times reported Friday that Ney had entered into treatment for alcoholism.

"Congressman Ney obviously has some personal issues that he needs to deal with, and we wish him the best of luck, but he's not on the ballot this November. Our focus is keeping the 18th District in Republican hands," says John McClelland, a spokesman for the Ohio Republican Party.

Ney will appear in court Oct. 13 before Judge Ellen Huvelle. He faces a maximum sentence of 10 years and a $500,000 fine, although the Justice Department is recommending he receive closer to 27 months in prison.

The case is being prosecuted by Mary Butler, M. Kendall Day and James Crowell IV of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section.

Ney's relationship with Abramoff and his associates began shortly before he took over as chairman of the House Committee on Administration in 2001, a position he held until the House leadership forced him to step down in January.

One of Ney's first illegal acts was inserting statements into the Congressional Record on Scanlon's behalf twice in 2000, according to the plea. According to the Congressional Record, those statements related to Abramoff's Florida business venture, SunCruz Casino.

Ney soon accepted numerous lobbyist-sponsored trips, including an August 2002 golfing junket to Scotland, which included Abramoff, Safavian, Volz and former Christian Coalition organizer Ralph Reed. Ney also took a gambling trip to New Orleans, in May 2003, and vacationed at Lake George, N.Y., in August 2003. Both trips were paid for by lobbyists.

In the plea, Ney admitted he had frequently accepted free meals and drinks at Abramoff's restaurant, Signatures, and took free tickets to concerts and sporting events using Abramoff's box suites at the Verizon Center, FedEx Field and Camden Yards.

In exchange for these gifts, Ney agreed to add language favoring Abramoff's clients into pending bills, according to Ney's plea documents. One of the key pieces of legislation was the Help America Vote Act, in which Ney inserted amendments to lift an existing casino ban for two Abramoff clients and to allow another Abramoff client, a foreign-beverage distiller, to label its product "Made in Russia" even though it was made in a former Soviet republic, according to the plea agreement.

In addition to the Abramoff-related matters, Ney admitted to taking bribes from a foreign businessman who had hired U.S. lobbyists to help get a license to sell U.S.-made airplanes and parts. The businessman, who was not named in charging documents, gave Ney and his staff thousands of dollars in gambling chips on a 2003 trip to a London casino, from which Ney walked away from with more than $50,000. According to lobbying and travel records, the businessman was Nigel Winfield, whose company, FN Aviation, hired lobbyist David DiStefano, a former chief of staff to Ney, in 2003.

Lynch Pleads Guilty To Fraud, Tax Evasion Charges (NSL)

By JOHN P. MARTIN

Newark Star-Ledger, September 18, 2006

Ex-senator and Democratic Party kingpin admits taking kickbacks

State Sen. John Lynch yesterday admitted secretly taking tens of thousands of dollars from a contractor while lobbying to help him develop state parkland, a stunning acknowledgment of corruption by one of New Jersey's most influential politicians.

Standing before a federal judge in Newark, Lynch pleaded guilty to defrauding the state's citizens and to tax evasion. He said he and his business partner, Jack Westlake, used a Tinton Falls consulting company as a "conduit" to accept and hide kickbacks they demanded from contractors.

Westlake, a developer and longtime member of the Monmouth County Board of Taxation, pleaded guilty to a separate tax evasion charge.

DOJ_NMG_0063970

Their pleas marked a sudden end to a four-year investigation that began with an inquiry into billboard sales by two high-level aides to former Gov. James E. McGreevey and ended with the prosecution of Lynch, the former Senate president, Democratic Party leader and McGreevey's political mentor.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie called it possibly "the most significant" case in his office during a four-year barrage of corruption prosecutions that has sent dozens of elected officials, public employees and contractors to prison.

None was as powerful as Lynch, who left the Senate after two decades in 2002, but remains widely viewed as one of the state's reigning political bosses.

"Today, an era of corruption and influence peddling for personal profit has been put to an end," Christie said at a news conference.

Under the terms of his plea, Lynch, who is also a former mayor of New Brunswick, agreed to serve between 33 and 41 months in prison, although U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler could opt to impose a longer or shorter term. He released Lynch on $100,000 bail but ordered him to return for sentencing Dec. 19.

The plea spared Lynch, the de facto leader of the Middlesex County Democrats, a trial on more serious charges that, if proven, could have sent him to jail for three times as long. Prosecutors had threatened to charge him with racketeering, a sweeping charge that would have portrayed Lynch as the mastermind of a criminal enterprise spanning years, according to three attorneys with knowledge of the negotiations.

Typically reserved for organized crime figures, a racketeering charge, if proven, could have exposed Lynch to a decade in prison and allowed the government to first freeze then seize millions of dollars of his assets. For months, Lynch had been characteristically defiant, telling friends he would fight the allegations.

Guilty Plea From Former N.J. Lawmaker (PHI)

By Troy Graham And Jennifer Moroz

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 18, 2006

He was once atop the New Jersey political world, one of the most powerful men in Trenton, a mentor to former Gov. Jim McGreevey.

Now former state Senate President John A. Lynch has become another in a long line of politicians convicted in federal court on corruption charges.

Lynch and his business partner, John Westlake, pleaded guilty in Newark on Friday to tax-evasion charges. Lynch also pleaded guilty to a corruption charge for accepting more than $25,000 while in office to lobby on behalf of a sand-mining company.

U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie, who has brought charges against 97 political figures during his tenure, said Lynch's plea ended "an era of corruption and influence peddling for personal profit."

"At this point, this an an old story... but one today that's of particular significance," he said. "This is one of the most important - if not the most important case - we've brought to a conclusion in my 41/2 years."

The guilty pleas spun off a four-year investigation that began with federal officials examining the business dealings of two top McGreevey aides - Paul Levinsohn and Gary Taffet.

The aides, who were accused of improperly using their influence to broker lucrative deals to install billboards throughout the state, were never charged with a crime. The investigation morphed over time to focus on Lynch and Westlake, Christie said. The aides have denied any wrongdoing.

The billboard investigation began with a deal Taffet and Levinsohn pursued in Gloucester County, and a grand jury seated in Camden heard the evidence that eventually brought down Lynch.

In a statement distributed by his attorney after the hearing, Lynch, a Democrat from Middlesex County, apologized for his "misconduct."

"I remain proud of the many public achievements in which I played a role," he said. "However, I recognize that the misconduct which I today acknowledged will forever overshadow those achievements."

Lynch, 67, could face 33 to 41 months in prison. Westlake, 76, of Red Bank, faces 10 to 16 months. Both men remain free on bond pending their sentencings on Dec. 19.

Lynch was a three-term mayor of New Brunswick, a state senator for 20 years, the Senate president from 1990 to 1992, and one of the men most credited with helping McGreevey win the governor's office. He retired from public life five years ago.

His conviction comes four days before the release of McGreevey's book, The Confession, which details his time as a closeted gay man in politics, and his downfall after admitting an affair with a male employee.

In the book, McGreevey calls Lynch "by far the most powerful warlord in the state," and says Lynch pressured him "to appoint his people to ranking positions, particularly in law enforcement."

Lynch is one of several McGreevey figures to have their day in federal court. Fund-raiser David D'Amiano and real estate mogul and Democratic donor Charles Kushner both were given prison terms last year in political-corruption cases.

Gov. Corzine said Friday that the "toxic mix" of money and politics was a "broad cultural problem" in New Jersey.

"It's unacceptable, the breach of trust, and I'd say the same thing if it were my best friend," Corzine said. "Politics is the basis for economic gain, and that has got to stop."

Lynch and Westlake were partners in a company called Executive Continental, and Westlake controlled another company called Alma Limited, both of which were based in the same Red Bank office and purported to provide consulting to developers. Prosecutors said Lynch used these companies to hide his illegal work for developers.

Lynch admitted to accepting more than $25,000 from a South Brunswick company seeking to mine state-owned lands and then turn the land into a recreation park. The plan needed approval from the state Department of Environmental Protection.

Lynch admitted writing letters on Senate letterhead to the DEP commissioner hailing the proposal as having "great appeal to the general public."

Meanwhile, Alma sought between $120,000 and $200,000 in payments from the company. The money from the sand company passed through Alma, to Executive Continental and then to Lynch, according to court documents.

Christie would not address questions about whether Lynch conducted other similar deals, saying he could only discuss what was contained in the court papers. But, the money Lynch admitted to not reporting to the IRS, about $150,000, passed to Lynch through another unidentified developer interested in a property on the Raritan River.

Christie said investigations spawned by the billboards case would continue, and FBI Special Agent in Charge Leslie Wiser warned, "our team is not done."

"Put this on the billboard: 97-0 and counting," he said.

In Trenton Friday, legislators had differing opinions on whether the conviction would stain the Democratic Party, with Senate President Richard J. Codey (D., Essex) offering the most satirical view.

"People already have the attitude that politicians are crooks," he said with a chuckle. "So another one isn't going to change that."

Christie called Lynch's plea "a sad moment," and acknowledged that the conviction might not change the way politics work in New Jersey.

"The problem is that you get rid of one set of corrupt bosses and another set seems to come in to replace them," he said. "It's up to the people of this state and the leaders of this state... to decide if they want to continue on this path."

Ex-Leader Of New Jersey Senate Is Guilty Of Corruption (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

NEWARK, Sept. 15 — Offering a public apology for adding another chapter to New Jersey's storied history of political corruption, the former Senate president, John A. Lynch Jr. — once the most influential power broker in the state — pleaded guilty on Friday to charges of official misconduct and tax evasion.

Mr. Lynch, whose political machine once gave him the power to appoint judges, shape legislation and pave James E. McGreevey's path to the governor's office, admitted that in 1998 and 1999 he used his public office to help win permit approvals for a mining company that eventually funneled more than $25,000 to him as a "success fee."

He also pleaded guilty to an unrelated tax evasion charge, admitting that in 1999 he failed to declare income he had received from the sale of a parcel of land along the Raritan River.

The charges for Mr. Lynch, 67, who will be sentenced on Dec. 19, carry a possible prison sentence of nearly three years. The case marked a remarkable downfall for Mr. Lynch, once considered a possible candidate for governor. His intensity, intelligence and temper made him a feared political opponent.

As Judge Stanley R. Chesler read the charges in United States District Court in Newark, Mr. Lynch appeared confident. But when asked by the judge whether he was taking any medication, Mr. Lynch said that he had had to calm his frayed nerves in the hours before the hearing by taking sleeping pills and a sedative.

In a written statement distributed by his lawyer, Jack Arsenault, Mr. Lynch said he was deeply sorry for betraying the public trust and embarrassing his family, political colleagues and constituents.

"I deeply regret it, not merely because it will irreparably stain my reputation but, more importantly, because it will further erode both the citizens' faith in their public officials and the country's perception of this great state," he said.

Christopher J. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, hailed the guilty pleas as the end of an era of political bosses that had led to what he called "the corrupt McGreevey administration."

After watching the court proceeding from the spectators' bench, Mr. Christie held a news conference and said that he hoped the case would serve as a deterrent to any public official tempted to cash in on his public service. "No one, absolutely no one, in New Jersey is above the law," Mr. Christie said.

Although the plea involved only one deal in a career that spanned nearly three decades, lawyers familiar with the case said that after scouring Mr. Lynch's business and political records for more than four years, investigators were preparing to push for indictments on a wide range of charges involving at least six different transactions.

Mr. Christie declined to discuss whether Mr. Lynch might have faced more criminal charges if he had not agreed to plead guilty. But when reporters asked whether Mr. Lynch had gotten off easy by pleading to a single corruption charge, Mr. Christie gave an adamant reply.

"A few years ago he was the most powerful figure in the state," he said. "I don't think John Lynch ever expected to go to jail."

The guilty plea, coming during the final two months of a closely contested race for the United States Senate, was quickly seized on by Republicans, who called it an indictment of New Jersey's Democratic leadership. But there was no evidence in the court documents or hearing that pointed to any other public official.

The investigation into Mr. Lynch was a result of an inquiry that was started in late 2001, the month before his protégé, James E. McGreevey, was sworn in as governor. The following year, federal authorities began investigating a complaint that Mr. McGreevey's incoming chief of staff and chief counsel used their positions on his transition team to inflate the value of a billboard company that they later sold for a profit.

No charges have been brought regarding the billboard transaction. But as agents examined the deal, they discovered that Mr. Lynch and his business partner, Jack Westlake, had received a share of the profits through a consulting company they had formed in 1993.

The company, Executive Continental Inc., helped businesses win government approvals for a wide range of commercial projects, apartment buildings, strip malls and subdivisions throughout the state.

In an interview with The New York Times last December, Mr. Lynch said that his role with Executive Continental was to act as a "choreographer" and help businesses navigate the bureaucratic thicket. He said the company received a "success fee" if the projects were completed, and insisted that he was proud to use his policy expertise to promote private development projects that did not contribute to suburban sprawl.

But in court papers made public on Friday, Mr. Lynch acknowledged that in 1998 he used his public office to lobby for the Dallenbach Sand Company as it sought state approval for the rights to mine property in South Brunswick. Mr. Lynch wrote two letters urging the state's Department of Environmental Protection to approve the project. He later submitted an invoice to the company charging $25,000 "for professional services rendered for lobbying."

Although the project never materialized, Mr. Lynch was ultimately paid more than $25,000 for his work, some of which was paid through Mr. Westlake's other company to conceal Mr. Lynch's participation.

Mr. Westlake was not charged with any wrongdoing in connection with the mining deal. He did, however, plead guilty to tax evasion charges for failing to report the $350,000 in income he made from the sale of the Raritan River property that he owned with Mr. Lynch.

ONE MAN, MANY ROLES: Lynch Flexed His Muscle In New Brunswick City Hall, State Senate, Behind The Scenes (APP)

By Rick Malwitz, STAFF WRITER

Asbury Park Press, September 16, 2006

Plea eclipses long political career

NEW BRUNSWICK — In the 1840s, Patrick Corrigan emigrated from Ireland and went to work helping construct the city's sewer system. While he chopped through roots under the city sidewalks, he would at the same time plant family roots.

Nearly a century later, in 1938, his granddaughter, Evelyn Rooney Lynch, gave birth to John A. Lynch Jr., who would play a significant role in the city's history and be hailed as a principal architect of its recent revival.

Lynch would follow in his father's footsteps, becoming mayor of the city, president of the state Senate and a major player in state politics, and the reputed political boss of Middlesex County politics.

But whatever good deeds there were in the eyes of many, these were eclipsed Friday, when he pleaded guilty to federal corruption charges. In a deal with the U.S. Attorney's Office, he is expected to be sentenced in December to federal prison for between 33 and 41 months.

DOJ_NMG_0063973

While Lynch crafted a lucrative career as an attorney with success not in small ways owing to his political connections, he maintained a passion for the political arena. When the U.S. Attorney's investigation became known in November, he said it was the result of his high political profile.

Of his passion for politics, he explained in a 1999 interview, "Every man needs a crap table."

Taking dad's lead

The senior Lynch was named city magistrate in New Brunswick in 1938. In 1941, he was named Middlesex County prosecutor by Gov. Charles Edison. He would serve two terms as mayor in the 1950s and serve in the state Senate from 1955 to 1977, rising to the position of Senate president.

Following his death in 1978, the John Lynch Sr. Bridge, crossing the Raritan River, was named in his honor.

His son would take the same career path — mayor, state senator, Senate president.

John was the eldest of five children raised on New York Avenue, near St. Peter's Hospital, and he attended St. Peter's High School.

Lynch graduated from College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass., and Georgetown University Law School in Washington, D.C., and then returned home to practice law.

Lynch became mayor of New Brunswick in 1979, and would serve three four-year terms. During his tenure, the city had a revival that made it the envy of other cities in the state.

McGreevey mentor

Lynch toyed with the idea of running for governor in the 1980s. However, his statewide political ambitions would suffer, through no fault of his own.

In 1989, his brother-in-law, Louis Auricchio Jr., was sent to federal prison on income-tax evasion. In 1994, Auricchio pleaded guilty to aggravated manslaughter, admitting his role in the 1988 murder of a mob rival in Kearny.

After Lynch's statewide political ambitions were foiled, he found someone to groom for the governor's office, identifying James E. McGreevey of Woodbridge as an up-and-coming star in Democratic Party politics.

In 1997, Lynch co-chaired McGreevey's campaign, when he sought his party's nomination to challenge incumbent Gov. Christie Whitman.

McGreevey upset U.S. Rep. Rob Andrews in the 1997 Democratic primary, and came within 28,000 votes of upsetting Whitman. In the 2001 election, McGreevey easily defeated Republican Bret Schundler in the governor's race and Lynch was hailed as the kingmaker. That year the www.politicsnj.com Web site named Lynch its "Politician of the Year."

Once McGreevey took office, however, his relationship with Lynch soured. No longer did Lynch have access to the governor's office, and Democratic power brokers repeatedly asked him why he had promoted McGreevey.

Political "choreographer"

Lynch would describe the duration of the McGreevey administration as "the worst 34 months of my political life."

Ironically, Lynch entered his guilty plea the same week The Associated Press printed the most salacious excerpts from McGreevey's tell-all autobiography.

Officially, Lynch's power began to diminish following the 1991 election. Voter dissatisfaction with Gov. James J. Florio's tax increase tipped the balance in Trenton, putting the Republican Party in charge.

Lynch, no longer Senate president, said he believed it was time to enter "the real world" and begin developing business interests in addition to his law practice.

In 1993, Monmouth County developer Jack Westlake created the Alma Limited Partnership to develop business projects. Lynch was not part of Alma, reasoning that, if he was, "I would become the story, as opposed to the project."

Lynch and Westlake then established Executive Continental, to act as a subcontractor working for Alma, with Westlake and Lynch sharing 50/50 ownership. Lynch told the Home News Tribune his role was as a "choreographer . . . to make the politics work."

FBI raid

When the FBI exercised a search warrant at the office Westlake and Lynch shared in Tinton Falls, Lynch claimed he was innocent.

"I am sure that I have been investigated due to the repeated press accounts calling me "boss,' a "warlord,' and many other uncomplimentary names as a result of the nonsense perpetrated by people associated with the McGreevey Administration."

In May, Gannett New Jersey reported that Monroe Mayor Richard Pucci received $150,000 to act as a consultant to New Directions for Responsible Leadership. At the same time, developer Jack Morris, a developer with close ties to Lynch, was seeking approval of a project in Monroe.

Lynch said there was no wrongdoing, although he acknowledged there was a perception of wrongdoing, based on his connection to the story.

DOJ_NMG_0063974

"I am a liability because of perception, not reality," Lynch said.

In the wake of that story he faxed a statement to the media, announcing his decision, "to withdraw entirely, permanently and irrevocably from a wide range of public organizations, whether political or philanthropic in nature."

In an interview with the Home News Tribune one week after he issued that statement, he indicated he would not leave the political arena altogether. "God willing I will be around long enough to be banged around some more," he said.

With Friday's guilty plea, the bang of a judge's gavel in federal court forever tainted his name.

Ex-Senate President Admits He Got Payoffs (BERGR)

By PETER J. SAMPSON And MITCHEL MADDUX, STAFF WRITERS

Bergen Record, September 16, 2006

John A. Lynch Jr., a former state Senate president and one of New Jersey's most powerful Democratic bosses, admitted Friday that he took thousands of dollars in payoffs from a company seeking state approvals.

Lynch, 67, pleaded guilty in federal court to devising a scheme to defraud the public. He also admitted evading taxes on $150,000 in unreported income from a separate venture in 1999.

The former legislator -- who sponsored James E. McGreevey's rise to the governor's office in 2001 -- is by far the most prominent of dozens of New Jersey public officials convicted in a series of federal corruption probes during the past several years.

State Republican Party chief Tom Wilson was quick to make political hay of the news.

"John Lynch isn't just symbolic of the Democratic Party in New Jersey: He was the literal hub of the Democratic Party in New Jersey," Wilson said. "Another Democratic Party leader sent to jail, another black eye for New Jersey's reputation."

Democratic State Committee Chairman Joe Cryan fired back: "These types of things happen in both parties, whether it's Republican mayors in Monmouth County or Republican congressmen around the country. Tom should know better than to make these kinds of allegations."

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie -- no stranger himself to accusations of partisan politics -- noted that Lynch, of New Brunswick, once was "probably the single most influential person on the governor of New Jersey."

"Today's guilty plea should send a message that no one -- absolutely no one -- is above the law in the state of New Jersey," Christie said during a news conference in Newark.

Lynch, a former New Brunswick mayor, admitted his guilt before a packed courtroom as part of a plea agreement that brings a close to a four-year investigation. Under federal guidelines, he faces 33 to 41 months in prison when he is sentenced on Dec. 19.

U.S. District Judge Stanley Chesler allowed Lynch to remain free on $100,000 bail, provided he surrenders his passport, submits to a mental health evaluation and limits his travel to New York and Florida.

Lynch, who left office in January 2002, later apologized for betraying the public trust.

"I accept full responsibility for [my] misconduct, and I deeply regret it, not merely because it will irreparably stain my reputation but, more importantly, because it will further erode both the citizens' faith in their public officials and the country's perception of this great state," he said in a statement read by his attorney outside the federal courthouse.

The statement also said Lynch is pained that his crimes will now overshadow decades' worth of achievements in public office.

By pleading guilty, he said, "I hope I can cease being part of the problem and start being part of the solution."

Sand company payoffs

Moments earlier, Lynch told a federal judge that he accepted payoffs funneled through two consulting firms from a South Brunswick sand company in return for his official actions and influence as a senator.

His longtime business associate and a principal of the two consulting firms, John E. "Jack" Westlake, also pleaded guilty Friday.

Westlake, 76, of Red Bank, admitted that he failed to report about $350,000 in 1999 income and, as a result, owes between $70,000 and $120,000 in back taxes.

The partners used the Red Bank firms Executive Continental Inc. and Alma Limited to hide corrupt payments to Lynch, federal authorities said. The firms purported to provide consulting services to developers.

In 1995, the sand company hired Alma to help secure mining rights to state-owned land next to its property in South Brunswick. After the sand was extracted, the land was to be turned into a park and ownership reverted to the state. The company turned to Alma, which is solely owned by Westlake, to get the necessary approvals from the state Department of Environmental Protection.

Lynch wrote letters to the DEP vouching for the sand company and endorsing the park plan.

Between 1998 and 2002, Alma regularly demanded and received payments of $120,000 to $200,000, from the sand company, Lynch admitted Friday. About $25,000 of that money was passed on to him through Executive Continental, a firm in which he held a 50 percent stake, he said.

Christie said Lynch pressed the DEP to approve the park project while not admitting to anyone that he was receiving payments from the sand company.

"That's influence peddling and concealing corrupt conduct," he said.

'Powerful warlord'

As Senate president and as an influential political boss, Lynch exerted behind-the-scenes control over a wide range of government decisions affecting every corner of New Jersey.

In his recently released autobiography, "The Confession," McGreevey described Lynch as "by far the most powerful warlord in the state."

At times pugnacious, often feared and sometimes downright profane, Lynch charted a successful political career secured through written legislation and backroom deals.

He led the revival of a blighted New Brunswick, convincing health-care giant Johnson & Johnson to keep its world headquarters there and sparking an urban renewal movement. He also authored New Jersey's fair housing law after the state Supreme Court ruled that municipalities must provide affordable housing to the disadvantaged.

Among his other achievements were laws to protect the state's dwindling open spaces, protect wetlands and create urban enterprise zones.

Lynch was born in 1938, the son of the late John A. Lynch, himself a New Brunswick mayor who also ascended to the Senate presidency. The younger Lynch studied at the College of the Holy Cross and Georgetown University Law School before beginning a legal career. He was elected to the Senate in 1981.

Aide McGreevey Cited Says They Never Had An Affair (NYT)

By Andrew Jacobs

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

There were no fireworks, no swooning — and no sex, for that matter, says the man at the center of the political maelstrom that led to the resignation of Gov. James E. McGreevey of New Jersey two years ago.

Golan Cipel, the man with whom Mr. McGreevey says he had a two-year affair, said in an interview from Israel yesterday that he wanted to set the record straight and dispute Mr. McGreevey's memoir, "The Confession," which is to be released tomorrow. He said the book was simply an attempt to rehabilitate Mr. McGreevey's public image.

He said he was the victim of unwanted advances. "I was not his lover," said Mr. Cipel, 37, an Israeli citizen who was New Jersey's homeland security adviser. "I've never met a liar like Jim McGreevey."

In an interview yesterday, Mr. McGreevey would not directly address Mr. Cipel's remarks, but he described the book as a "rigorously and deeply honest" recounting of his years in the closet, his furtive sexual exploits at truck stops and what he portrays as a rapturous breakthrough affair with Mr. Cipel.

"I want to recognize my obvious complicity in the relationship and to underscore the damage and suffering I caused," he said. "But for Golan, I would have never confronted my own truth."

State Senator Raymond J. Lesniak, Mr. McGreevey's close friend, was less conciliatory. "There is a special place in hell reserved for liars like Golan Cipel," he said.

At the time of Mr. McGreevey's resignation, lawyers for the governor said Mr. Cipel was threatening to file a sexual harassment lawsuit. One of the lawyers, William E. Lawler, said that Mr. Cipel's lawyer, Allen M. Lowy, was demanding $50 million in exchange for dropping the matter.

Mr. Cipel denied yesterday that he or his lawyer was seeking money. He said he wanted only that Mr. McGreevey stop harassing him. The F.B.I. investigated extortion accusations but declined to take action.

In the book, Mr. McGreevey calls the relationship a consensual affair that started one night while his wife was recovering from surgery after the birth of their first child. "We undressed and he kissed me. It was the first time in my life that a kiss meant what it was supposed to mean — it sent me through the roof," Mr. McGreevey writes.

Mr. Cipel said the two men never kissed.

Mr. Cipel called it an encounter marked by deceit and physical force. He said the evening started at a bar near the governor's home in Woodridge, where Mr. McGreevey tried to ply him with beer while state troopers waited outside. When he refused to drink, he said, Mr. McGreevey asked him to return to his home under the guise of doing work. Once there, Mr. McGreevey poured two glasses of Jägermeister. Again, Mr. Cipel said, he would not drink.

DOJ_NMG_0063976

He said Mr. McGreevey downed both glasses, and said he had some paperwork upstairs he wanted to give him. “Contrary to what is in the book, we were not holding hands as we walked up the stairs,” Mr. Cipel said. As they neared the master bedroom, Mr. Cipel said, the governor pushed him onto the bed and jumped on top of him.

After a brief tussle, he forced him off and asked why he thought he was gay. “Everyone is a little bit gay,” he quoted Mr. McGreevey as saying. He said he returned home and the next day, the governor apologized, chalking it up to the liquor and the absence of his wife.

Mr. Cipel said there were other encounters during his two years in the administration.

One episode occurred one night in 2002 when state troopers drove the two men to Washington for a meeting, and the governor tried to rub up against Mr. Cipel’s leg. Mr. Lawler said he interviewed the troopers, who denied that the encounter took place.

After that, Mr. Cipel said, he resigned. Asked why he had not left sooner or gone to the authorities, he said he had been afraid no one would believe him. “I knew McGreevey would do anything to keep his job and I didn’t want to get between him and his ambition,” he said. “I felt I couldn’t really run away from a man this powerful and ambitious.”

Former Aide Denies Affair With McGreevey (MH)

The Miami Herald, September 18, 2006

TRENTON, N.J. - Former Gov. James McGreevey says it was an affair with another man that wrecked his marriage and led to the downfall of his political career.

But the former aide implicated in the affair, Golan Cipel, denies the stories recounted in McGreevey's new tell-all book, saying there was never consensual sex and that there were several occasions where he felt sexually harassed, according to newspaper reports.

"I didn't have sex with him - ever," Cipel, 37, told The Philadelphia Inquirer for Sunday newspapers. "In his book, he talks about love, but I never heard anything from McGreevey that was affectionate. The only thing I experienced from him was sexual harassment."

Speaking by phone from Israel, where he works, Cipel told The Inquirer that he needed to counter what he described as lies in McGreevey's book, "The Confession," which is due in bookstores Tuesday. Cipel repeatedly has denied that he is gay.

McGreevey stood by his account of the relationship as described in the book.

"The book is rigorously, if not painfully, honest," McGreevey told The Associated Press Sunday. "It was necessary in my recovery to be totally honest, to embrace my mistakes, my failures and the pain I caused, and to take responsibility for my actions. The book is an effort, however imperfect, to describe the dangers of living a divided, inauthentic life."

A copy of the book, obtained Thursday by The Associated Press, has McGreevey recounting how he first bedded Cipel in December 2001 while his wife was in the hospital after delivering their daughter. McGreevey describes the first kiss in his life that meant something and lovemaking that was "a boastful, passionate, whispering, masculine kind of love."

Cipel said the evening instead involved McGreevey taking him out to a bar, then back to his condo for shots of Jagermeister. McGreevey pushed him to drink more and then told him to come upstairs to look at something "for work," Cipel said.

"So McGreevey comes up, turned toward the den very fast, and pushed me toward the bedroom. I froze, and I said, 'What's going on?' He pushed me again on my chest. He jumped on me and we wrestled. He tried to kiss me. He tried to sexually assault me," Cipel said.

Cipel said he asked McGreevey why he would think he was gay. "And McGreevey said, 'Everybody is a little gay.' I was completely in shock," Cipel told the newspaper.

According to Cipel, he broke free. But he said he was scared because there was a state trooper outside.

"If I hit the governor back, who would they blame? I rushed out. I went home. I couldn't sleep all night. Thoughts in my mind were running. What am I going to do?" Cipel said.

State Sen. Ray Lesniak, a longtime McGreevey friend, told the Inquirer that Cipel is an "extortionist and opportunist" and a "liar and a coward."

"He's proven it his entire history here in the United States over and over again. And he continues to lie and he continues to hide and run away from the truth," Lesniak said.

Allen Lowy, a lawyer who handled Cipel's sexual harassment case, did not immediately return messages left Sunday night, seeking comment about Cipel's remarks.

In a separate interview with The New York Daily News, Cipel addressed McGreevey's claims that blackmail threats led to his August 2004 resignation announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0063977

Cipel said FBI investigators came to Israel and concluded he didn't try to blackmail McGreevey. "I was just the only one with the courage to speak out," Cipel said.

Through lawyers, Cipel threatened to sue McGreevey for sexual harassment shortly before and after McGreevey's resignation. A lawsuit was never filed, and the statute of limitations lapsed. "I wanted to get on with my life," Cipel told The Daily News.

After the resignation, McGreevey, 49, retreated into private life and remained silent until he spoke with Oprah Winfrey on Tuesday about the book - that show will air this Tuesday. He works now as a university-level educational consultant and a childhood anti-poverty advocate, and lives in Plainfield, N.J., with his partner, Mark O'Donnell.

According to Cipel, he enjoyed working on McGreevey's 2001 gubernatorial run, but thought he wouldn't be on McGreevey's staff, because he was a non-U.S. citizen.

"He said, 'I can arrange anything. I'm the most powerful governor in the nation,'" Cipel told The Inquirer.

Cipel told The Daily News that he once asked McGreevey whom he reported to. "And he said, 'Only God is above me,'" Cipel said.

Jury Deadlocked On Aryan Execution (LAT)

By Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, September 16, 2006

Jurors deadlocked today on whether to execute two kingpins of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang who orchestrated a decades-long reign of murder from their cellblocks.

As a result, Barry "The Baron" Mills, 58, and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 59, will live out their years where they have spent most of their adult lives — and where their names already carry near-mythic weight: behind bars.

The jury had been deliberating on the death penalty for a week when it announced the deadlock Thursday to U.S. District Judge David O. Carter, who told the panel to deliberate further. This afternoon, jurors sent word they still could not make up their minds. In federal death penalty cases, if jurors cannot reach a unanimous verdict, defendants receive a default penalty of life in prison.

The same jury convicted the graying, walrus-mustached pair of racketeering and murder in July after a five-months trial in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. The case involved 17 murders or attempted murders dating back to 1979, when Mills stabbed another inmate to death in an Atlanta prison for cheating the gang on a drug deal.

Under Mills' and Bingham's leadership, prosecutors said, the Brotherhood killed to enforce obedience among vast prison populations, run the drug trade, eliminate government informants and keep its members loyal to the gang's strict code.

The gang's violence culminated in 1997, when Mills and Bingham, incarcerated at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, Colo., smuggled a message written in invisible ink to another Brotherhood leader, Al Benton, at the federal prison in Lewisburg, Pa. The message urged Benton to wage war on black inmates, prompting him and his soldiers to launch a blitz attack that left two black inmates dead.

"They thought about it, they plotted, and they sent a message," prosecutor Terri Flynn told jurors, contending that the premeditation involved in the Lewisburg murders argued for the death penalty for Mills and Bingham. "This was not a spur of the moment event that happened."

As the leaders of a gang that employed elaborate ruses to communicate, such as cloaking messages with a 400-year-old binary alphabet system and embedding notes in the text of library books, Mills and Bingham remained a threat to guards and other inmates, the prosecutor said.

Even at the Supermax, the nation's tightest lockup, they were able to thwart the best efforts to watch them. "These men were still able to start a nationwide race war from that prison," the prosecutor said. "They know how to get around the secure facilities."

Mills oversaw the Brotherhood's reign of violence even as he was serving a life sentence for the 1979 murder, the prosecutor said, asking jurors to consider what besides death might deter him from further crime. Like Bingham, Mills has two prior convictions for robbery with a firearm and has been incarcerated most of his adult life.

It would not be adequate punishment, the prosecutor told jurors, "to send them back to prison, to send them back to the place where they are legends."

Defense attorney Dean Steward said the aging defendants would spend the rest of their lives in maximum-security cells and posed no further threat, especially because the Bureau of Prisons had improved security enough to intercept any clandestine communication between the Brotherhood. "They can easily bottle this up," Steward said.

Arguing to keep Mills and Bingham alive, the defense attorney said that Benton, who committed one of the Lewisburg murders, received just a nine-year sentence in exchange for his testimony and would likely be paroled.

"How can you, under any fair system, send Al Benton home and kill these men?" Steward asked the jurors.

During the penalty phase of the trial, the defense sought to paint a picture of Bingham as more than a prison warlord. Jurors saw childhood photos of Bingham, as well as many taken from 1981 to 1985, when he was a free man, married with three sons. The sons took the stand to say they loved their father.

Penny Allamprese, Bingham's ex-girlfriend, testified that she met him when she was 12 years old and he was a 14-year-old with "auburn hair," a "beautiful smile," and a "girl on each side." Her mother forbade her from dating him, she said, so they ran away together.

"He stole a car and met me at midnight," she said. "We were going to Texas to get married."

Instead, a sheriff's deputy caught them in Barstow. Over the years, she added, Bingham has sent her hundreds of poems, many documenting the horrors of prison life.

The defense called no family members for Mills, who has been in prison continually since the 1970s and is known only to have one living relative. Instead, defense attorney Steward stressed that prison is a violent environment with harsh rules where survival means finding friends.

The case was the first of several targeting the Aryan Brotherhood's leadership. Along with Mills and Bingham, lesser gang members Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Gibson were convicted in July of conspiring to murder black inmates. They face 20 years to life in prison when Judge Carter sentences them in October.

Bingham and Hevle, had they not been convicted, were scheduled to be released in four years.

Aryan Brotherhood Convicts Get Life Sentences (OCR)

By Larry Welborn, The Orange County Register

Orange County Register, September 16, 2006

In Santa Ana, a jury deadlocks after five days of deliberations, leading a judge to declare a mistrial and impose judgments.

SANTA ANA – Two members of the violent Aryan Brotherhood prison gang stared unflinchingly straight ahead Friday when a federal jury announced it could not decide if they deserved the death penalty for multiple convictions of racketeering and murder.

U.S. District Court Judge David O. Carter then declared a mistrial and said he must now impose a sentence of life without the possibility of release for Barry "The Baron" Mills, 57, and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, 58.

Carter scheduled a hearing to confirm the sentence Nov. 13.

The two inmates with shaved heads and bushy mustaches sat laughing and chatting with their lawyers behind a security wall inside the Ronald Reagan courthouse before the jury was brought into the ninth-floor courtroom. But they were somber and serious when the eight-man, four-woman jury announced the impasse after five days of deliberations.

Jurors revealed after the mistrial was officially recorded that their last vote had been 9 to 3 for death for Mills and 8 to 4 for life without release for Bingham, both reputedly members of the federal commission for the Aryan Brotherhood.

H. Dean Steward, one of Mills' defense attorneys, said Mills was relieved and grateful to the jury that he will not face execution even though it means he will likely spend the rest of his life in almost total isolation at a super maximum federal prison in Colorado.

Michael White, one of Bingham's lawyers, said that Friday's events were "bittersweet" for his client because he realizes he will never be released from prison to be with his longtime girlfriend and their three sons.

Bingham had been eligible for parole in 2010 before the same jury convicted him and Mills in July of racketeering and murder charges for ordering fellow Aryan Brotherhood inmates to commit violence against other gangs and inmates who were deemed in violation of the Aryan Brotherhood code.

The trial, which began in March, was part of a larger effort by federal prosecutors to dismantle the influence that the Aryan Brotherhood holds over prisons throughout the country.

The Aryan Brotherhood was founded by white prison inmates at San Quentin State Prison in Northern California in 1964 and is now made up of no more than 100 core members, according to federal authorities.

A federal grand jury indicted 40 known associates of the Aryan Brotherhood, including Bingham, who once boasted he could bench press 500 pounds, and Mills, in October 2002, charging them with a series of prison murders and violent attacks on inmates.

Two other top members of the Aryan Brotherhood were convicted in July along with Mills and Bingham. They are scheduled to be sentenced to 20 years to life without the possibility of release in October.

Several other trials are scheduled to begin in various federal courts later this year and early next year.

DOJ_NMG_0063979

Assistant U.S. Attorney Terri K. Flynn said that even though the jury did not vote for death for Bingham and Mills, the trial was a success. She said the convictions in July should send a message to Aryan Brotherhood members and other prison gangs that the government will go after violent prison inmates.

"These two defendants have effectively been gutted," she said. "They will spend the rest of their lives hidden away in isolation in some prison."

Life Sentences For 2 Aryan Brotherhood Men (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

By The New York Times

SANTA ANA, Calif., Sept. 15 — Two Aryan Brotherhood members were spared a death sentence on Friday when jurors here reached an impasse after six days of deliberations in the penalty phase of their racketeering, murder and conspiracy trial.

The jury told Judge David O. Carter of Federal District Court on Thursday that it was deadlocked. Judge Carter ordered the panel to continue deliberations. On Friday, the jurors again declared an impasse, with nine of the 12 jurors favoring death for one man, Barry B. Mills, 57, and eight of the 12 favoring a life sentence for the other, Tyler D. Bingham, 58.

The judge is scheduled to sentence the two men to life terms on Nov. 13. Under the law, the prosecutors cannot ask for a new penalty phase.

“There is no real happy ending here, because both men are being sent back to the ADX, where they are going to spend the rest of their lives in the most secure prison in the United States,” Mark Fleming, a lawyer for Mr. Mills, said as he referred to a federal prison in Colorado.

The men were the first among 40 people in an indictment meant to bring down the Aryan Brotherhood.

Judge Declares Mistrial In Death Phase Of Aryan Brotherhood Trial (MERCN)

By Gillian Flaccus

The San Jose Mercury News, September 16, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - A federal judge declared a mistrial Friday in the death penalty phase of the trial of two Aryan Brotherhood leaders convicted of murder, racketeering and conspiracy after jurors announced they were unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

The ruling means Barry "The Baron" Mills and Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham will serve life in prison without parole. U.S. District Judge David O. Carter scheduled their sentencing for Nov. 13.

The same jury convicted Mills and Bingham in July. Jurors were then asked, in a separate proceeding, to determine whether Mills, 58, and Bingham, 59 should be sentenced to death or life in prison without possibility of parole.

After 3 1/2 days of deliberations, jurors told Carter on Thursday they were deadlocked, but he ordered them to return to the jury room and attempt to resolve their differences. After spending another day deliberating, they announced it would not be possible to reach a unanimous decision.

"We are honestly and conscientiously unable to agree after a full consideration of the evidence," the foreman said in a note sent to the judge.

The case against Mills and Bingham was part of a larger indictment that federal prosecutors hope will eventually dismantle the Aryan Brotherhood, the violent white supremacist organization that is accused of running powerful gambling operations and drug rings from inside some of the nation's most notorious prisons.

Among other things, the jury convicted Mills and Bingham of inciting a race riot at a prison in Lewisburg, Pa., in 1997 by conspiring to send a secret message to Aryan Brotherhood members. Frank Joyner and Abdul Salaam, alleged members of the rival DC Blacks prison gang, were killed during the uprising.

Charges against the pair were brought under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations law, and they were convicted of offenses known as Violent Crime in Aid of Racketeering - laws originally passed to target the Mafia. The so-called VICAR verdicts made Mills and Bingham eligible for the death penalty.

Experts say the full indictment, which lists 32 murders and attempted murders, makes up one of the largest federal capital punishment cases in U.S. history. Assistant U.S. Attorney Stephen Wolfe said up to 16 people potentially face execution in a half-dozen trials scheduled in the coming months in Orange County and Los Angeles.

Jurors told Carter Friday they were split nine to three in favor of death for Mills and eight to four in favor of life in prison for Bingham.

He asked if the extra day of deliberations had any impact on the vote and they said only slightly, adding one juror moved from voting for life in prison to voting for death for Mills.

DOJ_NMG_0063980

After Carter declared the mistrial, authorities escorted the jurors from the courtroom to their cars, and the judge said their identities would not be revealed.

Mills was already serving two life terms for nearly decapitating an inmate in 1979, but was eligible to apply for parole until Friday's ruling. Bingham, in jail on robbery and drug charges, would have been released in 2010.

Both were housed in ADX, the maximum-security prison in Florence, Colo., prior to the trial and will likely return there. Prosecutors said they will be held in solitary confinement 23 hours a day in a high-security wing that houses notorious convicts such as al-Qaida member Zacarias Moussaoui and Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Terri K. Flynn said the government's failure to win a death penalty verdict was "not a defeat."

"These two have effectively been gutted and they will be hidden away somewhere they can't do any more harm," she said. "It sent a message not only to the Aryan Brotherhood but to all the prison gangs that inmates can't kill other inmates, and if they do they will be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law."

One of Mills' attorneys, Mark Fleming, said his client was "relieved and appreciative" that the jury had spared him the death penalty.

Bingham attorney Michael White said his client was also relieved but that both were concerned about being housed once more in ADX.

"They're very concerned about what their life will be like. The ADX can be very restrictive, and the question is, how restrictive will they make it," White said.

Defense attorneys argued that one of the reasons jurors should spare the defendants' lives was because the inmate who actually killed the two black prisoners struck a deal with prosecutors. Under the deal, he was sentenced to nine years in prison and testified in the trial against Mills and Bingham.

Carter said he wanted to poll the jury in an effort to determine if that information had an impact on its members.

"These cases are costing millions of dollars. ... I think with the millions and millions of dollars they should be forthcoming," he said.

During the trial, government witnesses revealed many of the secret inner workings of the Aryan Brotherhood. Among other things, they told of a secret note, written in invisible ink made from urine, that was passed from Bingham's high-security cell in Florence, Colo., to Lewisburg. The note read: "War with DC Blacks, TD."

Mills and Bingham were also convicted of a count of murder for the killing of Arva Lee Ray, a prisoner slain at the Lompoc, Calif., penitentiary in 1989, as well as counts of racketeering that included acts of murder and attempted murder.

Two other men who went on trial with Mills and Bingham - Edgar "The Snail" Hevle and Christopher Overton Gibson - will be sentenced to life in prison.

Seniors Call For Action Against Fraud (MH)

By John Dorschner

The Miami Herald, September 18, 2006

When Muriel Sherman, 81, decided to go to war against Medicare fraud, she found a lot of seniors who wanted to join her.

Her story, reported in The Miami Herald last month, has sparked a wave of responses from seniors with similar stories about their identities being used for widespread fraud that FBI officials estimates runs $1 billion a year in South Florida alone.

Because their comments were so numerous and so intense, The Miami Herald has decided to open a forum on its website dedicated to healthcare fraud. (Go to MiamiHerald.com and click on Health).

The forum will consist of comments of seniors and others whose identities have been used, announcements from law enforcement and news reports. It will be updated frequently as developments occur.

"After I read this wonderful article, I went immediately to my summary notices, and I saw I too was a victim," wrote A. Friedman of North Dade in one of several dozen responses. 'I'm very irate. I've already called Medicare . . . I got the phone number of the service that did the billing and I called. I got a recording in Spanish. I told them: `I'm reporting you to the FBI and the Herald! You better stop this.' "

Phil Wall of Kendall had a suggestion: ``Has anyone yet realized that Muriel Sherman, and thousands more seniors who are just as irked by what's going on, represent an untapped mass of unlimited resources that would gladly get busy and identify dozens of frauds every hour if their efforts were productive of anything but yawns on the part of the folks who take the reports?. . .

'My own experience in reporting 25 or 30 obvious frauds has told me plainly that all the protections presently in place amount to a very bad joke. Never before has there been such an immediate need for `whistle-blowers' by hundreds of thousands!! Might a small reward be workable?"

Timothy J. Delaney, assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Miami Division, warned seniors not to do investigations on their own. ``I would leave that up to the professionals."

Delaney, who previously was the FBI's national case manager for healthcare fraud cases, acknowledged that healthcare fraud is a huge issue here, particularly in durable medical equipment, a long-standing concern, and in expensive HIV/AIDS infusion treatments, which was first revealed as a massive problem in a Miami Herald report last year.

"It is a huge problem, but there are many people trying to do something about it," Delaney said. Thirty of the Miami division's 390 case agents are dedicated to healthcare fraud.

Seniors can help by taking a careful look at their explanations of benefits that arrive periodically in the mail from Medicare. If they spot something odd on their bills -- particularly charges for clinics or doctors they've never been to -- they should start by calling the 1-800 number on their EOB form. They can also call the Medicare fraud hot line at 1-800-447-8477.

"I don't encourage calling the FBI," said Delaney. "Any single complaint is not enough" to launch an investigation. "Every citizen has the right to call the FBI," but in healthcare fraud cases, the agents generally fill out a form and forward the information to investigators.

Several seniors have told The Miami Herald that when they called Medicare to complain about fraud, they were told that an investigation is not launched until $1 million in claims has been built up.

Delaney acknowledged there was a threshold for investigations, but he refused to say what it was. Healthcare fraud cases tend to be complicated, he said, with agents having to gather records from several different sources -- meaning it can take months to bring a case to an indictment.

Meanwhile, many persons are irate. "If a person walked into a bank with a note demanding $1,000, the FBI would be on the case in seconds, and they would be arrested and prosecuted. We have people stealing millions and nothing is happening," Jim Nolan wrote to The Miami Herald. ``Every American taxpayer and the business community is paying for this fraud. Does it take 80-year-old woman and her husband to go to a phony store front to get some attention?"

As for Muriel Sherman, now 81, she said that since the report was published, she received a copy of a two-page letter the FBI sent Medicare fraud investigators about her case. But she's received no word about anything action against the clinic that billed her for visits she never made.

Sweep Targets Medicare Fraud (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, September 18, 2006

MIAMI - Medicare recipient J.D. got a $3,500 artificial leg and a $2,900 arm prosthesis. For F.R., it was a $2,320 prosthetic arm with locking elbow and a $6,840 artificial leg. Medicare provided M.C. with a $1,200 shoulder apparatus and a $1,700 device for a below-knee amputation.

Each of these people, identified in court documents only by their initials, is a real Medicare beneficiary who lives in the Miami area. But none of them lost even a finger, much less two limbs.

Instead, federal prosecutors say they were paid by a crooked medical devices company for use of their Medicare status to steal more than $3 million from the nation's health care program for the elderly. The company's owners also paid doctors kickbacks to write false prescriptions for the devices, investigators say.

Such schemes are all too common in the retirement haven of Florida, second only to California with more than 3 million Medicare recipients, according to 2005 Medicare data. Three urban counties in South Florida - Broward, Miami-Dade and Palm Beach - are home to almost a third of all Florida's recipients, and have become a national hotbed for fraud.

Borrowing a tactic used successfully against drug traffickers, federal prosecutors in Miami are attacking the problem by focusing on both the "street-level" scams that typically involve between $1 million and $5 million in fraud as well as the high-dollar cases involving large health providers.

Since last October, the effort has result in criminal charges against more than 100 people in 63 separate cases and civil lawsuits against another 38 defendants. All told, the cases over this one-year period involved more than $100 million in Medicare fraud, Miami U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta said.

In past years, Acosta said, criminals widely thought that investigators wouldn't waste much time on relatively small-dollar fraud amounts of $1 million or $2 million.

"Word on the street that you could fly under the federal radar is not a good thing," Acosta said. "We're talking real money here. I think this is a serious problem."

DOJ_NMG_0063982

The crackdown involves several federal, state and local agencies. Miami and Los Angeles are also the only two cities where investigators are using sophisticated data analysis techniques to uncover Medicare fraud patterns, Medicare spokesman Peter Ashkenaz said.

"When we see there is a pattern, we start looking into it," he said.

Such patterns include unusual surges in Medicare billings from particular clinics or medical suppliers. Analysts also focus on billings for certain items that are prone to fraud. For example, investigators in Florida focused on AIDS drug fraud when they encountered more claims for certain drugs than there are AIDS patients in the entire state.

Two Miami men were arrested earlier this month for running a clinic that altered blood samples so the "patients" - who had been paid with cash or gift cards - appeared to be in need of a serious and costly AIDS drug treatment. That scheme defrauded Medicare of $1.4 million.

FBI Papers Portray How Fund-raiser Became A Power Player (PHI)

By Carrie Budoff

The Philadelphia Inquirer, September 18, 2006

When Democrat Bob Casey Jr. needed money for his gubernatorial race, there was one man he couldn't do without: fund-raiser extraordinaire Robert M. Feldman.

Casey wasn't the only Feldman fan. Short and courtly, with a taste for expensive suits and power lunches at the Palm, Feldman also raised millions for other politicians, such as Gov. Rendell, Mayor Street, and former New Jersey Gov. Jim McGreevey.

No longer. Ever since Feldman got entangled in an FBI investigation into Philadelphia corruption and another in Puerto Rico, he has lived in exile from the political world he once walked as a king.

Casey, for one, still calls Feldman "a very good friend," but takes pains to point out that Feldman is playing no role in his campaign for U.S. Senate.

Feldman has become an issue in the race anyway. Casey's opponent, Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, is airing a TV ad that, without naming Feldman, refers to him as Casey's "handpicked finance chairman" and notes he was under federal investigation.

Feldman has not been charged with any wrongdoing, and appears to remain under scrutiny only in Puerto Rico, where federal authorities are investigating his role in campaign contributions to the island's governor. Feldman has said he did nothing improper.

Although his days as a kingmaker are on hiatus, maybe permanently, a remarkably candid portrait of Feldman's dealings has emerged from a court case and FBI wiretaps of conversations with the late dealmaker Ronald White. The documents had not been previously made public.

Feldman could raise money at a fantastic clip, $25,000 to $50,000 at a time, the bulk of it from a small group of donors, reports show.

And lots of money flowed to Feldman, too, thanks to his ability to open doors. Some donors in his network paid Feldman more than $4 million in fees to get them "in front of decision makers," Feldman said in documents in a civil lawsuit.

Feldman also sought deals for himself.

In a Sept. 24, 2003, taped conversation, Feldman pressed White to cut him into a Penn's Landing redevelopment project, saying he had yet to reap rewards from his investment in Street.

"I've got nothing. I've raised a ton of money for the mayor. I'm raising right now for him," Feldman said. "Maybe I should make this my 'big ask.' "

Feldman, 59, of Gladwyne, declined be interviewed for this article. His attorney, Henry E. Hockeimer, declined to comment.

Casey says he has worked hard to make sure his campaign contributions are proper; he says he shouldn't be criticized for Feldman's legal problems. Republicans are trying to "smear me any way they can," he says.

Casey and Rendell say they had no clue Feldman was getting paid as a consultant by donors, and they were never personally lobbied by him.

"I was never aware of it," Casey said. "I don't know about, nor should I know about, his private business ventures."

A rapid rise

In a world where it can take years for a bit player to become a big player, Feldman seemed to come out of nowhere.

He was a high school dropout who pushed himself, earning a GED and spending almost two years at Trenton Junior College and the School of Industrial Arts (now Mercer County Community College) before leaving. He worked as an insurance broker, then in construction. Eventually, he began a managed-care dental company that sold plans to labor unions and corporations.

DOJ_NMG_0063983

When it came to political fund-raising, Feldman rose quickly.

In a court statement, he identified himself as finance chair for Democrat Mark Singel's 1994 race for governor and then-Republican Barbara Hafer's 1996 state treasurer's bid.

Raising money for Democrat Marty Weinberg's Philadelphia 1999 mayoral campaign, Feldman went head to head against fund-raising powerhouses such as State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo (D., Phila.) - often beating them.

"I had never seen him before. I had never heard of him before," said Ken Smukler, a Philadelphia political strategist who met Feldman on Weinberg's campaign. "The guy goes gangbusters in raising money."

Political players spent a lot of time trying to figure out what made Feldman tick. The consensus: It wasn't really ideology, or even business.

"He likes to be perceived as being important and being in the inner circle of whatever candidate he picks," said consultant Howard Cain, a longtime political operative for Fumo. "He likes to be courted by candidates and acknowledged. It may be simple as that."

After Weinberg lost, Feldman moved seamlessly into Street's mayoral campaign, as finance cochairman.

Soon, Casey came calling for help in the governor's race.

"I knew he was a really good guy and a great fund-raiser, and I had a lot of work to do to raise money," Casey said. "It was pretty simple."

Feldman had built significant fund-raising muscle, and he began to exercise it. One example came in 2001, when Feldman served simultaneously as top fund-raiser for gubernatorial campaigns in two states - Casey's in Pennsylvania and McGreevey's in New Jersey.

As usual, Feldman's network of donors sent hundreds of thousands of dollars to assist both men, records show.

This time, $250,000 donated to Casey was sent across the Delaware River into New Jersey.

The donations came in two installments, in March and October 2001, and were distributed to four political committees supporting McGreevey, finance records show.

The money transfers are striking because of their size and timing; in 2001, Casey was struggling to raise money for a primary fight against the better-financed Rendell.

Casey aides said it was a strategy: They hoped to generate good will in New Jersey so money would flow back to Casey.

Through the May 2002 Democratic primary, New Jersey donors gave $1.2 million to Casey and $885,000 to Rendell, records show.

Casey says he's now fuzzy on the details.

"I do remember we contributed to him or committees that were supporting him," Casey said of McGreevey.

Casey matched Rendell's fund-raising, but still lost the primary. Soon after, Feldman became one of Rendell's four finance cochairmen.

Providing access

Feldman's ability to deliver $25,000, $50,000, and sometimes $100,000 donations, seemingly with ease, confounded his rivals. The beneficiaries marveled at it.

"He was one of those guys who didn't do a lot of posturing or a lot of talking. He just came in with checks," said Shawn Fordham, Street's campaign manager in the 2003 race.

Flashy - he and Ron White rode chaffeured Mercedeses with their initials imprinted on the license plates - but also intensely private, Feldman rarely talked about his consulting business, political associates say.

In newly filed court documents, Feldman gave some details about his life as a top political dealmaker.

At least five firms, whose principals formed the foundation of his fund-raising network, paid Feldman to "primarily help with meetings, access."

"Say I am having lunch with someone and I may have three consulting clients," Feldman said in a court statement. "If the person that I am meeting with would have some interest in any of my clients, I would mention them.

"It is not time-consuming."

The five firms that paid Feldman as a consultant put $636,000 into Casey's gubernatorial campaign, $546,000 into Street's campaigns between 1999 and 2003, and $230,000 into Rendell's campaign in 2002, records show.

The most detailed disclosures concern Investment Management Advisory Group, or Image, a politically active Chester County investment firm to governments and nonprofits.

Feldman began consulting for Image in May 2000, earning more than $1.2 million through 2003, court documents show.

His compensation spiked in the months after McGreevey took office, rising from $30,000 in January 2002 to $187,000 in August 2002, court documents show. At that time, Image's government portfolio expanded as the firm won more than $4 million in work from the McGreevey administration, according to news reports.

It was Feldman's business partnership with White, the Philadelphia lawyer indicted on corruption charges, that attracted FBI scrutiny.

Together they raised money for Street and McGreevey, and tried to generate deals for themselves and people in their fund-raising network.

It didn't always run smoothly.

In that September 2003 taped conversation, White told Feldman that there was no more room in the Penn's Landing deal. White went on to protest that he was delivering for their "whole network," mentioning Image and Hill International, a Marlton construction company.

"Whatever you needed, I went in and asked for. For you," White said. "We got a lot."

"Me?" Feldman said.

"Well, your people," White said.

Not good enough, Feldman replied.

"When I raise money, they got to help me, too... so that I can continue to raise money," Feldman said.

Executives from Image declined to comment; Hill executives failed to respond to interview requests.

For more than a year after the FBI probe went public, Casey stood by his man, keeping him on as chairman of his 2004 state treasurer's race. Casey says he didn't give Feldman a role in his U.S. Senate campaign.

Casey says Feldman's legal woes aren't the reason.

"When you run for federal office, it is a different process, a different system," Casey said.

Feldman has donated just $1,000 in the U.S. Senate race - to Santorum, in 2003. Santorum later gave the money to charity.

An ongoing FBI investigation into the campaign finances of Puerto Rico's governor, Anibal Acevedo Vila, has renewed the controversy around Feldman.

Authorities suspect that tens of thousands of dollars from Philadelphia-area donors in 2002 were "straw contributions" to avoid finance limits. Feldman has said he did only one Vila fund-raiser, and was not involved in any improper contributions.

Some of the checks under scrutiny were raised by Feldman and his business partner, Candido Negron, who was also generous to Casey ($192,000) and Rendell ($75,000) in the 2002 governor's race.

Feldman stopped fund-raising a year ago, and has turned his focus to real estate, among other ventures. He enjoyed being indispensable to candidates, but was wounded by news coverage of the City Hall bug probe, close friends say.

He no longer receives the adoration on display at a 2001 dinner, when a cast of heavyweights - Casey, Street, White, McGreevey, Hafer - paid tribute to him.

From the podium, Street described their close relationship, joking that anybody who could get his wife "to come to an event on a Saturday night - that's a special person."

Fordham, the mayor's aide, said recently that he couldn't recall the last time Street and Feldman had spoken.

Lucrative Consulting Work

Robert M. Feldman performed consulting work for at least five firms that paid him more than $4 million combined between 1999 and 2003, according to court documents. This is a partial list of clients and government work they have received, although in some cases it is unclear what role, if any, Feldman played in getting that work.

Young Gotti Was A Boss Until 1999, Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Timothy Williams

The New York Times, September 16, 2006

John A. Gotti's lawyer acknowledged for the first time yesterday that his client had once been the boss of the Gambino organized crime family. But when Mr. Gotti gave up the Mafia life in 1999, the lawyer said, his withdrawal was heartfelt and true.

The statement by the lawyer, Charles Carnesi, came during closing arguments in Mr. Gotti's racketeering trial in federal District Court in Manhattan. A federal prosecutor, in her closing arguments, said Mr. Gotti's claim to have quit the Mafia was a ruse to avoid prosecution.

But Mr. Carnesi said his client had soured on the mob life. "The message is: 'I went to the very top of this life and it's no good. It destroys you and your family. It's not worth the toll,' " Mr. Carnesi said.

Mr. Gotti, 42, known as Junior, claims to have retired from the Gambino family in July 1999, about the time he began serving a six-year federal prison sentence on unrelated racketeering charges. If Mr. Gotti convinces the jury that he left the Mafia before the summer of 1999, he cannot be convicted on the racketeering counts because of a five-year statute of limitations.

Mr. Carnesi said that as a child, Mr. Gotti was exposed to a world of penitentiaries, social clubs and violent felons. Mob life, Mr. Carnesi said, was "pretty exciting" until Mr. Gotti was facing prison in the late 1990's and realized "the whole thing was a lie, it was an illusion."

The lawyer said one of Mr. Gotti's most difficult moments was during a 1999 prison visit to his father, John J. Gotti, then the Gambino boss, when he told his father that he wanted to quit the Mafia. The elder Gotti died in prison of cancer in 2002.

" 'I know you're dying in jail,' " Mr. Carnesi said the son told his father. " 'I know you gave your life for this thing, but it's not for me.' " The lawyer said the elder Mr. Gotti had accepted his son's decision.

Mr. Carnesi said, "There came a point that the boy becomes a man."

But the prosecutor, Miriam E. Rocah, hammered away at Mr. Gotti's "withdrawal" defense, saying recordings of him in prison, made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, show he continued to try to exert influence in the crime family.

"Just because you are in prison does not mean you are not still involved in the life," Ms. Rocah said. "He was still a full-fledged member of the Gambino crime family at this time."

Ms. Rocah said that in an attempt to avoid prosecution in the future, Mr. Gotti, knowing the F.B.I. was taping his prison conversations, had developed a strategy of telling visitors that he had left "the life" behind.

"Gotti wanted to be able to say in a courtroom like this one that 'I've had nothing to do with the mob life for five years, and so whatever happened before doesn't matter,' " she said. "Before he was even charged with a crime, Gotti was planting the lies he would someday use."

But Mr. Carnesi attacked the F.B.I. tapes that are at the center of the government's case, particularly a recording from 2003 in which prosecutors say Mr. Gotti can be heard complaining about a demotion to "captain" in the Gambino family.

Mr. Carnesi said that the word "captain" had never been uttered, though he did not say what the conversation had been about.

As part of the racketeering case, Mr. Gotti is accused of committing or ordering crimes including witness tampering, extortion and money laundering. He is also charged with helping to plot the 1992 kidnapping and beating of Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk show host and founder of the Guardian Angels, who frequently criticized the Gottis on his program.

Growing Up Gotti (NSDY)

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2006

Defense argues 'Junior' wanted to be like his mobster dad, but was turned off by 'treachery' and 'deceit'

John A. Gotti wanted to emulate his father's life as a gangster but quickly soured on the mob when he saw the treachery, deceit and murder it involved, a defense attorney told a jury Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0063986

Summing up for Gotti in his Manhattan federal racketeering trial, attorney Charles Carnesi said that as a young man, his client was intoxicated with the respect his late father, Gambino boss John J. Gotti, received.

"'I don't know what he does but I want to be just like him,'" Carnesi characterized the younger Gotti's thoughts as a boy growing up in Howard Beach. "That is how boys feel about their fathers."

Gotti, 42, is on trial for the third time on racketeering charges that include conspiracy, loan-sharking, extortion and involvement in the 1992 kidnapping attempt of radio talk show host and Guardian Angel founder Curtis Sliwa.

His client's own version of growing up as a Gotti included following in his father's footsteps with the 1988 induction into the Gambino crime family, a move that cemented his position in the crime clan, Carnesi said. But after a few years, the younger Gotti, known as "Junior," became disillusioned with mob life, the lawyer said.

"There is a point where the boy becomes a man; a man learns it is not like that," said Carnesi, referring to the romanticized notion of La Cosa Nostra. Instead, Gotti saw the death of men he knew and days filled with "treachery and deceit," the lawyer said.

Gotti's first two trials, one in 2005 and one earlier this year, ended in mistrials. As he did in the past, Gotti maintains in the current trial that he withdrew from the Gambino crime family life by July 21, 1999, more than five years before the current indictment. That date is crucial because it would place the charges outside the statute of limitations.

In wrapping up the prosecution's closing statements Friday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Miriam E. Rocah, said that Gotti's claim of quitting the mob was a lie to dodge the charges he faces.

Judge Shira Scheindlin is slated to charge the jury Monday.

For more than three hours, as Gotti sometimes nodded his head in assent, Carnesi attacked the prosecution's case, attempting to cast doubts on the credibility of the government witnesses. Carnesi also tried to show how Gotti backed away from playing an active role in the crime family affairs.

Carnesi spent some time trying to show how government witnesses testifying about the attack on Sliwa gave accounts which were inconsistent with what Sliwa testified. In a switch at this trial, Sliwa was called by the defense, and although hostile to Gotti, contradicted prosecution witnesses on details of the attack in which he suffered a serious gunshot wound.

Going after 'Junior'

Previous two trials: Summer 2005 and winter 2006

Prosecution case:

Prosecutors alleged that John A. Gotti was a key member of Gambino crime family racketeering conspiracy, including 1992 abduction and shooting of Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa.

Defense case:

Gotti dropped out of membership and an active role in the mob by July 21, 1999.

Results:

On eve of 2005 trial, government dropped murder conspiracy charges. In September 2005, jury acquitted Gotti on securities fraud and couldn't reach a verdict on remaining charges. A mistrial resulted.

In March retrial, jury couldn't come to a unanimous agreement on Gotti's withdrawal from mob defense. A mistrial resulted.

Current Trial: August 2006.

Prosecution case:

The government added an obstruction of justice charge related to alleged attempt to get Michael "Mickey Scars" DiLeonardo, Gotti's former friend and mob crony, not to become a government witness in 2002 and 2003.

Defense case:

The withdrawal from the mob defense is still key. Defense elicited testimony from DiLeonardo's son to rebut allegations the youngster was used to try to keep his father from testifying.

Lawyers Make Last Bid To Sway Jr. Jury (NYDN)

By Thomas Zambito, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, September 16, 2006

John Gotti only had two choices when the son he had groomed to be his successor as boss of the Gambino crime family told him in 1999 that he wanted out of the mob.

"He can kill his son or he can let him out and he can say, 'Okay, I'm done with him. He doesn't exist,'" attorney Charles Carnesi told jurors yesterday during summations in John A. (Junior) Gotti's racketeering conspiracy trial.

"John Gotti Sr. was a tough guy...but he loved his son," Carnesi said.

DOJ_NMG_0063987

The mob scion "found the strength to say 'I went to the very top of this life and it's no good,'" Carnesi said. "It destroys you and your family. It's not worth the toll."

Carnesi tried to convince jurors that Gotti had left "the life" by July 1999 - a key point in time since prosecutors must show that Gotti had committed at least one of the racketeering crimes in the conspiracy after that date.

But prosecutor Miriam Rocah said Gotti never fully left the Gambinos and pointed to the mounds of mob money she said flowed into companies Gotti controlled after July 1999.

And she pointed to tapes of Gotti, intercepted by the feds in 2003 and 2004 while Gotti was serving a six-year prison term, talking about the need to "put a different seed in people's head" to convince law enforcement that he was no longer the acting boss of the Gambino family.

"Gotti wanted to be able to say in a courtroom like this one, I've had nothing to do with the Mafia for five years," Rocah told jurors.

The jury of seven women and five men is expected to start deliberating Monday in the federal government's third attempt at convicting Gotti.

Gotti, 42, is accused in a wide-ranging conspiracy of loansharking, extortion, witness tampering and conspiring to kidnap radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Over the past year, jurors at Gotti's previous two trials were deadlocked.

Sliwa was shot twice after he jumped from a speeding cab by thugs prosecutors say were sent by Gotti. Gotti was "furious" at Sliwa's relentless on-air attacks on the Gotti clan that included calling his uncles "drug dealers," Rocah said.

"The Gottis care a lot about their public image, so it's really no surprise that John Gotti wanted to silence Curtis Sliwa," Rocah said.

But Carnesi told jurors that the prosecutors didn't put Sliwa on the witness stand because they knew his account didn't gibe with one delivered by the driver of the cab, mob informant Joseph (Little Joey) D'Angelo.

'JUNIOR': MY FATHER 'FREED' ME (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, September 16, 2006

John "Dapper Don" Gotti's absolute power over the violent Gambino crime family allowed son "Junior" to break a mob rule that no other wiseguy could - to retire from the Mafia, a defense lawyer argued yesterday.

Gotti's attorney Charles Carnesi told a Manhattan federal jury that the elder Gotti had just "two choices" when his oldest son and heir apparent announced his desire for "closure."

"He can kill his son or he can let him out," Carnesi said. "John Gotti Sr. was a tough guy, a boss, but he wasn't going to hurt his son or let anyone else hurt him."

John "Junior" Gotti has claimed that he left the mob in 1999 and therefore cannot be convicted of racketeering charges - including the sensational 1992 kidnapping of radio host Curtis Sliwa - under a five-year statute of limitations.

Gotti's lawyer told jurors the mob scion rejected organized crime after seeing the destructive impact his father's imprisonment had on his family - and embraced a new message.

'Junior' Gotti Laments Loss Of Manliness (NSDY/AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 16, 2006

NEW YORK -- As he languished in a federal prison in 2003, John "Junior" Gotti had plenty to worry about.

The jail, he told visitors, was crawling with informants. He had money problems. Old friends were getting indicted. Other members of the Gotti clan were stealing his money.

But at the root of his troubles was this: The modern mob, he lamented, was losing its manliness.

"Now are we men? Or are we punks or rats or weasels? You tell me," he angrily asked one friend while serving a racketeering sentence.

Gotti's conversations were routinely recorded before his release from prison last year, and the tapes have played a central role in his current racketeering trial in Manhattan. A jury was to begin deliberating the case Monday.

Among other things, the son of the legendary mafia boss "Dapper Don" John Gotti is accused of ordering an attack on Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa, who was shot twice by would-be kidnappers in 1992.

Prosecutors contend that "Junior" Gotti was involved in mob affairs even after he was imprisoned in 1999.

The defense says the recordings, made at the federal prison at Ray Brook, N.Y., show that Gotti had developed a distaste for mob life and retired.

DOJ_NMG_0063988

In any case, the tapes provide an inside look at the gangster's code, particularly its obsession with "being a man" at all costs.

Lesson No. 1: Men fight.

"If a guy wants to get all fancy and prancy, if he picks his hands up to you, you pick your hands up back. You're not a punk," Gotti explained in one recorded discussion.

"No hiding behind fences," he said during another conversation. "Take our coats off like gentlemen. Now, let's see. Let's see who the tough guy is. No knives. No guns. Like gentleman. ... Let's see who the real man really is."

Lesson No. 2: Men tolerate no assault on their character.

Gotti is firm on this point when he discusses two uncles who diminished his leadership role in the gang by badmouthing him to his father in 2001, a year before the elder Gotti's death from cancer in prison.

"If any of them ever come here, I'm telling you, I swear it to you, on my dead brother and my dead father, I swear to you, I will meet them by that (prison) door, with two padlocks in my hands and I will crack their skulls, I promise you that. I promise you that. This I take as a solemn oath as a man."

Lesson No. 3: Manliness is in the blood.

"You're a real man," he told longtime friend John Ruggiero. "You wanna know why, John? Not only for who you are. But for who your father was. You got his genes, you're a man."

A person who isn't a man, he added, can't simply become one by acting tough.

"These ain't men you're dealing with, you're dealing with frauds," he said. "It's like a kid who gets (unintelligible) all his life ... and he gets his milk money taken. What does he grow up to be? A cop. He's got a gun and a badge. That's, that's his equalizer. Got a gun and a badge, now he's a man. Well, that's how all these guys are, John, they're no different."

Lesson No. 4: A man spends time with family.

"Listen, I love my brother," Gotti said. "But my brother's a bum. That's all he is. No more, no less. He doesn't spend a moment with his own children. I have a hard time respecting any man who doesn't spend any time with his wife and kids."

Lesson No. 5: Men can do prison time.

"Some guys are made for this. Some guys just aren't," Gotti said of his life behind bars.

"Gravano was an example," he said, speaking of Gambino crime family turncoat Salvatore "Sammy the Bull" Gravano. "I mean he was a legendary soldier in the street. Brooklyn, he was a legend in Brooklyn. He got to jail, he fell to pieces."

Lesson No. 6: Real men don't snitch, but if they do, they don't make stuff up.

"Bottom line is, if you're gonna become a rat, become a rat: Tell the f------ truth. Don't go out of your way to hurt people," he said.

This is Gotti's third trial on the latest racketeering charges. The first two ended when jurors deadlocked on the charges, in part because of the defense argument that he became disenchanted with the mafia and retired long enough ago that the legal deadline for prosecuting him for old crimes had expired.

Which brings us to Gotti's Lesson No. 7: Mafia life stinks.

"So much treachery ... My father couldn't have loved me, to push me into this life," he lamented to friend Steve Kaplan.

"Oh ... I'd rather be a Latin King than be what I am," he said, referring to the Hispanic street gang. "I swear to you, Steve, and I, I mean it on my father's grave. I'm so ashamed. I am so ashamed."

Did Victim's Photo Prejudice A Jury? (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — For Jim Studer, wearing a button with a photo of his brother, Tom, was a simple way of bearing witness for him at the trial of Tom's accused killer, Mathew Musladin.

"He was my big brother, and he was very protective of me when I was a kid," Studer said.

Little did he think the buttons he and his parents wore to the trial in San Jose would nearly free the man convicted of Tom's murder — or put the killer's case before the Supreme Court. But he had not considered that Musladin would someday have a chance to bring his case before the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

For years, the Supreme Court has cast a critical eye on the liberal-leaning 9th Circuit, particularly in cases involving crime and the death penalty. The justices will consider two of those cases soon after they return next month.

On the first day of Musladin's trial more than a decade ago, Studer and his parents, who had traveled from Missouri, sat in the front row of the courtroom, directly behind the prosecutor. Each wore a button with a photo of Tom.

DOJ_NMG_0063989

Like the jury, they heard the facts of the case: On May 13, 1994, Musladin arrived early at the home of his estranged wife, Pamela, to pick up their 3-year-old son for a weekend visit. The two exchanged angry words, and Musladin threw her to the driveway.

When she called for help, her fiance, Tom Studer, and her brother, Michael Albaugh, came running. Musladin had a .45caliber pistol in his car and began shooting. Studer was hit in the back and crawled under a truck in the garage to escape. Musladin followed him and shot again, hitting him in the head and killing him.

Musladin also followed Albaugh into the house, but he hid in a bathroom. Pamela escaped over the fence to another house. Musladin was captured after a high-speed chase on U.S. 101.

When his case came to trial, Musladin claimed self-defense, saying that Pamela and her fiance were drug users and that he had feared for his life. The jury convicted him of first-degree murder and attempted murder, and he was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison.

There matters stood until the 9th Circuit heard his appeal last year. The 26-member court hears cases — usually in three-judge panels — from California and eight other Western states. It has some decidedly liberal judges, and Musladin's case came before two of them: Stephen Reinhardt of Los Angeles and Marsha S. Berzon of San Francisco.

In a 2-1 decision, the judges reversed Musladin's conviction, saying that the buttons worn by Studer's family deprived Musladin of a fair trial.

According to Reinhardt, the photo buttons — described by the prosecutor as 2 inches in diameter and by Musladin's lawyer as 3 to 4 inches — conveyed a "specific message."

"The buttons essentially 'argue' that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty," Reinhardt said.

He continued: "A reasonable jurist would be compelled to conclude that the buttons worn by Studer's family members conveyed the message that the defendant was guilty."

That was not the view of the trial judge or the California state courts.

When a defense lawyer objected at the start of the trial and described the buttons as "inappropriate," the judge disagreed: "There is no legend on the buttons," he said. "I see no possible prejudice to the defendant."

It was noted that the prosecutor could have held up a photo of Studer for the jury to see. Had he survived the shooting, the victim could have sat in the courtroom himself.

The state appeals court also saw no harm.

"The simple photograph of Tom Studer was unlikely to have been taken as a sign of anything other than the normal grief occasioned by the loss of a family member," its judges wrote in upholding Musladin's conviction.

Seven judges of the 9th Circuit objected to Reinhardt's opinion — seven fewer than the majority needed for the full appeals court to review it.

"Musladin shall be released unless the state elects to retry him within 90 days," Reinhardt wrote in October 2005.

State prosecutors petitioned the U.S. Supreme Court, which voted to hear the case. Oral arguments are set for Oct. 11.

It is one of two Reinhardt opinions that the justices will consider in the first days of their new term.

The second reversed a death sentence handed down in 1982 for a man who broke into the home of a 21-year-old woman in the San Joaquin Valley, beat her to death with a metal dumbbell, stole her stereo and sold it for $100.

When Fernando Belmontes was caught, his accomplices testified against him. After his conviction, prosecutors told jurors of his violent past, including a recent brutal assault on his pregnant girlfriend.

Twenty-one years after the jury sentenced Belmontes to die, his federal appeal came before a three-judge panel that included Reinhardt and Richard A. Paez of Los Angeles. In a 2-1 decision, they reversed the death sentence on the grounds that jurors might not have taken into account "the defendant's potential for a positive adjustment to life in prison."

California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer appealed that ruling to the Supreme Court, which set it aside in a one-line order in March 2005. The justices urged Reinhardt and Paez to reconsider their decision in light of a recent high court ruling that restored the death sentence for an Orange County murderer after it too had been reversed by the 9th Circuit.

In July 2005, the two appellate judges reaffirmed their original decision. Eight of their 9th Circuit colleagues dissented — again, short of the majority required for the full court to consider the case.

When Lockyer appealed on behalf of San Quentin State Prison Warden Steven W. Ornoski, the Supreme Court voted to hear the case of Ornoski vs. Belmontes. It will be argued Oct. 3, the first morning of oral arguments for the new term.

In the last term alone, the high court took up 18 cases from the 9th Circuit and reversed 15 of them.

In the Supreme Court, "there is almost a palpable skepticism for what comes out of the 9th Circuit," said Vikram Amar, a professor at UC Hastings College of the Law in San Francisco.

DOJ_NMG_0063990

"They don't have any faith that Reinhardt calls it straight. I don't want to call him a bad judge, but a lot of these decisions are hard to understand," added Amar, who was a clerk for the 9th Circuit and the Supreme Court.

Nominated to the 9th Circuit by President Carter in 1980, Reinhardt has described himself as one of the last unabashed liberals on the federal bench. When asked once whom he most admired as a judge, he named the late Justice William J. Brennan Jr., the liberal leader of the Supreme Court during the 1970s and 1980s.

Brennan "had a broad and generous, rather than a cramped and niggardly, view of the law … and he understood that the ultimate role of the law was to serve the interests of justice," Reinhardt said in a 2004 interview on Howard J. Bashman's legal blog, "How Appealing." Asked about the current high court, Reinhardt said it was "a straight, unabashed, highly conservative institution."

Conservatives regularly point to Reinhardt, 75, as a "liberal activist" on the bench. He formed part of the 2-1 majority that ruled the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance were unconstitutional. He also wrote an opinion for the full 9th Circuit ruling that dying people had a right to lethal medication supplied by a physician. The Supreme Court reversed this opinion unanimously in 1997 and said the "right to die" issue should be decided by states and their elected legislators.

Ten years ago, complaints about the 9th Circuit spurred Congress to rein in the authority of federal judges to review state criminal convictions in cases that raised constitutional issues. The Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 says federal judges should defer to state courts and may not reverse a criminal conviction or prison term that has been upheld by a state court unless the decision obviously conflicts with "clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court."

Backers of the law said it was aimed directly at the 9th Circuit. These days, however, its supporters admit that the change has not worked as planned.

"The deference standard has not been effective. The 9th Circuit strains and goes around it," said Kent S. Scheidegger, legal director of the Criminal Justice Legal Foundation in Sacramento. "The Musladin case is an example of just that. It reflects an egregious disregard for the limit that Congress set."

What "clearly established law" was violated when the trial judge let the Studer family wear buttons with a photo of Tom in the courtroom?

In his decision, Reinhardt pointed to the Supreme Court's 1976 ruling in Estelle vs. Williams. In that case, the justices said it would be unfair to require a criminal defendant to wear jail clothes during his trial because that could cause the jury to infer that he was guilty.

"We conclude that no significant difference exists between the circumstances of this case" involving the buttons worn by the family and putting a defendant in jail clothes, Reinhardt said.

State lawyers were quick to note a significant difference: The first involved a defendant who was on trial; the second involved spectators in a courtroom.

Victims' rights groups were disturbed when Reinhardt used quote marks around the word "victim" in his Musladin ruling. For example, he said the case posed the issue of "when spectators are permitted to wear buttons depicting the 'victim.' " (A revised version of his ruling does not include such references.)

"That was very troubling. There is no dispute that someone was shot and died," said Meg Garvin, a program director at the National Crime Victim Law Institute in Portland, Ore. "The underlying issue is the right of the crime victim to be in the court. We don't understand how the mere image of the victim can be prejudicial."

The group filed a friend-of-the-court brief urging the high court to reverse the 9th Circuit's decision.

Jim Studer, a school administrator from Reno, Nev., said he had not come to grips with the notion that wearing a button with his brother's picture could result in a reversal of the killer's conviction.

"We wore it for the first two days only," he said. After defense lawyers objected, he said, the family decided to take off the buttons.

However, Musladin's family said the buttons were worn for the entire 14-day trial, and the appellate judges accepted that.

"I couldn't believe it when I heard about the decision" of the 9th Circuit, Studer said. "It still seems unfathomable to me that you can't have a picture of the victim in the courtroom."

More from Nation & World Capitol Crooks It started with the bribery indictment of California Rep. Randall "Duke" Cunningham, but before it's over, a sprawling investigation into a Pentagon contractor called MZM could snare some of Washington's most powerful inside players

In the fall of 2003, an influential Washington defense contractor named Mitchell Wade was shooting the bull with Haig Melkessetian, a senior executive in his company, at their elegant office not far from the White House. "Haig," Wade declared, "I have a good deal for us."

The contractor enthusiastically laid out his plan: His good friend, Randall "Duke" Cunningham, a decorated Vietnam War fighter pilot, was planning to lead a congressional delegation to Saudi Arabia on a mission to help Saudi officials improve their image in the wake of the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Melkessetian, a former Army Special Forces soldier and Arabic linguist, was taken aback. "I can't be on both sides of the fence," he told Wade, noting that their company, MZM Inc., was heavily involved in major counterterrorism projects with the Defense Department.

"Don't start that ideological crap with me," Wade snapped, according to Melkessetian's account. "I'm not here for ideology. I'm here to make money."

And make money he did-a cool $150 million in government contracts since 2002. But Wade's road to riches was one that would ultimately lead him to jail and ignominy, and, along the way, to a prison term for one lawmaker and still more criminal charges, in the next few days or weeks, against some of the most influential insiders in the nation's capital. Melkessetian, now a consultant for a U.S. intelligence agency, is helping federal prosecutors in a massive corruption investigation involving Wade, MZM, and Cunningham. The former eight-term Republican congressman from California pleaded guilty last November to accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes and favors from Wade; his mentor, Brent Wilkes, a San Diego-based defense contractor; and two other "unindicted coconspirators."

"A huge spider web." Cunningham "earmarked" millions of dollars in defense projects for Wade and Wilkes in a manner so brazen federal prosecutors called it "unparalleled" in the long, sordid history of congressional corruption. Cunningham now is serving an eight-year prison term, while Wade, 46, has pleaded guilty to paying Cunningham more than $1 million in bribes and is cooperating with prosecutors. Wade's sentencing has been postponed until next March. He faces a maximum prison term of 135 months. He declined to be interviewed for this account, as did his attorneys.

Prosecutors are using information from Melkessetian and his MZM colleagues to test Wade's veracity, to track cash or other assets he may be hiding, and to recommend the length of his prison sentence. The MZM employees have told investigators that they were unaware of Wade's corrupt acts, but as Melkessetian puts it, they suspected he was "up to no good."

Today, the FBI, the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, and the Defense Security Service are working with prosecutors to put the finishing touches on indictments against several other defense contractors, and senior defense and intelligence officials, who helped Wade with his corrupt activities. "We have been looking at everybody that's involved," says a federal law enforcement official. "Anytime you talk about defense contracting, it's a huge spider web."

Although Wilkes has not been charged, the government alleges that he gave more than $630,000 in bribes, gifts, and favors to Cunningham, and investigators now are trying to determine whether he obtained federal contracts through a high school buddy, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the former No.3 official at the CIA. Foggo resigned in May. His attorney has said that Foggo broke no laws. Investigators are also probing whether Wilkes provided limo services, hotel suites, and prostitutes to Cunningham. Wilkes is not cooperating with investigators. "Every single allegation is false, will be fought, and my client will be vindicated," says his attorney, Nancy Luque.

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

In the spring 2003 issue of the MZM newsletter, the Sentinel, Mitchell Wade extended prayers to American troops around the world and thanked his employees for supporting the troops in Iraq at this "perilous juncture." But MZM may have played a role in getting troops to Iraq, according to a national commission that investigated the intelligence failures that led to the war. The commission blamed the Pentagon's National Ground Intelligence Center (where Wade had analysts on contract through earmarks) that handled much of the military's prewar analysis of whether Saddam Hussein had developed nuclear precursor capabilities. The report didn't single out the MZM analysts but said that NGIC had "in particular displayed a disturbing lack of diligence and technical expertise."

Separately, in March 2003, MZM received a $1.2 million contract to send a team of 21 Arabic linguists to Iraq to serve as interpreters and assist the Office of Reconstruction and Humanitarian Assistance, which later became the Coalition Provisional Authority, or CPA. Haig Melkessetian was one of the linguists and also served on the protective detail of the CPA head, Ambassador Paul Bremer. Melkessetian says that half the linguists Wade assigned to the project did not speak fluent Arabic, and one contractor was a Russian linguist who spoke no Arabic.

When Melkessetian-who has worked for U.S. military and intelligence agencies extensively in the Middle East-returned from Iraq, he talked to Wade about the growing counterinsurgency problems. "I sent you there to make money," Wade responded. "I didn't send you there to fix Iraq."

"Fantastic job." In 2004, Wade hired a prominent Iranian businessman and Canadian resident named Behrooz Behbudi, a big contributor to the Republican Party, as his director of Middle Eastern development, paying him $15,000 a month to consult on Iraq. Behbudi says Wade wanted him to help redesign the Central Bank of Iraq, destroyed in the war. The bill: $15 million. "We would have done a fantastic job finishing it," says Behbudi. "Our prices were very, very competitive." Wade, by then in a financial crunch, refused to pay.

Wade bragged about his military ties, Behbudi says: "He said he had a phone directly connected to DOD. He told me, 'My office is an extension of the Defense Department.'"

Iran was also on Wade's mind. "He came to me and said, 'I'm very interested,'" says Behbudi, "'in removing the mullahs.'" In April 2004, Wade and Behbudi formed the Iranian Democratization Foundation. Their timing was perfect. In November 2004, Congress approved $3 million for Iranian democratization efforts. But Wade and his partners eventually dissolved the foundation because of personal differences. Even right up till the end, though, Wade still had his finger on the pulse of Congress and the Bush administration. This year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice asked Congress for $75 million to promote democracy in Iran.

The outing of CIA operative Valerie Wilson (nÃ© Plame) consumed Washington for three years. Police Agencies Find It Hard To Require Degrees (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Last February, the Plano, Texas, Police Department took a bold step in its police recruiting efforts: At a time when departments across the nation are desperate for new officers, Plano began requiring its recruits to have four-year college degrees.

The move was aimed at making the city's 345-member police force more like the residents of Plano, a city of about 260,000 about 18 miles north of Dallas. Plano is in one of the nation's wealthiest counties and is home to the headquarters of JC Penney, Frito Lay and Electronic Data Systems. Plano officials cited studies indicating that officers with college degrees have fewer discipline problems than those without.

In August, however, as Plano strained to find enough recruits, the city eased its hiring requirements and began accepting those with two years of college or three years in the military. The latest requirements are stiffer than those from last year, when recruits were required to have at least the equivalent of a high school education. But the episode fueled an ongoing debate over whether police departments' desire to raise recruiting standards can be realized at a time when there are thousands of openings for cops nationwide.

Since 1963, when the Multnomah County, Ore., Sheriff's Department became one of the first police agencies to impose a four-year degree requirement on recruits, only a few other local departments have followed.

Less than 5% of local police departments with more than 100 officers require four-year degrees, says Louis Mayo, executive director of the Police Association for College Education.

Most departments give higher pay to recruits with four-year degrees, he says, but have avoided requiring recruits to have them for several reasons. Among them: concerns about recruiting enough minority officers in increasingly diverse urban areas, and fears that not enough college graduates would be attracted by police salaries. The median annual salary for patrol officers nationwide was about $45,200 in 2004, according to the U.S. Department of Labor. Rookie cops usually make less.

"Everybody is gonna tell you it's difficult" to recruit only college graduates, says Plano police Sgt. Jason Christensen. That's true even in Plano, where the pay for new cops is relatively high, about $51,000.

There are about 700,000 state and local police officers across the nation. Mayo estimates that 25% to 30% have four-year degrees. He says departments have been reluctant to adopt stricter recruiting standards despite evidence suggesting that better-educated cops perform better.

In an analysis of disciplinary cases against Florida cops from 1997 to 2002, the International Association of Chiefs of Police found that officers with only high school educations were the subjects of 75% of all disciplinary actions. Officers with four-year degrees accounted for 11% of such actions.

"An average patrol officer spends most of the time on dispute resolution," Mayo says. A degree "gives (officers) a broad perspective that makes them much more effective."

Los Angeles' approach to police recruiting and pay is typical of most big cities. The 9,000-officer department pays new cops with four-year degrees about $55,200, roughly $4,000 more than those who meet the basic requirements of a high school diploma or GED.

Officials say the incentive, along with programs such as one that gives bonuses to bilingual officers, shows a commitment to training. No one's proposing, however, that Los Angeles, which wants to hire 1,000 cops in the next year, require college degrees. Doing so would deplete the pool of candidates in an already tight market, says DeeDee Lopez of the officer mentoring program.

In Plano, where there are up to 15 police vacancies, Christensen acknowledges that concerns about finding enough recruits contributed to easing the prerequisite to two years of college or three years in the military. Plano also accepts recruits who have two years of police experience.

Christensen says the department wants to match officers' education level with that of the city's population. He estimates that 37% of Plano's residents have bachelor's degrees, compared with 32% of its cops.

The need for cops has led many cities, including Los Angeles, to look well beyond their borders for recruits. As Lopez suggests, the pressure to meet hiring goals has discouraged some from making requirements too tough.

In a series of essays in The Police Chief magazine, 13 police officials and academics recently urged departments to raise education standards — and to not be deterred by concerns they make it too difficult to fill the ranks. "Police officers need the (college) degree, not only for what it brings to individual officers and their departments, but also for what the degree brings to policing," Robert Friedmann, a criminal justice professor at Georgia State University, wrote in an essay.

The police department in Lakewood, Colo., a Denver suburb, has required recruits to have college degrees since 1969. Chief Ron Burns says recruiting has been more difficult recently, but that the 247-officer department doesn't plan to ease its standards. He says the department's starting salary of $47,000 has helped, as has its reputation as a training ground for police chiefs. Sixty Lakewood officers have gone on to become chiefs, Burns says.

Burns concedes that such standards might not be practical for big departments with hundreds of vacancies a year. His current class of 25 recruits was chosen from about 140 applicants. Burns says a similar ratio of applicants to recruits is typical at larger departments.

"It would be difficult to maintain (the educational requirement) in a larger city," he says.

Witness In '95 Brutality Case Offers New Account (BOS)

By Dick Lehr, Globe Correspondent

The Boston Globe, September 18, 2006

Says he never ID'd officer at police beating

DOJ_NMG_0063994

It was the most notorious Boston police brutality case of the last 10 years, and, in the end, the federal investigation hinged on what Officer Kenny Conley saw -- and what he wouldn't say.

Conley was convicted of perjury and obstruction of justice after he testified that he never saw a drug-unit officer, dressed in plainclothes, who had been pummeled by other officers who mistook him for a fleeing slaying suspect.

Conley had to be lying, prosecutors said. How could he have missed the beating of Michael Cox that January night? A witness put him just yards from the assault.

Or did he?

A Globe reexamination of the case has found an apparent and perhaps devastating defect in the eyewitness case against Conley, one which, for some court observers, raises the possibility of government misconduct.

The key prosecution witness at the trial was Robert ``Smut'' Brown , a drug dealer whom Conley and other officers were pursuing on the night of the beating. Brown said he looked back and saw the beating in progress and a ``tall, white cop'' standing close by. Minutes later he was arrested by Conley, who is tall and white.

It seemed clearly the same guy. Prosecutors pointedly said as much at the trial. And the jury convicted Conley of crimes for which he could have spent 34 years in jail.

But Brown, in his first public comment since the beating and trial, says Conley wasn't the officer he saw, and that he tried, unsuccessfully, to alert federal authorities during the trial that they had the wrong man.

``When I seen him sitting at the defense table I didn't have no clue, like, why they were using me for that -- because I didn't recognize him,'' Brown told the Globe in two taped interviews at a prison in Maine, where he was awaiting sentencing on a drug count.

He says he recalled thinking at the time, ``They got the wrong guy.''

Indeed, he says, minutes before testifying, he spotted in the courthouse hallway the officer he had seen standing near the scene of the beating that night and pointed him out to Kimberly McAllister , the FBI agent in charge of the probe.

``She's like, `No, no, no, no, no, that's not the guy,' '' Brown said. ``I'm like, `Yo, it is the guy. I know it's him.' ''

McAllister, through an FBI spokesperson, said she does not recall Brown pointing out the officer in court that day. What she does remember is that Brown, fearful of police retaliation, didn't want to take the stand.

Had Brown provided new evidence, McAllister would have immediately told prosecutors, said FBI spokeswoman Gail A. Marcinkiewicz.

The lead prosecutor in the case, S. Theodore Merritt , said no such word was passed to him. ``That information was never told to me at trial -- I can't comment whether it happened or not,'' he said in an interview.

Conley, told about Brown's comments, said he was ``shocked. If what Robert Brown says is true, there should be an investigation -- and not by the FBI.''

Some leading members of the Boston bar agree.

``This would be explosively important evidence in favor of the defendant,'' said J. W. Carney Jr. , a defense lawyer and former state prosecutor. ``Any federal agent who received this information from a critical witness and intentionally suppressed it by not informing the federal prosecutor is, in my opinion, guilty of obstruction of justice.''

``That's a huge, huge error,'' said Robert A. George , a defense lawyer. If Brown made the statements to McAllister, ``there's a duty, and not just a legal duty, but a human duty, to put a stop to the trial at that point.''

An unsolved case It is hard to exaggerate the importance of the Cox beating, and Conley prosecution, in the recent history of the Boston Police Department. It has been the source of strife, of multiple court cases, and of racial divisions -- Cox is black. It also remains unsolved, as none of the officers who participated in the beating or witnessed it has been willing to speak candidly. In Boston, the so-called blue wall of silence has seldom closed so completely around a crime.

Cox, a member of the gang unit, had been working in plainclothes on the night of Jan. 25, 1995. It was about 2 a.m. when a man was shot at a crowded takeout restaurant on Blue Hill Avenue. Four men led police on a high-speed chase that ended at a dead-end. Cox bolted from his cruiser chasing Brown. But Cox, as he neared a fence, was hit in the head from behind and then kicked and beaten unconscious by a group of officers. When they realized he was a police officer, the assailants scattered. Initial police reports said Cox slipped on a patch of ice.

Authorities solved the slaying -- two men were convicted of first-degree murder charges , while Brown and a fourth man were acquitted in late 1996. But Cox's assailants were never charged. First, the Suffolk district attorney's office took a run at solving the assault, and then, in early 1997, the US attorney's office took over the investigation, with Merritt at the helm.

Merritt, along with McAllister, soon targeted Conley. In internal police reports, Conley described seeing a suspect run to and climb over a fence. He described how he then chased and caught the suspect. After testifying before a federal grand jury in 1997 that he had not seen Cox or Cox's beating, Conley was indicted. Merritt and the FBI began building a case around the proposition that Conley had to have seen Cox.

Brown's testimony was key. Under questioning by Merritt, Brown recounted at the trial what he had also told the grand jury -- that he scaled the fence, pausing just long enough to see the beating, and that he saw the tall, white officer nearby.

But the prosecution never asked Brown, either before or during the 1998 trial, to positively identify Conley as the officer he had seen.

There was ``no prosecutorial purpose'' in doing so, Merritt said in an interview. ``He [Brown] said, under oath, the tall white officer was the same guy who arrested him, and other evidence showed that it was Ken Conley who arrested him.''

But had Merritt asked Brown to point out in the courtroom the man he'd seen that night the course of the trial might have shifted abruptly.

``I wouldn't have pointed him [Conley] out because I couldn't point him out,'' Brown said. ``I was wondering what the heck I was there for.''

Brown said he had gotten a good look at the officer near the fence, but not of the arresting officer, and simply assumed they were the same.

Brown said he was in the courthouse hallway with his mother, Mattie, and his girlfriend, Indira Pierce, when he spotted the officer he had seen. He said he pointed the man out to McAllister, but the agent told him he was wrong.

In separate interviews, Brown's girlfriend and mother confirmed Brown's account. Pierce said the FBI agent told her boyfriend, ``Just stick to your story.''

Brown said he took the witness stand discouraged. ``I'm just . . . just get this over with. Go get the hell out of here.''

Identification oversight But while Brown never directly identified Conley in court, it quickly became part of the accepted lore of the case that he had. News accounts, including the Globe's, treated it that way. Merritt, in court filings for appeals of the case, has done so, as well.

Even Conley's lawyer, Willie Davis , came away from the trial thinking a clear identification had occurred. Davis now realizes his oversight, and he is critical of the federal investigators for not disclosing Brown's alleged comments to McAllister. The case should have been dismissed, he said.

Conley ultimately prevailed in the case. After six years of appeals, US District Court Judge William G. Young overturned the conviction in 2004. Young ruled that the government improperly withheld exculpatory evidence. In May, Conley completed retraining at the police academy. He is back on the job.

MAN Launches $12.15 Billion Offer To Buy Scania (WSJ)

By Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

MAN AG of Germany launched a cash-and-stock takeover bid for Swedish rival Scania AB that values the maker of trucks and buses at about €9.6 billion ($12.15 billion) and would potentially form Europe's largest commercial-vehicle maker.

The supervisory board of Munich-based MAN met yesterday to approve the move. Scania, of Södertälje, Sweden, hasn't approved the bid, but the German company is hopeful of the deal ultimately being friendly, said people familiar with the matter.

In a statement, MAN said Renault SA, of Boulogne-Billancourt, France, had agreed to sell its 5.6 million class-A Scania shares to the company.

Scania's biggest shareholders, Volkswagen AG and Investor AB, of Stockholm, so far haven't supported the bid, people close to the matter said. Volkswagen holds about 34% of Scania, and 29% is owned by Investor and foundations run by the Wallenberg family.

A spokeswoman for Volkswagen said the Wolfsburg, Germany, auto maker hadn't reached an agreement to sell its Scania stake but declined to elaborate. A spokesman for Investor declined to comment, and a spokesman for Scania couldn't be reached.

In its statement, MAN said it will offer Scania shareholders €38.35 cash plus 0.151 of its own shares for both the A and B shares of Scania. Based on MAN's closing share price Friday, the offer totals 442.20 Swedish kronor ($60.80) a share. Scania's B shares closed Friday at 424.50 kronor, up 1%, in Stockholm trading.

MAN said it would reap at least €500 million a year in synergies if the deal is completed. The company said no sites would be closed and management would be shared between executives from the two companies, with Scania executives joining the combined group's management board.

A combination would bring together two of the larger makers of trucks, including 18-wheelers and light-duty commercial vehicles and buses. Scania operates with one of the global industry's highest profit margins. It makes premium-priced trucks, focusing more on vehicles for long-haul cargo transport, while MAN is stronger in the market for lighter trucks used for shorter journeys. In the first half of this year, Scania reported net income of 2.83 billion kronor on revenue of 35.22 billion kronor.

Together, they would rank as the largest truck maker in Europe by market share, ahead of Volvo AB, of Göteborg, Sweden, and DaimlerChrysler AG, of Stuttgart, Germany, and third in global market share, behind Volvo and DaimlerChrysler. Volkswagen owns a Latin American truck-making business that is likely to eventually be combined with a merged company, these people said.

MAN is headed by Swedish chief executive Hakan Samuelsson, who spent more than two decades at Scania before joining the German company in 2000. Mr. Samuelsson's presence has eased concerns in Sweden that a merger would lead to job losses for Scania. MAN reported a 37% increase in operating profit in 2005 to €765 million from €557 million a year earlier, with sales rising 5% to €14.7 billion.

Several other Swedish companies have combined with European rivals, deals that subsequently led to job expansion, including AstraZeneca PLC, a pharmaceuticals company in London, and Swedish-Swiss engineering firm ABB Ltd.

That track record could help MAN and Scania.

Mr. Samuelsson has pared MAN to four main businesses, focusing on trucks, engines, production of turbines for the energy industry and services such as logistics.

Time Warner's AOL Starts Sale Of Web-Access Units In Europe (WSJ)

By Matthew Karnitschnig And Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

In the first step of a broader plan to reorganize AOL's international operations, Time Warner Inc. agreed to sell the unit's Internet-access business in Germany for €675 million ($854.7 million) to Telecom Italia.

In coming weeks, AOL is expected to also complete negotiations for the sale of its Internet-access businesses in the United Kingdom and France. Proceeds from the sale of all three businesses are expected to total about $2 billion, according to people familiar with the talks. (See related article1.)

AOL plans to retain its advertising-supported content services in all three countries and expand them elsewhere. Those services include email, instant messaging and the other content currently available on its international Web sites. The shift away from Internet-access in favor of advertising-supported content is similar to the strategy AOL is pursuing in the U.S.

Most of the revenue generated by the European operations comes from selling monthly subscriptions for Internet access, but the company says advertising has been growing. AOL Europe generated about €100 million in operating profit last year.

Though its European operations are profitable, AOL never managed to establish itself as a major player in the European Internet-access market, and Time Warner has since written off most of AOL Europe's value. The move to sell the access business, which is the core of the operation, comes as Time Warner has been paring its large portfolio of assets. It recently sold a regional cable channel for $375 million and has been negotiating to sell the Atlanta Braves baseball team, which is valued at about $460 million.

Separately, AOL and Intel Corp. are collaborating on a new online-video service, targeting specially equipped personal computers that carry a new Intel brand of chips and software called Viiv.

The partnership is the latest in a series of efforts to exploit the boom in video on the Internet, and to move such programming to the TV screen. Apple Computer Inc. last week discussed plans for a $299 device -- code-named iTV -- that can wirelessly transfer downloaded videos from a computer to TV sets.

Viiv-branded systems come with a remote control and are designed to plug directly into TV sets.

Intel and AOL said the new service allows consumers to surf through the thousands of TV shows, music videos and full-length movies available through AOL Video with their remotes, scrolling through menus as they would on a DVR or video-on-demand service. Some content can be streamed free while other videos must be purchased and downloaded before they can be viewed on TV.

Second Company Is Implicated In Outbreak Linked To Spinach (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0063997

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — A second company in California has been implicated in the E. coli outbreak linked to spinach, the Food and Drug Administration said late Sunday, and the number of identified victims is still rising.

The newly identified company, River Ranch Fresh Foods, obtained salad that included spinach from the first company implicated, Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The spinach that passed through River Ranch was sold under the brand names Farmers Market, Hy-Vee, and Fresh and Easy.

The investigation is proceeding in what amounts to a rearview mirror, with state and local health officials receiving reports of illness, asking people what they ate and searching for the source. To identify the new company, officials examined Natural Selection's records and found it had supplied River Ranch.

Tracing a case of illness to its source, including the time required for DNA analysis of the E. coli, takes about two weeks, Dr. David W. K. Acheson, director of food safety at the F.D.A., said Sunday in a conference call. Dr. Acheson called the process "trace-back and trace-forward."

The investigation is in its early stages. "At this point we have not found E. coli O157 in any bags of spinach that have been tested," Dr. Acheson said. "Our link back to Natural Selection comes from the epidemiological studies."

But after questioning the victims about what they had eaten, he said, "bagged spinach has risen to the top of the list."

The federal health authorities are advising consumers not to eat fresh spinach. They said frozen spinach had not been implicated.

The number of reported cases of E. coli infection rose by seven on Sunday, to 109, but officials said that the real number was probably higher and that reporting was probably delayed because some health departments were not staffed on weekends. They also said they expected the number of states in which cases had been reported, 19 on Sunday, to rise.

"As labs come back on line tomorrow and Tuesday," Dr. Acheson said, "we can well see a surge of cases, which do not necessarily mean that things are not under control."

So far, 16 cases of hemolytic uremic syndrome, a serious kidney complication from E. coli exposure, have been reported. One death, in Wisconsin, has been linked to the outbreak.

The cause of the outbreak is still not clear. It could be irrigation water, Dr. Acheson said, or it could be a processing problem in a factory. In the humid environment of a sealed bag of spinach or salad mix, E. coli can multiply rapidly if the bag is allowed to get too warm, he said.

Some processors expose spinach to chlorine to kill E. coli, which can kill the bacteria on the leaf surface. But if the bacteria are in irrigation water they can enter the plant, and the chlorine will not reach them, Dr. Acheson said.

Spinach Probe, Recalls Expand (USAT)

By Dan Vergano

USA Today, September 18, 2006

The investigation into a deadly E. coli outbreak in 19 states widened on Sunday as a second produce company was set to recall its fresh spinach products, according to federal officials.

Food and Drug Administration officials on Sunday reported 109 cases so far of infection with a deadly strain of Escherichia coli bacterium. The bacterium produces toxins than can lead to bloody diarrhea, damaged kidneys and death. Roughly half of the cases in the outbreak resulted in hospitalization, and nearly one in six have led to kidney failure. There has been one death, a 77-year-old Wisconsin woman.

"This is unquestionably a significant outbreak," said FDA official David Acheson. He said state and federal investigators will begin sampling spinach farms today in California's Salinas Valley that have been linked to the outbreak. It will take at least a week for those samples to identify the source of the outbreak, he said.

Suspicion has centered on packaged spinach sold by Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif. The company has recalled all of its spinach packaged in bags, either alone or blended with salads, with "best if used by dates" from Aug. 17 to Oct. 1, 2006.

A second company, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., which investigators found had bought spinach from Natural Selection, is expected to issue a recall of three packaged salad mixes, Acheson said. The "spring mix" brands containing spinach are: Farmers Market, Hy-Vee, and Fresh and Easy. River Ranch officials could not be reached for comment.

Federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention scientists began assisting state officials in the affected states in diagnosing cases, the Associated Press reported. Acheson said that he expects more cases.

As a result of the outbreak, which began with an illness reported on Aug. 23, the FDA advises people not to eat fresh spinach "until further notice."

Grocery store shelves and restaurants have been emptied of fresh spinach as a result. "The entire industry is basically shut down," said Thomas Stenzel, head of the United Fresh Produce Association.

DOJ_NMG_0063998

The outbreak underlines the vulnerability of fresh produce to contamination, said food safety expert Douglas Powell of Kansas State University in Manhattan, Kan. Since August, FDA and state officials have been inspecting lettuce farms in the Salinas, Calif., region, because eight of 19 past E. coli outbreaks have originated there since 1995.

"People aren't aware that fresh fruits and vegetables are a leading source of food-borne illness," Powell said. "We don't cook them, so a lot of the safety problems start with farming practices."

E. Coli Cases From Spinach Increase To 109 (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Sept. 17 -- The number of people sickened by an E. coli outbreak traced to tainted spinach rose to 109 on Sunday, as federal officials announced more brands recalling their products.

"This is unquestionably a significant outbreak in terms of E. coli," said David Acheson, chief medical officer with the Food and Drug Administration's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

Natural Selection Foods, the world's largest producer of organic produce, has been linked to the infected greens, prompting a recall of 34 brands. They include the company's labels and those of companies contracting with Natural Selection, based in San Juan Bautista, Calif., to produce or package its spinach.

On Sunday, River Ranch Fresh Foods of Salinas, Calif., added to its recall spring mixes containing spinach sold under the labels Hy Vee, Fresh and Easy, and Farmers Market, FDA officials said.

Pollution Case Centers On Contradictory Figure (NSDY)

By James Bernstein, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, September 18, 2006

Port Jeff. Station plant owner painted as both caring leader and insensitive boss; faces rare criminal charges

But he also had a way of making employees feel insecure. Cohen bounced paychecks, never granted a raise or a bonus, withheld pension money and was unable to develop any friendly relationships, even with those who worked for him for years.

Which was the real Gerald Cohen?

Many people who worked for him for decades at the private company he owns, Lawrence Aviation Industries Inc., an aerospace parts manufacturer in Port Jefferson Station, as well as those who considered themselves friends, are not sure. Most describe Cohen as complex.

The U.S. attorney's office in Brooklyn says it has no doubt who the 72-year-old Cohen is: one of the nation's worst polluters. Earlier this month, Cohen was arrested by FBI agents and charged with failing to legally dispose of more than 11 tons of highly caustic alkaline chemicals that had been stored in two large tanks on the company's 125-acre property along Sheep Pasture Road, not far from Long Island Sound. One federal prosecutor said the site "looked like a science-fiction horror movie." In 2000, the property was designated a Superfund site, slated for cleanup. Last year, the federal government designated it an "indeterminate public hazard."

Cohen, of St. James, appeared in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, where he pleaded not guilty to two counts of violating the federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. He also pleaded not guilty to a charge of violating the Clean Air Act; he is accused of allowing two diesel power generators that produced electricity for the company to discharge as much as 440 tons of smog-producing nitrogen oxide between 2001 and 2003. If convicted, he faces up to 15 years in prison and fines of more than $300 million.

His attorney, Anthony LaPinta of Hauppauge, said Cohen would not be available for an interview for this story.

Criminal charges in environmental cases are rare, occurring only a few times a year in each state, federal law-enforcement officials said, and are usually filed when a company or an individual is egregiously in violation of the environmental laws and has been so for some time. Civil charges are much more common in pollution cases, they said.

'A bad boy'

Assemb. Steven Englebright (D-Setauket), a staunch environmentalist who represents the Port Jefferson area and has known Cohen for years, said Cohen had been "in a sort of fence-duel mode" with state and federal environmental regulators for years; he described Cohen as often dragging his feet when it came to cleanups. Englebright said Cohen had routinely been cordial and polite -- but his behavior regarding the environment left much to be desired.

"He has been a bad boy," Englebright said.

Englebright and Richard Amper, executive director of the Long Island Pine Barrens Society, say government agencies did not act quickly enough in the case of Lawrence Aviation.

DOJ_NMG_0063999

"We have regulations that prohibit such activity, but very little monitoring or investigation," Amper said. "We've gotten to the point where businesses have been willing to trample the environmental laws, figuring if they're caught that's the cost of doing business."

Federal officials say such criticisms are unfair, that such cases are often highly complicated and take time to develop.

Lawrence Aviation has essentially been out of business for more than a year. In its day, the company was a powerhouse in Long Island's aerospace and defense industry, molding titanium slabs into parts for Grumman Corp.'s F-14 Tomcat and other military airplanes. At its peak in the early 1980s, the company had about 500 employees and annual revenues of about $30 million.

The company's slide began in 1984, when workers struck for four months over pay and benefits. Industry experts say Lawrence Aviation never really recovered from the strike. And when the Cold War ended in 1991, the company wasn't able to make up the lost defense business. In recent years, staffing fell to as few as a dozen employees.

The company was started in 1959 by Cohen's father, Lawrence, a no-nonsense businessman. Gerald Cohen took over when he died in 1982. "He wasn't the businessman his father was," said Bob Jensen of West Islip, who worked for the company for decades before retiring a few years ago. "He wasn't a manager."

Cohen, a 1955 graduate of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was widely considered to be highly intelligent but short on people skills. "He's a computer nerd," said someone who knows him professionally. "He doesn't know how to deal with people."

Despite his wealth, Cohen's clothes appeared worn and he was given to driving beat-up old cars. "He didn't look like a millionaire's son," said a former employee who asked not to be identified. "He'd be sitting on the floor fixing a machine, a paperclip sticking in his teeth." But he was cocky and was known for letting everyone know he was the smartest person in a room.

A kinder face

He also could show a softer side, the former employee said.

"If something bad happened to somebody, he would be the first to send flowers," the former employee said, or grant time off for personal problems and show up at funerals. But he wasn't always welcome.

One time, she said, Cohen showed up at the funeral of one his executives, who had suffered a heart attack. The family did not welcome him; they felt Cohen had been a source of great stress.

"He was told he had a helluva nerve showing up," she said.

Cohen's behavior outside the office was described as more open, even gregarious on occasion.

Cohen was in his mid-40s when he married for the first time, and he and his wife, Nancy, were ardent skiers. They have no children.

He was a member of a number of boards and organizations, and contributed financially to several charities. He was president of the board of St. Charles Hospital in Port Jefferson for two years, beginning in 1985, and was given the Theodore Roosevelt Award for his service to the hospital.

He donated money to the Maryhaven Center of Hope, a nonprofit human resources agency; and he served as president of the Stony Brook Foundation, the nonprofit fundraising arm of the state university, from 1987 to 1989. He also was on the Brookhaven Industrial Board for five years, beginning in 1980.

"He's a man with a big heart," said LaPinta, his attorney. "He is sensitive to people in need."

But what former employees remember most are the bounced paychecks and a 401(k) plan they contributed to -- but got nothing back from.

In May, Cohen agreed to pay $1.3 million to settle a lawsuit filed by the U.S. Labor Department, which said he had treated the 401(k) as a "personal piggy bank." The suit was filed in May 2004 and alleged Cohen and Lawrence Aviation made more than $1.6 million in loans to themselves between 1993 and 1995. It said the employees never collected on the loans, "which have never been repaid."

On Fridays, employees would say, "I wonder if I'm getting paid today," recalled Jensen, the retired employee. "Sometimes the checks would bounce. In fact, quite often, they did."

Washington's Energy Failure (WP)

By Sherwood Boehlert

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

The problems BP has had recently with its Alaskan pipeline seem both an apt metaphor for the way the United States has (mis)handled its energy policy and a warning of what may await us if we stay on the wrong track.

DOJ_NMG_0064000

For a long time now, politicians have handled U.S. energy policy the way BP apparently handled its pipeline: We've talked about it, we've taken some superficial actions, but we've failed to examine it closely, secure in our belief that everything seemed pretty much okay.

The result, in the case of energy policy, has been gasoline at $3 a gallon; a growing oil addiction (to use the president's well-chosen word) that threatens our national security; and an economy and populace more vulnerable than they need be to domestic and international fluctuations in oil production.

So far, the reaction in Washington has ranged from anemic to the counterproductive. The House passed a bill to streamline regulation of refinery construction, even though there is little evidence that regulation has constrained refinery capacity. The House repeatedly passed legislation to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling, with proponents arguing that pollution from drilling is a thing of the past -- presumably a harder argument to make in the wake of this summer's revelations from BP.

The House also passed a bill allowing the entire U.S. coastline to be opened to oil drilling. This bill, which received surprisingly little media attention, not only would allow the lifting of current drilling moratoriums but would also significantly revise the way offshore oil drilling is permitted, weakening the ability of states and citizens to control the use of their shores.

Congress has passed some positive legislation promoting energy research and development, but the actual funding has been rather meager, and much of it has been focused on the most futuristic energy technologies, such as hydrogen and fusion -- gambles that are worth investing in but that can hardly be the foundation of a realistic near-term energy policy.

What is conspicuously missing from the energy debate is any substantial discussion or action on energy efficiency or conservation. Conservative ideologues like to equate conservation with discomfort: sweltering in under-air-conditioned buildings or driving a subcompact car. But these images are absurdly outdated, if they were ever true. Conservation means developing and deploying technologies (including deploying many that already exist) to enable Americans to live the way they want to while using less energy.

This is something that isn't likely to be accomplished by the marketplace alone, despite ideological rhetoric. Every American might desire more energy-efficient goods but still buy, say, a less efficient sport-utility vehicle if that's all that's available. Moreover, energy conservation is imperative, given the national security and economic vulnerability of our current energy path. We need government action to respond to the classic market failures that thwart individual efforts to remedy our oil addiction.

The most important, realistic and feasible step the government could take would be to require automakers to make more fuel-efficient cars by raising corporate average fuel economy (CAFE) standards. About 45 percent of the oil Americans consume is used by cars and light trucks. We simply can't get a handle on our energy use if we don't do something about mileage -- which has been stuck at the same average level for about 20 years, even as every other sector of the economy has become more energy-efficient.

Our unwillingness to address fuel economy -- the House hasn't even been willing to schedule a vote on the issue since gas prices began skyrocketing last fall -- is especially unforgivable because we already have technology that could significantly increase fuel economy without reducing safety or limiting consumer choice. Better still, consumers would save money on gasoline -- savings that would more than cover any costs for the technology. These are not my assertions; they are the conclusions of a 2002 report on fuel economy standards by the National Academy of Sciences.

The case for increasing mileage is so compelling that politicians are at least starting to give lip service to raising CAFE standards. The administration, for example, has proposed a bill that would allow the standards to be increased. But that proposal both fails to require any action and is written in a way that could actually end up reducing average mileage. (This is because it would allow mileage to be set by vehicle class, without setting standards for the overall vehicle fleet.)

Congress should take real action -- just as BP has had to do -- rather than continuing to avert its gaze until the next emergency. After a summer of high gas prices, the public ought to be fed up with Washington's kowtowing to the oil and auto industries instead of taking a hard look at effective measures.

Arellano Brother Is Sent To S.D. To Face Trial (SDUT)

By S. Lynne Walker

Copley News Service, September 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY – The oldest of four brothers accused of heading the ruthless Arellano Félix drug cartel in Tijuana was extradited by the Mexican government to the United States yesterday to face drug charges in San Diego.

Francisco Rafael Arellano Félix, 56, was escorted off a commercial fight at Lindbergh Field last night after being handed over earlier in the day to U.S. authorities in the Texas border town of Brownsville.

The extradition came just more than a month after his younger brother Javier was arrested by the U.S. Coast Guard in a dramatic operation at sea off Mexico's Pacific Coast.

Flanked by agents from the Drug Enforcement Administration and the U.S. Marshals Service, the balding, bespectacled Arellano Félix was rushed to a vehicle waiting to take him to federal prison, authorities said.

Arellano Félix's extradition surprised U.S. law enforcement officials, who have been asking the Mexican government to extradite him since 2004, when he finished a 10-year sentence on weapons and bribery charges in a maximum-security prison outside Mexico City.

"It came out of the blue," said one U.S. official, who spoke on condition on anonymity.

Although a Mexican federal judge approved the extradition request in 2004, it took two years for the Foreign Ministry to sign the order to hand him over. U.S. authorities were told two days ago that Arellano Félix was being sent to San Diego to face charges.

The decision to extradite Arellano Félix came the same day that U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza sharply criticized the Mexican government, saying, "Drug cartels, aided by corrupt officials, reign unchecked on many towns along our common border."

Garza cautioned that an alarming rise in drug violence threatens the relationship between the two countries.

Arellano Félix is accused of selling 9 ounces of cocaine to an undercover agent at a motel on San Diego's Midway Drive 26 years ago. He was charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and distribution of cocaine. He also was charged with jumping bail.

After posting bail, he fled to Mexico, where he ran a discothéque in the Pacific Coast resort of Mazatlan.

A U.S. prosecutor handling the case said last night that she believes the government will secure a conviction of Arellano Félix.

"We are prepared," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy. "The case is very much intact. The drug evidence still exists and the witnesses are still in place, so we're confident that we're ready to go forward."

Arellano Félix is scheduled to be arraigned in San Diego federal court at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Although the charges against Arellano Félix are relatively minor, U.S. law enforcement officials said his extradition "sends a very strong signal" that the Mexican government is willing to extradite drug traffickers.

"For drug dealers, particularly the Arellano Félix organization, this should be a clear signal that no matter where you are in the organization, once you serve your time in Mexico you may serve your time in the United States," said Garrison Courtney, a spokesman for the DEA in Washington.

Arellano Félix's extradition marks a high point in the delicate negotiations between the United States and Mexico on the issue of extraditing drug traffickers.

Although the Mexican Supreme Court cleared the way in January 2001 for Mexican citizens to be sent to the United States to stand trial, there has been only one extradition of a high-ranking member of the Arellano Félix cartel.

Arturo "Kitty" Páez, a young lieutenant in the cartel, was flown to San Diego in May 2001 and sentenced to 30 years in prison for smuggling cocaine.

While U.S. law enforcement said they were encouraged by Arellano Félix's extradition, they acknowledged that he did not play a key role in running the organization. He was arrested during a police raid in Tijuana in 1993, when Benjamín Arellano Félix still handled the business operations of the cartel and another brother, Ramón, was earning a reputation as the cartel's feared triggerman.

"Francisco obviously isn't the highest in the tier of the Arellano Félix organization, but he's still a player," Courtney said.

Benjamín Arellano Félix was captured in 2002 and imprisoned in a maximum-security Mexican prison. A month earlier, state police shot Ramón dead on a Mazatlan street.

The cartel's leadership then shifted to Javier, who has pleaded not guilty to racketeering, drug and money laundering charges and awaits trial in San Diego.

"We've taken out the top leadership. But we know that the organization has people who can step in right now and run it quite efficiently," Courtney said. "We still have a lot of work to do."

Francisco Arellano arrived last night on Continental Airlines Flight 429 from Houston, which landed in San Diego at 6:58 p.m.

DOJ_NMG_0064002

In Houston, a man in street clothes, with his arms and legs shackled, was escorted to the back of the plane before most of the other passengers were allowed to board, passengers said. He was seated in the last row, near the bathroom. Two plainclothes law enforcement agents with badges were seated in the same row, passengers said.

The prisoner said little or nothing during the flight, and his two guards kept a close watch on the other passengers, said Pamela Hodge, 29, of Houston, who was seated a few rows in front of the trio.

"I tried not to look that way because they were very protective of him, the guards were," Hodge said.

Jerad Jurgensmier, 20, a Navy corpsman flying back to San Diego from Houston, said passengers weren't given any information about the prisoner.

"No one said anything to us," Jurgensmier said. "It was kind of weird."

A variety of law-enforcement vehicles were parked on the tarmac when the plane arrived in San Diego, passengers said, and three uniformed officers were waiting at the gate.

U.S. Ambassador Lauds Mexican Extradition Of Alleged Drug Kingpin (AP)

AP, September 17, 2006

MEXICO CITY — The U.S. ambassador praised the "courage and conviction" of Mexico's President Vicente Fox on Sunday after Mexico extradited alleged drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix to the United States.

Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix was loaded into a helicopter Saturday in the Mexican city of Matamoros, then flown across the border and handed over to Texas officials in Brownsville after serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico.

The first major Mexican drug suspect to be extradited north, he will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

Ambassador Antonio Garza's message of praise, issued by the embassy, followed a statement last week that irritated the Fox administration by urging Americans traveling in Mexico to beware of "the rising level of brutal violence" — much related to drug trafficking — south of the Rio Grande.

"While I'm the first to point out those instances where more can be done, particularly along the border," Garza said Sunday, "I've also got to say that this administration has been aggressive about extraditions and committed to doing what they can when they can.

"President Fox has been unwavering in that regard and I recognize and appreciate both his conviction and courage," Garza added.

Fox's government said it had "discrepancies" with Garza's warning to U.S. citizens on Thursday and said it has called U.S. officials to discuss the issue this week.

U.S. officials have been pushing Mexico to overcome reluctance to extradite its citizens. When Mexico officials have tried to extradite major trafficking suspects, courts have blocked them.

Arellano Felix was arrested in December 1993 in Tijuana and was convicted under Mexico's tough weapons laws rather than for drug offenses. He was the oldest of seven brothers in a family accused of running what was throughout the 1990s one of Mexico's largest and most-violent drug smuggling gangs.

Most of the Arellano Felix brothers have been arrested or killed, weakening the cartel. But Mexican and U.S. officials said the gang still moves tons of cocaine and marijuana into the United States from its operations base in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego.

Arellano Felix's brother Francisco Javier Arellano Felix was captured on a fishing boat last month by the U.S. Coast Guard in international waters off the coast of La Paz, Mexico.

Benjamin Arellano Felix, reputedly the planning chief of the gang bearing the family's name, was arrested in March 2002 in Puebla, east of Mexico City. He is still being held in a Mexican jail.

Another brother, Ramon Arellano Felix, was shot to death a month earlier in the Pacific tourist port of Mazatlan. Police say he had been the group's feared enforcer, in charge of killing to settle scores.

Eduardo Arellano Felix is still at large.

Mexico last year extradited 41 suspected criminals to the United States, up from 34 in 2004; 31 in 2003; 25 in 2002; 17 in 2001; and 12 in 2000, according to the U.S. Department of Justice.

Mexico Extradites Alleged Drug Kingpin (AP)

By Traci Carl, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, September 16, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Mexico extradited drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix to the United States on Saturday, making him the first major Mexican drug lord to be sent north to face drug charges.

DOJ_NMG_0064003

The extradition was a victory for U.S. officials who have been pushing Mexico to send them more drug lords.

The former head of the Arellano Felix drug clan was handed over in the Texas border town of Matamoros after serving a 10-year sentence in Mexico. He will be taken to California to face trial on charges stemming from a 1980 case in which he allegedly sold cocaine to an undercover police officer in the United States.

U.S. authorities requested Arellano Felix's extradition on June 2, 2003. A federal judge approved that request in 2004, but it took two years for the Foreign Relations Department to send him.

Francisco Rafael was the oldest brother in a family accused of running what was one of Mexico's largest and most violent drug smuggling gangs in the 1990s.

The Arellano Felix gang developed a reputation as one of the most bloodthirsty smuggling rings.

Most of the seven Arellano Felix brothers have been arrested or killed, weakening the group. But Mexican and U.S. officials said the gang still moves tons of cocaine and marijuana into the United States from its operations base in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego.

Arellano Felix was arrested in December 1993 in Tijuana and was convicted under Mexico's tough weapons laws rather than for drug offenses.

His brother Benjamin, reputedly the planning chief of the gang, was arrested in March 2002 in Puebla, east of Mexico City.

Another brother, Ramon, was shot to death a month earlier in the Pacific tourist port of Mazatlan. Police say he had been the group's feared enforcer, in charge of killing to settle scores.

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix was captured on a fishing boat last month by the U.S. Coast Guard in international waters off the coast of La Paz, Mexico.

DEA Finds Tunnel In Calexico Area (SDUT)

Union-tribune

The San Diego Union-Tribune, September 16, 2006

The Drug Enforcement Administration announced last night that it has discovered a tunnel under the U.S.-Mexico border in Imperial County that apparently was used for smuggling drugs.

The 400-foot tunnel reaches between a residence in Calexico and a residence in Mexicali, Mexico, said John S. Fernandes, DEA special agent in charge.

It is about 20 feet underground, equipped with lighting and bolstered with wooden beams every few feet. It is accessed with a ladder.

The DEA was uncertain what group was using the tunnel, he said.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the Border Patrol and the Calexico Police Department helped in the investigation.

Downtown death called suspicious

DOWNTOWN – San Diego homicide detectives are investigating the death of a man whose body was found around noon yesterday in the bushes in a transient camp.

The camp is beside the on-ramp to Interstate 5 northbound at 11th Avenue.

The death appeared suspicious because of the body's condition, homicide Lt. Jeff Sferra said, though he did not specify the condition.

An autopsy was scheduled.

San Diego Says No To Drugs (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- This seaside city was a bystander as liberal strongholds like San Francisco and Santa Cruz created identification cards for sick patients who use marijuana and wrote regulations to permit storefront pot dispensaries.

Now, 10 years after Californians voted to decriminalize marijuana for medical purposes, conservative San Diego County is leading a backlash against the groundbreaking law.

The county is challenging California's medical marijuana law in state court, saying it should not be required to comply with a state law directing counties to issue ID cards to users. At the same time, local police, working with federal agents, have shuttered all of the nearly 30 marijuana dispensaries in the county.

DOJ_NMG_0064004

San Diego's legal showdown pits state laws that permit marijuana use for medical reasons against federal laws that prohibit the drug. At stake: California's decade-old law and the industry it spawned, with potentially far-reaching consequences for other states.

"This is the first time that a county has said that the state is forcing them to do something they don't want to do," said Anjuli Verma, director of advocacy for the Drug Law Reform Project of the American Civil Liberties Union. "If they prevail, it will set a precedent that basically means medical marijuana laws are over."

Since California's Compassionate Use Act was passed in 1996, 10 other states -- Alaska, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington -- have passed laws protecting qualified patients from prosecution. Voters in South Dakota decide a medical marijuana ballot measure in November.

California's law allows people suffering AIDS, cancer, anorexia, chronic pain, arthritis and migraine and "any other illness for which marijuana provides relief" to grow or possess small amounts of marijuana with a doctor's recommendation.

In 2003, the California Legislature amended the 1996 bill to direct county health departments to issue ID cards to medical marijuana users.

Counties, which did not receive money to fulfill the requirement, have been slow to issue ID cards, but San Diego was the first to refuse on legal grounds. Under threat of a lawsuit from the local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, the county struck first and sued the organization -- and the state.

"We're trying to get the court to tell the state they've gone too far in telling the counties to do something that facilitates the ability of a person to break federal law," said John Sansone, San Diego's county counsel.

The state attorney general contends in court filings that California is entitled to pass its own state drug laws and legislate programs relating to the use of medical marijuana.

Two other California counties, San Bernardino and Merced, have joined as plaintiffs in the case, which is scheduled to be heard in November in San Diego Superior Court.

San Diego's board of supervisors entered the legal fray shortly after dispensaries with names like Legal Ease, Holistic Healers and Chronic Care Co-op began popping up in coastal enclaves, thanks to the 2003 law, which created a legal framework for the dispensaries.

California has an estimated 200 storefronts that serve about 200,000 people, according to Americans for Safe Access, a group that advocates medical marijuana laws. San Francisco, Berkeley and Los Angeles have passed guidelines regulating the shops.

San Diego prosecutors said neighbors complained about one store in the summer of 2005, prompting an investigation that culminated in joint Drug Enforcement Administration and local police raids in July.

Fifteen operators were charged with illegally selling the drug for recreational use to people who are not ill -- including one undercover agent who prosecutors said he got a doctor to give him a medical marijuana recommendation for his dog.

A lawyer for one of the men, Stephen Harding, who ran Native Sun Dispensary, expressed dismay at the charges.

"These guys were complying with the regulations as they've been laid out," said Jan Ronis. "You have people relying on what seems to be guidance from the state and then the county shoots it down. It's really frustrating."

The remaining stores and delivery services in the county closed after receiving phone calls and visits from law enforcement agents warning that they and their landlords may be prosecuted.

San Diego County District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis said the state law does not require local authorities to permit marijuana storefronts.

"It's the tolerance level in the community that rules in the end," she said. "I think in Northern California they're much more tolerant than in this part of Southern California."

Cops Credit Federal Law With Drop In Gun Crimes (LSJ)

By Kevin Grasha, Lansing State Journal

Lansing State Journal, September 18, 2006

Officials say drug dealer's conviction an example

Gun crimes in Lansing are on the decline because of a federal initiative that gives longer prison sentences to people convicted of them, authorities said Friday.

Since Project Safe Neighborhoods began in 2003, crimes such as assaults with firearms and carrying a concealed weapon have decreased, said Lansing police Lt. Larry Klaus, who heads the department's narcotics unit.

"The word is out," he said at a press conference at City Hall. "If you're caught with a gun, you're going to federal prison."

Advertisement

So far, 59 people have been convicted through the initiative, and most are serving terms of 3 1/2 to 10 years. Klaus said about 30 other cases are under investigation.

Authorities on Friday highlighted the conviction of a 31-year-old Lansing Township man involved in a multi-state drug operation. Benjamin Preston Foreman was sentenced this month to 25 years in prison; he had received five additional years because of federal gun charges. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Grand Rapids handled the case.

A raid on his home turned up three semi-automatic pistols, $7,000 in cash, and 80 grams of cocaine, said police, who believe Foreman was a significant source of cocaine for the Lansing area. His supply came from the West Coast, they said.

Penalties are more severe for gun cases in federal courts, said Ingham County Chief Assistant Prosecutor Linda Maloney.

"We know we can get more bang for our buck," she said, adding that the county prosecutor's office alerts federal authorities, who then take the cases to federal prosecutors. Local police work with the federal Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agency (ATF) and the Drug Enforcement Administration to investigate.

IMMIGRATION:

Firms Vie To Provide The Future Of Border Security (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

If Northrop Grumman Corp. gets the multibillion-dollar contract to secure America's borders, the sky above the Rio Grande would be thick with drones.

Cellphone maker Ericsson Inc. thinks drones are largely a waste and would focus instead on giving Border Patrol agents wireless devices capable of receiving live video.

Boeing Co. would build high-tech towers, lining the borders with 1,800 of them.

For Lockheed Martin Corp., blimps are a big part of the solution. And for Raytheon Co., the key is letting agents watch incidents unfold on Google Earth.

Those are the plans, anyway. The questions now are which company will win the rights to put its technology into play, and how well any of it will actually work in helping the United States gain control of its notoriously porous borders.

The Department of Homeland Security is expected within days to name a winner in a competition that could permanently change the way the United States conducts surveillance, apprehension and detention operations along its northern and southern boundaries. The choice promises to lend significant insight into how the government sees the future of border security, with firms offering rival visions of how that future looks.

All year, the nation's largest military contractors have been locked in intense competition to team with the government on a program that gives the private sector unusually wide sway over a critical national security issue. Michael P. Jackson, the deputy director of the Homeland Security Department, told the competing firms earlier this year he wanted them "to come back and tell us how to do our business."

The resulting proposals are the latest incarnation of decades' worth of attempts to use technology to create a virtual fence along the border. So far, none have been successful. Recent initiatives have ended with cameras that failed to work in extreme temperatures and millions of dollars wasted.

But with immigration legislation stalled in Congress, Homeland Security officials are gambling that this new effort -- known as the Secure Border Initiative -- will be their best hope of cutting the flow of illegal immigrants into the country.

Officials say they expect the solution to be in place within four years, but companies say they can get it done sooner. The cost has been pegged at $2 billion but is likely to be higher. No one is downplaying the stakes.

"I don't think the Department of Homeland Security can afford to fail here," said Wayne Esser, who has led Boeing's efforts to capture the contract, which is called SBInet. "This thing is so politically charged. It's very visible."

The program has already garnered heavy criticism from detractors who worry that the government does not know enough about what it is buying and that the program could amount to a costly give-away to the private sector. "It's a little bit scary when the government throws up its hands and says, 'We have no idea how to do this. Please tell us,' " said Deborah W. Meyers, senior policy analyst at the Migration Policy Institute. "It just seems like the government is putting policy in the hands of the contractors."

Homeland Security officials say they decided to contract out the job because they did not have the capacity to do it in-house. But they maintain that they will ultimately call the shots. "I don't want any mistake about who is working for who," Gregory Giddens, director of the Secure Border Initiative, told Congress on Wednesday. "The [contractor] is working for the United States government."

The decision of which contractor to choose is due by the end of the month and is expected as soon as this week. While the competing proposals are similar in their basic outlines, they differ markedly in the details.

All companies, for instance, offer an array of sensors, including infrared, motion and seismic. But they are divided over where to place them -- whether to bury them, mount them on towers, or send them airborne attached to planes, helicopters or unmanned aerial vehicles.

Overall, the proposals lean heavily on technology developed for the battlefield. "We're transferring things that are military today into a civil implementation," said Bruce Walker, a Northrop Grumman vice president who has led the California company's efforts.

Walker touted the firm's fleet of UAVs, which includes both the Global Hawk -- a plane that soars high to cover large areas -- and the KillerBee, a small, low-altitude vehicle that can be used for more-focused missions.

Both vehicles, he said, have sensors with intelligence capabilities that allow them to differentiate between false alarms and genuine threats. "It may be a herd of antelope moving across the border, and you certainly don't want to send a team after that," Walker said.

Swedish cellphone maker Ericsson, meanwhile, is positioning itself as the nonmilitary solution. Doug Smith, the company's vice president for government solutions, said that border security comes down to "a big, broadband wireless problem" and that the most important challenge is to ensure agents have access to communications and timely information.

Ericsson's plan involves giving every Border Patrol agent a personal digital assistant that's not much different from models available on the commercial market. Tall towers lining the border would fend off dead zones and provide much of the surveillance data.

While the company's plan includes some UAVs, their role is minimal. "UAVs aren't reliable enough. They can't fly in bad weather," Smith said. "We don't need a Star Wars-type solution here. We need something that will work."

Boeing's Esser said his team came to a similar conclusion. "UAVs are incredibly expensive to operate," said Esser, citing the size of the vehicles' ground-based crews. "Everybody's real hot on UAVs. But you just can't afford it. It doesn't make sense."

Instead, the Chicago aerospace company has proposed a network of towers -- ranging in height from 80 to 200 feet -- that would line the northern and southern borders. UAVs would have a more limited role, with agents deploying miniature versions of the vehicles off the back of their trucks.

The final two companies -- Lockheed Martin and Raytheon -- say they provide a balance of air- and ground-based equipment.

At Bethesda-based Lockheed, the country's largest defense contractor, the company's solution includes a UAV that can be launched by an individual agent, much like a paper airplane, as well as larger Predator drones and tethered balloons known as aerostats. On the ground, the company offers a selection of towers -- some fixed, some mobile.

Jay Dragone, the company's vice president of integrated border security solutions, said Lockheed would keep its plan flexible and adjust depending on what helps agents the most. "This is not going to work if it takes the agent a long time to figure out what they're looking at and how to use the systems," he said.

Massachusetts-based Raytheon has developed its solution based on a company-managed program to keep drug-runners and poachers out of the Amazon. Under Raytheon's plan, Border Patrol agents would be able to watch sensor activity and video feeds from their trucks on a display based on the satellite-powered mapping system Google Earth, giving them perspectives on border issues near and far. The company would also provide bar-coded bracelets that could be used to track suspects as they move through the detention system.

Like the other firms, Raytheon has proposed that contractors take over jobs now performed by Border Patrol agents -- such as transporting prisoners and mending fences -- to give agents more time to focus on their main priority. "We would leave the work of the Border Patrol to the Border Patrol," said Frank Marcinkus, Raytheon's SBInet capture manager.

Outside observers say freeing up agents' time could prove critical to the program's overall success. Additional technology will give agents more data, but won't on its own help stop the flow of people coming across the border, said John E. Pike, director of GlobalSecurity.org.

"It doesn't matter how much money you spend on the sensors," Pike said. "If you don't spend a commensurate amount to put agents in Humvees to go out and catch suspects, it won't make a bit of difference. All you'll do is get a better sense of how they're coming in."

Labor Movement As U.S. Debates Guest Workers, They Are Here Now (WSJ)

By Joel Millman

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064007

CHARLES CITY, Iowa -- When he is home in Montemorelos, Mexico, Roberto Cantú earns $300 a week pouring concrete. Last month, a labor recruiter called him promising similar work in Colorado and Iowa paying five times as much.

Within hours, Mr. Cantú, his three grown sons and his brother were driving their white pickup truck 250 miles north to the U.S. border, on the way to job sites another 700 miles away. It was the Cantús' fifth trip this year to take temporary U.S. jobs, during which they have crossed 18 states.

The Cantús are among an estimated tens of thousands of Mexicans with an unusual place in the bitter debate over immigration. Thanks to quirks in the law, they have green cards enabling them to come to the U.S. for work stints. Many, like the Cantús, call themselves "subidos" from the Spanish verb for "to rise," because they do the grueling jobs of pouring concrete for tall structures such as grain silos for the ethanol plants increasingly rising across the Great Plains.

President Bush is pushing for the U.S. to adopt its first formal guest-worker program since 1964, a contentious proposal that has helped stall broader efforts at immigration-law changes in Congress. The president says the program would respond to the strong demand for Mexican labor in the U.S., and would reduce the number of undocumented workers sneaking across the border to answer it.

FOLLOWING THE JOBS

See an animated map2 showing the travels of the Cantú family over the course of 2006.

Employer groups and other advocates believe guest workers would boost economic growth in both the U.S. and Mexico. Labor unions and immigration foes call that employer-funded propaganda. Their view: Mexicans would steal jobs and undercut U.S. wages.

The experience of the Cantús and other Mexicans who use green cards to hop across the border provides some intriguing clues about how an official guest-worker system might play out. By quickly filling jobs and providing needed skills, such workers are a boon to employers. They rarely put a burden on social services, because they leave their school-age children and elderly relatives at home. Nonetheless, there is some evidence that the Mexicans drive down wages in the industries where they work.

Some guest workers had their status legalized under the Simpson-Rodino Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, which granted amnesty to 2.7 million undocumented workers. It offered that group, who call themselves "Rodinos," the chance at green cards that confer permanent-resident status and the right to work. The act was intended to encourage U.S. citizenship, but some preferred the guest-worker way of life, as the Cantús do, earning wages in the U.S. but keeping their families and their living costs in Mexico.

Others acquired work visas through programs that legalized imported farm workers during times of labor shortages. Still others won green cards after being sponsored by a parent who became a naturalized U.S. citizen, or by marrying a U.S. citizen. About 100,000 Mexicans also legally commute short distances across the border for day jobs in the U.S.

Mr. Cantú's father arrived in the U.S. as a relief laborer during World War II. He worked regularly in the U.S. under the Bracero program for farmhands, which ended in 1964. He became a U.S. citizen in the early 1990s. His citizenship made his children and grandchildren eligible for green cards. It took eight years to obtain them. Since 2003 they have been taking advantage by landing concrete-pouring jobs in the U.S.

The five Cantús keep a brutal pace and spend as much as eight months in the U.S. annually. One day last month, after finishing two 89-hour workweeks in Pueblo, Colo., they barreled across three states in 14 hours to start a job in Iowa. The older brothers, Daniel, 45 years old, and Roberto, 47, split the long drive and arrived just minutes before the night shift began. Daniel headed to a motel to nap; Roberto quickly started work, hoisting himself up a 30-foot scaffold he wouldn't descend until dawn.

Roberto's three sons, 18-year-old César, 20-year-old Mario and 24-year-old Roberto Jr., hopped into town to look for a Mexican restaurant, or at least a 7-Eleven store selling tortillas. They are more comfortable in the U.S. than the older men, mostly because they speak English better. They are the ones who mollify truck-stop waitresses who grow impatient waiting for the older men to order a meal or politely respond to state troopers who occasionally stop them on the road, demanding papers showing they are in the U.S. legally. "We know not everyone wants to see Mexicans in their town," Mario says.

The Cantús are skilled in the continuous-pour construction specialty of subidos, where fresh concrete is pumped nonstop for hours into wooden trenches to harden. That eliminates seams that can trap moisture and freeze during Corn Belt winters. The younger Cantús work as "finisheros," sanding down rough edges of dried concrete.

A $2.4 billion ethanol-plant construction boom is under way in the U.S., according to the Renewable Fuels Association, an industry trade group. Continuous pouring for the silos means round-the-clock work, requiring twice the number of laborers on site. Ethanol plants, situated near their raw grain supply, often are built where skilled labor is scarce.

Midwest construction firms including Fagen Engineering Inc., Granite Falls, Minn., and T.E. Ibberson Co., of Hopkins, Minn., and subcontractors Todd & Sargent and McCormick Construction Co., of Rockford, Minn., find Mexican subidos through a loose confederation of recruiters on the Texas-Mexico border. Those include Ray Maldonado, a Puerto Rico-born, transplanted

New Yorker now based in the border town of Eagle Pass. A former laborer, the 52-year-old Mr. Maldonado manages a loyal pool of Mexican workers. He vets work documents of subidos referred by his network of scouts across northern Mexico. He also places some subidos in permanent jobs with U.S. employers.

On a recent Saturday in Laredo, Texas, Mr. Maldonado shepherded 20 workers with their belongings in tiny suitcases and plastic garbage bags onto vans bound for North Dakota. The chain-smoking Mr. Maldonado checked names off a list and answered cellphone calls from workers still en route. As he talked, more crews rolled out of town, two drivers in front, passengers crowded behind, for the two-day drive. Bathroom and food stops are allowed only during refueling.

Sometimes Mr. Maldonado advertises by paying disc jockey Juventino Botello $10 for a 20-second spot on his morning show, on border station XEMU in Piedras Negras. "Workers needed, heavy construction, report to Beto's place in Eagle Pass," Mr. Botello calls out over accordion-laced "ranchera" music.

Around the corner from Mr. Maldonado, rival recruiter Pepe Regosa beat the sidewalks for Younglove Construction LLC of Sioux City, Iowa, which needed 55 men for a job in Missouri. Younglove "hires local guys to do this work, but they don't last," Mr. Regosa said with a grin. "Some leave after one day."

The work isn't just difficult, it is dangerous, too. Just before dawn Friday, 67-year old Jesus Guerrero fell 120 feet to his death, slipping from a scaffold at a silo one of Mr. Regosa's crews is erecting in Underwood, N.D., for Blue Flint Ethanol. "They'll ship the body back to Laredo," Mr. Regosa said. "The company pays."

In Charles City, Iowa, the Cantús joined nearly 100 of Mr. Maldonado's workers building an ethanol-plant corn silo for VeraSun Energy Corp. of Brookings, S.D. Phil Sargent, executive vice president of Todd & Sargent, based in Ames, Iowa, is a subcontractor on the site. He says he would prefer to use local workers but can't find enough of them. "Years ago, this was a summer job for college kids," Mr. Sargent says. He finds the local labor pool has shrunk, while the work has expanded.

Todd & Sargent says it doesn't pay imported workers less than Americans. Most jobs are nonunion. The company must pay additional housing and transportation costs for the subidos.

The accommodations aren't lavish. At the Best Budget Inn in Charles City, the five Cantús were crowded into $30-a-night rooms paid for by Todd & Sargent for the two-week job. Workers on the day shift used the beds by night, while late-shifters crawled in after the shift change at 7 a.m. "I don't have the staff to change everyone's sheets," said motel manager Linda Webb. "I tell each one to show courtesy to the man he's sharing with, and shower before going to bed."

Guest-worker proponents argue that a formal program would minimize costs to U.S. schools and welfare agencies, compared with undocumented workers, because guest workers would be free to cross borders legally and would likely leave their families behind.

Agustín García, a 62-year-old subido from General Teran, Mexico, a city southeast of Monterrey, says he never brought his wife or three children with him to the U.S. during 20 years of temporary work. "A man goes from hotel to hotel, works for maybe a week or two," he says. "He really has to travel alone."

Now, he and his wife share a tidy home in Mexico by a gentle stream, surrounded by households supported by subidos' wages. Mrs. García suffers from high blood pressure and circulatory problems, and benefits from Mexico's free health-care system. Mr. García says if they lived in the U.S., he couldn't afford to pay for her care.

In the U.S., his wages are taxed -- about $25 for every $100 he earns, according to a pay stub from a job Mr. García did this summer building a flour mill in Roanoke, Va. Generally, subidos pay all state, local and federal taxes. They also are covered by workman's compensation insurance in case of on-the-job injury, paying into a fund covering all workers on the job.

Undocumented workers, by contrast, are less likely to pay taxes. They frequently pay thousands of dollars hiring guides to help evade the Border Patrol. That gives them a big incentive to stay longer periods in the U.S. and bring their families across the border, often crowding into the poor neighborhoods they can afford. "We're turning people who would otherwise be temporary workers into permanent settlers," says Wayne Cornelius, an immigration expert at the University of California at San Diego.

The subidos rarely mix with local townspeople. In four years on the road, the Cantús say they haven't attended a baseball game, gone to a movie or visited a national park in the 20 states they have motored through. "We went past that rock in South Dakota once where they have the presidents' faces carved, but it was at night and we couldn't see it," says César Cantú, Roberto's youngest son.

Immigration critics argue that a guest-worker program wouldn't stem the flow of illegal immigrants but simply legalize lawbreakers. Some have a problem with workers like the Cantús as well, contending they are subverting the intent of their visas, which are meant to establish U.S. residency, not just working rights. Technically, they should have a commuter version of the green card, though the distinction isn't strictly enforced.

The presence of so much Mexican construction labor worries union officials in Midwest and mountain states, though demand for construction appears strong enough now to support both foreign-born and local workers. The Pueblo, Colo., cement plant being built by subidos, for instance, is within sight of a massive project, Xcel Energy Corp.'s $1.3 billion Comanche-3 power plant, which employs union workers, nearly all U.S.-born. Ethanol construction tends to be divided between union shops in large towns and subidos in rural areas.

Union officials complain bitterly that competition from Mexico is driving down wages, and there is evidence to back them up. Roberto Cantú's Pueblo pay stub shows he earned $14 an hour for a 45-hour week, and $21 for every additional hour. Pete Mustacchio, business manager of Cement Masons Local 577 in Denver, says Colorado's union pourers earn twice that, including an hourly wage of $23.40, plus health-insurance and pension benefits valued at another $9 an hour. Overtime starts at $35.10 an hour.

Figures compiled by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics indicate wages in concrete work fell 16.5% in 2005 from 2000 -- to $508 a week from $604, adjusted for inflation -- despite a soaring demand for workers. Meanwhile, the proportion of cement workers described as "foreign-born Hispanic" has risen to almost 55% from around 35% in the late 1990s. Statistics suggest many are replacing African-Americans, whose employment in concrete work declined to 9,000 in 2005, from 18,000 six years ago.

David Card, a University of California at Berkeley economist, says the decline in earnings is part of a long-term trend of nonunion construction workers replacing a unionized work force. Other factors are at play besides the subidos. Illegal-immigrant labor drives down wages even more than do legal subidos, and technology has reduced the need for some skilled workers.

An expanded guest-worker program probably would deepen the wage squeeze, says Harvard University immigration economist George Borjas. "I find a 10% rise in worker supply results in a 3% decline in wages" locally.

Earl Agan, business manager of Cement Masons local 51 in Des Moines, says ethanol-plant construction should be a reason to hire more union workers, not fewer. He has 260 members qualified to pour silos, at least 50 of whom are presently without work. "Contractors have my guys traveling all over the country," Mr. Agan says, arguing that remote work sites shouldn't justify importing workers. His conclusion: Contractors want a bigger share of the profit and won't employ union labor if they don't have to.

The Cantús, who were in North Dakota last week building a grain elevator, know their work is controversial. "Our first job was in Peru, Illinois," recalls Mario Cantú, Roberto's middle son. "There was a protest at the gate of the place we were working. I remember they had a big, inflatable rat bouncing around. And people held signs: Mexicans Are Stealing Our Jobs." Nowadays, they sometimes endure the silent treatment on the jobs from other workers, even those born in Mexico. "They say, 'Our job is next,' " Mario adds.

The five Cantús estimate they each earn around $35,000 a year working in the U.S. Daniel Cantú figures it will take him just a few more years of U.S. work to save enough money for his own contracting business. Then he will compete for work year-round in Monterrey, Mexico, where construction is booming. His wife might want to open a dress shop there, he says.

"We wanted to see what working in the U.S. was like," Daniel says. "Well, we've seen it. It's not something you can do forever."

Immigration Reform Efforts Reinvigorate Support For Guest Worker Program (LAT)

By Lee Romney

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

OCEANSIDE — Gilberto Valiente Romero cringes at the memory of his 2003 journey. The long trip to the Arizona border from his village in the Mexican state of Puebla. The hike across miles of desert. Then the bruising finale, as he was captured on the U.S. side and sent back.

But since 2004, the father of three has made the seasonal trek without fear of arrest, under the auspices of Oceanside vine-ripe tomato giant Harry Singh & Sons. Each year in June, Valiente travels at company expense to the northern Mexican city of Hermosillo and is put up at a hotel to await a guest worker visa.

He then boards an air-conditioned charter bus, complete with movie entertainment, for the trip to Singh & Sons, near Camp Pendleton. For six months, he works the fields for a government-set wage, $9 an hour this year. Housing is free and his three subsidized daily meals cost $8.78. Come December, a bus takes him home.

"If I could stay I would," the 38-year-old Valiente said while lounging recently in the dormitory courtyard. "But it's better this way. It's good to be legal."

As border enforcement shrinks the labor force of undocumented field hands and immigration reform looms in Congress, growers have focused with renewed vigor on the need for a simplified federal guest worker program.

For Harry Singh & Sons, which imported nearly half the agricultural visa holders in California last year, the federal program became a necessity in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001. With half its fields on the Camp Pendleton Marine Corps base, the company suddenly came under scrutiny by immigration officials. In a mid-harvest panic, having lost three-quarters of its workers, the company turned to the federal government.

DOJ_NMG_0064010

Singh & Sons' experience since then offers a close look at a program that growers and worker advocates alike agree is deeply flawed, yet crucial to comprehensive immigration reform.

The farm's general manager is Luawanna Hallstrom, whose Punjabi immigrant grandfather, Harry Singh, founded the company in 1940. Saying the guest worker program has driven her operation into the red, she estimates that her current annual costs are 28% higher than they would be without it. But the promise of reform keeps her going.

"I had always said 'I will never use the program until it's reformed,' " Hallstrom said. "But the only way we can farm now is because of it."

Still, it was a rocky start for Singh & Sons in the fall of 2001.

Growers must generally ask the U.S. Department of Labor to certify the existence of a labor shortage 90 days before foreign workers are needed. But the harvest was in full swing, so Hallstrom filed an emergency request.

Fortunate to have on-site housing, as required for the program, the company hastily recruited workers in Mexico. If all had gone well, those workers would have been vetted and approved by the State Department and then bused to Oceanside.

But the Department of Labor kicked the application back for revisions, and by mid-December, Hallstrom said, $2.5 million in tomatoes had rotted in the fields.

"We were stumbling through it," she said of the program. "Honestly, it takes a few years to get the hang of it."

Singh's second year in the program brought new difficulties. The law aims to protect U.S. workers by requiring that growers advertise the jobs widely and hire any qualified locals who respond, at the same pay and benefits as their foreign counterparts. But requirements that give domestic workers priority often collide with importing foreign ones.

Singh's application proceeded more smoothly in 2002. But in a pinch while waiting for the laborers to arrive, the company found workers in the Coachella Valley and bused them to the fields daily, paying $6.75 an hour rather than that year's required $8.02 an hour and free housing the foreign workers would receive, a lawsuit later alleged. Then, five days before the visa holders arrived, the busing stopped.

The company violated the law, a judge later ruled in a related injunction, by not offering the Coachella Valley farm hands the same deal as their imported colleagues. Singh & Sons settled out of court.

Although Hallstrom declined to discuss that and other lawsuits in more detail, she said the program's complexities have caused her to retain both immigration and labor lawyers. "We learned, and hopefully everyone else will learn from us," she said.

Still, she said, bureaucratic snafus have persisted. In 2004, the Department of Labor challenged Singh's ability to require that their workers not be color blind, something the company says is essential because the tomato crop is picked in seven shades from green to red. Although Singh eventually prevailed, the dispute resulted in a 45-day delay, which Hallstrom says caused crop damage.

This year, the company was abruptly notified there would be a five-week delay because the Department of Homeland Security, which vets company applications, had moved its processing center. Hallstrom, a Schwarzenegger appointee to the state board of Food and Agriculture and a national immigration reform advocate, enlisted help from the White House, and her applications were quickly processed. But, she asks, "how many people can do that?"

Still, experience has oiled the annual process, which begins when Hallstrom's cousin, David Singh, takes a trip through Puebla and Michoacan.

The excursions draw him away from his job as field manager and are not cheap; he once stayed a month with 150 workers in a Hermosillo hotel, waiting out a delay. But returning workers who trust the company now spread the word to friends and relatives, allowing Singh & Sons to avoid third-party recruiters and their fees.

In rural mountain communities, Singh finds men like Modesto Garcia Antonio, a diminutive farm hand with a dimpled smile from Puebla's San Jose Miahuatlan, who has never attempted an illegal crossing.

Garcia, who wires most of his pay to his wife and three small children, is on his second stint in the Singh fields. Accustomed to picking corn and tomatoes in Mexico for 70 pesos (or $7) a day, he was easily persuaded to travel north after meeting David Singh on village streets.

Workers in the U.S. with false documents have opportunities Garcia lacks, such as moving from crop to crop in search of better wages and conditions. Yet for those who have not yet crossed the border, the visa program is a rare open door.

David Singh "said it was good to come with papers because you earn a good wage," Garcia, 27, said recently, as the smell of carnitas wafted from the barracks kitchen and a lone worker played billiards. "It costs a lot of money to cross alone, and on the news they say it's very hard. Many die."

Hallstrom credits the two-story housing facility, built on company land in the 1980s for $2.5 million, for the farm's continued existence, because without it she could not use the guest worker program. Five new trailers nearby will soon house more workers, but for now Hallstrom pays for overflow employees to stay at Oceanside motels, a costly endeavor.

"We are willing to take losses now, because we are buying time," said Hallstrom, who notes that a number of colleagues have scaled down operations or moved them south of the border. "On paper, you'd look at it, and say, 'It's not making sense.' But I spent 20 years on this issue, and I'm not willing to give up."

She continues to push the federal government for a more grower-friendly program.

Government-mandated wages, she says, should be brought into line with regional averages for each commodity. And she says growers need more flexibility in housing and a shortened period during which they must hire qualified locals, because hiring them in some cases means laying off foreign workers. (Worker advocates are fighting to maintain the wage and housing requirements.)

For now, others who farm near Hallstrom's land say the program is financially out of reach for them.

"There is no housing," said Peter Mackauf, general manager of Leslie Farms, which attempted to build some in Carlsbad several years ago and met fierce neighborhood resistance.

Leslie Farms grows tomatoes, strawberries and other crops in an effort to keep a year-round workforce but pays mostly minimum wage. If strict enforcement compelled him to use the visa program, Mackauf said, he would have to raise prices.

Worker advocates concede that a $9 wage is better than $6.75 and barracks housing better than the creek beds where some San Diego County agricultural workers still camp. Yet they remain critical of the guest worker program.

California Rural Legal Assistance organizer Carlos Maldonado said his group has received reports from locally hired employees at Singh & Sons who feel outperformed by young all-male foreign workers. Imported workers, the local ones contend, have an incentive to work at excessive speeds without complaint: They want to be hired the following year.

Reforms to the program are not likely to ease all concerns. Still, a proposal known as AgJobs, part of the broader Senate immigration reform bill, would streamline Department of Labor approval and scale back the wage rate to the 2003 level while it is studied. It would also allow employers in some cases to provide a stipend instead of housing.

In return, worker advocates secured the right for guest workers to sue employers in federal court for contract violations. But their biggest coup, won by the United Farm Workers, was a program that enables the undocumented laborers to earn legal status if they commit to some continued work in agriculture.

The legislative debate is lost on Singh & Sons' visiting laborers. By 4 p.m. on a recent afternoon, they were trickling back from the fields where they had started work before dawn.

Mud-caked boots were piled in crates outside eight-man dorm rooms. Some workers tooled through the courtyard on bikes, the day's heat cut at last with a wisp of breeze. Most chatted quietly on benches and chairs or gathered in front of the 70-inch television screen.

"It isn't worth it to be a mojado," said Moises Parra, 34, referring to illegal immigrants. He learned of the program on the radio in Altepexi and has worked in it for three years. "We don't pay rent, water, lights. It's good."

Uniformed security guards patrol the compound, where alcohol is not allowed. The men are free to come and go on days off, even crossing into Mexico.

The work is hard: A handful from the Michoacan community of Rancho San Gregorio couldn't hack it and had returned home, said 20-year-old Luis Saldo Morales. But the pay and legal status are enticing.

Last year, 15 men came from the rancho. This year, word of mouth swelled the number to 30.

"None of us had ever crossed before. We never wanted to," said Morales, who is housed at a motel in town.

"It's almost like we're citizens, joked Morales' 22-year-old brother Fernando. "For a little while at least."

Migrating To Modernity (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

After the terrorist attacks of 2001, voters understood that poor failed states could hurt them. President Bush launched a smart new foreign aid program and multiplied the U.S. commitment to fighting HIV-AIDS, and rich countries around the world boosted development spending. But our approach toward poor countries remains confined, idiotically, to the debt-aid-trade box. People don't see that other policies in rich countries have a major impact on poor ones.

Consider immigration. Just about all rich countries are arguing about border enforcement, employer sanctions and so on, but nobody relates this stuff to the parallel arguments about development. Contemplating the noisy immigration politics in the United States, Gawain Kripke of Oxfam confesses, "we've been mostly bystanders in the debate, and I really regret that."

Development charities such as Oxfam certainly should feel sorry. In " Let Their People Come ," a new book published by the Center for Global Development, Lant Pritchett reports that if rich countries permitted extra immigration equivalent to 3 percent of their labor force, the citizens of poor countries would gain about $300 billion a year. That's three times more than the direct gains from abolishing all remaining trade barriers, four times more than the foreign aid given by governments and 100 times more than the value of debt relief.

It's true that there's a downside to immigration from poor countries. This isn't that it depresses wages in the United States; researchers find that this effect is small or nonexistent . Rather, it's that when doctors, nurses and other skilled people leave Africa, they hit the development process in its weak spot . A lack of trained workers is a more serious obstacle to poverty reduction than any lack of money.

Still, Pritchett's numbers show that the development gains from migration swamp the brain-drain problem. For the migrants themselves, a ticket to the rich world is the fast track out of poverty: A laborer who moves from San Salvador to Phoenix can multiply his income without altering the type of work he does or how good he is at it. And this process benefits developing countries, too. Migrants send home remittances, which exceed aid flows and are probably more effective, since the migrants ensure that their hard-earned cash is used productively by relatives. After a few years the migrants may return home armed with savings and ideas. The brain drain becomes a brain gain.

So migration ends up as a net plus for development. But a development-friendly migration debate would sound different from the current one. Immigration advocates in the rich world feel most comfortable making the case for allowing in skilled workers. Skilled migrants, however, trigger the biggest brain-drain concerns; allowing in unskilled workers does more to reduce global poverty. Equally, immigration advocates tend to want arriving workers to assimilate. But the best way to promote development is to allow a rolling cohort of poor workers to amass savings and experience -- and then return to their own countries.

Many immigration experts insist that a guest-worker program isn't feasible: As the old saying goes, there's nothing more permanent than a temporary worker. This is where Pritchett gets really interesting. Germany's Turkish guest workers have put down roots, he concedes, but Singapore, Hong Kong and the Arab Gulf states have taken in vast numbers of foreign workers who leave after a few years. Perhaps this is only possible in authoritarian states? Pritchett's answer is partly no, and partly that there are worse things than authoritarianism.

If the United States offered Mexico a million temporary work visas, it could attach conditions. It could stipulate that these workers be recruited by agencies in Mexico, which would screen candidates for criminal records, require minimal English skills -- and ensure repatriation. The agencies could do that, for example, by withholding some of the migrants' pay until they returned home. An agency that failed to bring people back could be ejected from the program.

Enforcing repatriation would still require tough government action. The United States would have to decide what to do about migrants who marry Americans, which is one obvious way in which temporary guests turn permanent. Singapore deals with this problem by denying guest workers the right to marry citizens. That is beyond the pale, you say? But if desperately poor migrants accept the no-marriage condition in exchange for a visa, who are we to second-guess them?

Pritchett is getting at a ticklish issue. Because the immigration debate is conducted without reference to development, it is couched in terms of American ideals; we don't want to let people in and then treat them harshly, for that would offend our own self-image. But if you bring development into the picture, it's obvious that extremely harsh poverty afflicts billions of people and that opportunities to alleviate this suffering are few and precious. An expanded temporary worker program is one such opportunity. If American ideals stand in its way, what does that say about them?

I.R.S. Eyes Religious Groups As More Enter Election Fray (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

With midterm elections less than two months away, Christian conservatives are enlisting churches in eight battleground states to register voters, gather crowds for rallies and distribute voters' guides comparing the candidates' stands on issues that conservatives consider "family values."

This election year, however, the religious conservatives are facing resistance from newly invigorated religious liberals and moderates who are creating their own voters' guides and are organizing events designed to challenge the conservatives' definition of "values."

Both religious flanks are looking nervously over their shoulders at the Internal Revenue Service, which this year announced a renewed effort to enforce laws that limit churches and charities from involvement in partisan political campaigns.

"We became concerned in the 2004 election cycle that we were seeing more political activity among charities, including churches," said Lois G. Lerner, the director for exempt organizations at the I.R.S. "In fact, of the organizations we looked at, we saw a very high percentage of some improper political activity, and that is really why we have ramped up the program in 2006."

The I.R.S. issued a report in February that said nearly half of the 110 tax-exempt organizations it investigated after the 2004 elections for improper political activity were churches. Of the 40 churches that the I.R.S. had finished investigating, 37 were found to have violated the law. These churches were given warnings or penalized with excise taxes and, although none lost their tax exemptions, the I.R.S. is still investigating seven more cases against churches.

Capitalizing on the crackdown, the advocacy group Americans United for Separation of Church and State plans to begin mailing letters today to 117,000 clergy members in 11 states warning them to avoid "any activity designed to influence the outcome of a partisan election," by either supporting or opposing a particular candidate.

"The stakes for these churches are higher than ever before because of the I.R.S.'s new enforcement efforts," said the Rev. Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "The I.R.S. is taking this very seriously, and I think it's because the situation was spinning out of control."

Mr. Lynn said that conservative churches in 2004 had constructed a political machine he likened to "a church-based Tammany Hall." He said he expected their voters' guides to be skewed to favor Republican candidates. "It's absolutely illegal, it's wrong and it divides churches," he said.

But a leader of Focus on the Family, a conservative Christian organization whose affiliates are distributing voters' guides in eight states, said its guides would be nonpartisan and comply with I.R.S. rules.

Tom Minnery, senior vice president for government and public policy at Focus on the Family, said, "What I see are people from the left complaining when people from the right decide they want to be citizens."

Focus on the Family, a ministry founded by James W. Dobson and based in Colorado Springs, has stepped into the vacuum left by the Christian Coalition, which pioneered the voters' guide tactic in churches in the 1990's under the leadership of Ralph Reed, but is now in disarray in many states.

Focus on the Family's state affiliates plan to register voters and distribute voters' guides in churches this year in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Michigan, Ohio, New Jersey, Minnesota, Montana and Tennessee: all states where Republican candidates favored by religious conservatives are on the ballot.

"Obviously, they're battleground states," Mr. Minnery said. "Our overall desire is for our constituency, generally conservative church people, to be involved citizens."

He said he regarded the threat of I.R.S. penalties as exaggerated, and he called Mr. Lynn of Americans United "the bully on the playground." He said the Alliance Defense Fund, a legal advocacy group, had offered to "defend for free any pastors if they're challenged" by the I.R.S.

Focus on the Family and its affiliates are holding pre-election rallies in Pittsburgh, St. Paul and Nashville, but no candidates will be invited to speak. The group also plans to send letters, Mr. Minnery said, "laying out the issues that separate the candidates in certain major races," but he refused to say which races.

Many of the most visible groups representing religious moderates and liberals are distributing materials that do not mention the candidates.

The voters' guides distributed by two such groups — Sojourners, a predominantly evangelical organization founded by Jim Wallis, and Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good — will enumerate principles that they say religious voters should use to evaluate candidates.

Among the principles are a commitment to reducing poverty and preserving the environment and caring for immigrants: in short, the left's version of "family values."

"We're not doing candidates," Mr. Wallis said. He added: "The principle comes from Martin Luther King Jr., who never endorsed a candidate, not once. He made them endorse his agenda. We want to create an agenda with a social movement behind it that holds politicians accountable."

Catholics United for the Common Good, which is affiliated with the Catholics in Alliance group, is compiling "candidate evaluations" for many of the senate races, using 25 criteria important to Catholic voters, said Chris Korzen, the group's director. But they do not plan to distribute paper copies, only to post it on the Web.

"It's a matter of resources," he said.

Pasadena Church May Fight IRS Summons (LAT)

By Scott Glover And Louis Sahagun

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064014

A liberal Pasadena church facing an IRS investigation over alleged politicking sounded a defiant note Sunday, with its leaders and many congregants saying the probe amounted to an assault on their constitutional rights and that they were inclined to defy the agency's request for documents.

"These people are offended," said the Rev. Ed Bacon, rector of All Saints Episcopal Church, after delivering an impassioned sermon about the investigation to a standing-room-only crowd of about 900. "Freedom of speech and freedom of religion have been assaulted by this act of the IRS, and I think my people want to be heard in court."

Bacon said he would consult with attorneys and church officials before deciding a course of action but that the vast majority of parishioners with whom he spoke Sunday thought the church should resist a summons demanding copies of newsletters, e-mails and other records.

"I believe we should respectfully decline to produce the documents," said Cathy Shearon, an All Saints parishioner "off and on" for more than 20 years. "Being passive plays into the culture of oppression."

Federal law prohibits nonprofits, including churches, from campaigning for candidates. At issue is whether an antiwar guest sermon, delivered two days before the 2004 presidential election by the Rev. George F. Regas, constituted campaigning.

Some All Saints defenders have called the IRS probe a case of selective prosecution. But conservative congregations, as well as liberal ones, have been investigated across the country by the agency over the years.

One church in upstate New York lost its tax-exempt status in 1995 after running a full-page ad in USA Today in 1992 saying that it would be "a sin to vote for [Bill] Clinton."

But at least one group familiar with the past probes called the All Saints case unusual in the breadth of the summons' request, which also seeks financial records and overhead costs related to Regas' sermon.

The probe surprised Americans United for Separation of Church and State, a watchdog group that has filed 58 complaints of improper church politicking over the last decade and a half. The grievances were roughly evenly divided between liberal and conservative religious groups.

"What perplexes me about All Saints," said Barry Lynn, a group spokesman, "is that I have never heard of a church being asked to undergo such a sweeping, broad and deep investigation on the basis of a complaint about a single sermon by a guest speaker."

All Saints came under IRS scrutiny shortly after Regas, the church's former rector, delivered a sermon that depicted Jesus in a mock debate with then-presidential candidates George W. Bush and John F. Kerry. The sermon did not endorse either candidate.

Regas' suggestion that Jesus would have told Bush his preemptive war strategy in Iraq "has led to disaster" prompted a letter from the IRS in June 2005 stating that "a reasonable belief exists that you may not be a tax-exempt church."

On Friday, an IRS agent handed Bacon a pair of summonses, one demanding that the church produce by Sept. 29 all materials with political references created in the 2004 election year, the other directing Bacon to appear before tax investigators Oct. 11.

At the pulpit Sunday, Bacon got straight to the point.

"I want to begin my sermon by once again expressing my gratitude to the Internal Revenue Service," he said, eliciting loud laughter from the congregation. "Those brothers and sisters really know how to shine a spotlight on a struggling church and swell the number of worshipers."

Bacon dedicated about half of his 20-minute sermon to the IRS issue, explaining that defiance could land the church in federal court. He asked parishioners to send him e-mails with their thoughts. He also noted that the summonses and other correspondence related to the case would be posted on the church's website, http://www.allsaints-pas.org .

Bacon told the congregation that, although he recognized that the church could not endorse or oppose a political candidate, neither could it remain silent in the face of "dehumanization, injustice and violence."

"History is shamefully littered with the moral bankruptcy of people who were Christian in name but not behavior," Bacon said, citing indifference by some Christians to slavery and the Holocaust.

"Neutrality and silence in the face of oppression always aids the oppressor," he said. When he was done, Bacon received a minutelong standing ovation.

Parishioner Sarah Letts said she was concerned that — right or wrong — defying the IRS could jeopardize the church's tax-exempt status and hamper its ability to do good.

"What I really like about this church is they don't just talk the talk, they walk the walk," Letts said. "I would hate for the IRS to be able to stifle that."

All Saints was one of several religious organizations that attracted national attention after being targeted by the IRS during the 2004 election cycle. Federal privacy rules, however, make it all but impossible to determine how those cases were resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0064015

For example, Americans United for Separation of Church and State asked the IRS to investigate the Rev. Ronnie Floyd of First Baptist Church of Springdale, Ark., for endorsing Bush in an unusual July 4, 2004, televised sermon.

Floyd never mentioned Bush by name when he compared the positions of Bush and his Democratic opponent, Kerry. But as he spoke, photographs of the candidates were displayed on a screen.

"Floyd went way beyond the pale," Lynn said. "Kerry's pictures made him look weird, and Bush's were flattering and made him look presidential."

On Sunday, Charlie Foster, a spokesman for Floyd's church, declined to comment.

Lynn's group was expected to launch an effort today to counter what he says is possible illegal campaigning coordinated by the Colorado-based Focus on the Family and its founder, James C. Dobson. Lynn said the conservative group plans various campaign-like activities, such as making political tracts available just outside church services.

IRS guidelines allow churches to publish voter guides as long as they avoid political bias.

"We believe Dobson's playing fast and loose with federal tax laws and that his intentions are to lure churches into what could be an illegal campaign," Lynn said.

In the meantime, All Saints' 3,500 active congregants are struggling to decide how best to proceed.

"It's a very tough call we have to make," said Bob Long, All Saints' senior layman and a retired attorney. "But we're at the point where they really are trampling on our constitutional rights.

"We can't just roll over, but we also don't want to spend all our resources," he added. "But beyond all that, I still can't believe we got stuck in the middle of all this after one sermon on a special occasion by a guest speaker."

Challenges Mount Against Refund-anticipation Loans (USAT)

By Kevin Mccoy

USA Today, September 18, 2006

H&R Block CEO Mark Ernst appeared eager to turn the page on a flurry of disappointing corporate news.

Speaking at the firm's annual shareholders meeting in Kansas City, the head of the nation's largest tax preparer outlined a fee-reduction plan that implicitly responded to critics who have charged that refund-anticipation loans unfairly siphon high interest charges from millions of low-income Americans.

But any hope that the changes announced at the Sept. 7 meeting would defuse that criticism evaporated as Peter Skillern, head of a watchdog group that has assailed the loans, followed Ernst at the microphone. Skillern, concluding an unsuccessful David-vs.-Goliath bid for a seat on Block's board, commended Ernst and said he would publicly support the changes — but then resumed the pressure.

“Rather than try to dress up this pig and have the best-dressed and best-acting pig in the market, we need to get refund-anticipation loans out of the market altogether,” said Skillern, executive director of the Community Reinvestment Association of North Carolina. He urged Block to lead a reform to “change the rules of the game.”

“We appreciate that Mr. Skillern attended our shareholder meeting and said he would endorse publicly the significant reforms H&R Block has made to its refund-anticipation loan product,” the company said.

Skillern issued his call amid a recent flurry of activity in Congress, the IRS and the courts that could better educate taxpayers about refund-anticipation loans and could impose new regulations on the transactions.

Each year, an estimated 10 million Americans, frustrated by weeks-long waits for their IRS refunds, turn to tax preparers who provide checks within days. Those checks are usually refund-anticipation loans, payments that are secured by and repaid from a pending federal tax refund.

The loans often run for seven to 14 days — the interval between the date they are issued and the date the lender receives the IRS payment that satisfies the debt. Because the loans are short term, the annualized interest rates often soar to 100% or higher.

More than half of those who received the loans in 2004, or more than 5 million taxpayers, were recipients of the earned income tax credit, a major federal anti-poverty program, IRS data show.

They paid an estimated $1.24 billion in refund-anticipation loan fees for 2004, the most recent year for which the data are available, according to a January report by the National Consumer Law Center, a non-profit that focuses on issues that affect low-income Americans.

They often don't realize that they're borrowing their own money at high rates — or realize that they're signing up for a loan at all.

They are Americans such as Canieva Hood, who testified that she faced a financial crisis when she went to a Jackson Hewitt Tax Service office in Trotwood, Ohio, to get her taxes done in January 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0064016

The then-29-year-old single mother of two explained in a court deposition last year that she asked Jackson Hewitt for the fastest refund possible, because she lived "from paycheck to paycheck."

"My rent was coming up, and I had a few bills that I had to pay," Hood testified. "And my daughter's birthday was going to be in a couple of weeks." She signed up for the company's Rapid Refund, which added $135 to the $155 she was already being charged in tax-preparation fees. The $290 total represented more than one-eighth of the total Hood overpaid in federal taxes for 2001, court records show.

But Hood said she never got her expected $1,954 refund. Instead, the money was transferred to help satisfy a $2,699 debt on a 1995 refund-anticipation loan she had received through H&R Block, court records show. She mistakenly received two refund checks that year, the records show.

Hood testified in her deposition that she didn't know the paperwork she signed at the Jackson Hewitt office in 2002 automatically authorized withholding of her refund to repay certain types of debt. Jackson Hewitt did not return calls seeking comment on refund-anticipation loan-related issues.

Today, Hood is the lead plaintiff in two potential class-action cases that are among recent actions posing legal and regulatory challenges to refund-anticipation loans:

·In February, California Attorney General Bill Lockyer sued H&R Block for allegedly misleading clients about the cost of the loans, a charge the firm denies. The case, which seeks several reforms, is proceeding even as H&R Block and its lending partners recently agreed to pay $101.5 million to settle other class-action cases filed over refund-anticipation loans.

·Jackson Hewitt, the nation's second-largest tax preparer, disclosed to investors in July that it is nearing a $5 million consent judgment with Lockyer's office to settle an inquiry launched in 2003 over the firm's refund-loan marketing.

·A pending U.S. Senate bill would require firms that provide refund-anticipation loans to register with the Treasury Department and comply with new public disclosure rules about the cost of the loans. The Senate also directed the IRS to produce a study on refund-anticipation loans. The report is expected soon.

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson called the loans "predatory" in a USA TODAY interview. However, he said, "What you have is a real demand on the part of approximately 10 million people who, when they come in and file their tax returns, they want their money, and they want it right away.

"And if the IRS were to step in and say, 'You can't do it,' I think there would be an uproar on this," said Everson. "I don't like these loans, but I don't have authority to stop them."

But Nina Olson, the IRS national taxpayer advocate, argued in a June report that the agency should improve its inspection oversight of electronic tax return originators, which in many cases facilitate refund-anticipation loans. The agency should also speed up refunds, reducing the need for loans, and provide refunds through a government debit card for those without bank accounts, Olson wrote.

Some members of Congress argue that the IRS has helped the refund-anticipation loan industry via the Debt Indicator, an IRS program revived in 1999. The program shows whether someone has federal or state tax debts or owes money on other government obligations. Banks considering a refund-anticipation loan application limit their financial risk by checking the Debt Indicator to determine whether the IRS is likely to withhold a tax refund.

Sen. Daniel Akaka, D-Hawaii, a critic of refund-anticipation loans, is a lead sponsor of proposed legislation that would block the IRS from continuing the Debt Indicator. Everson said a ban would be counterproductive.

"The people who provide these products have indicated to us if the Debt Indicator isn't there, they'll just jack up the (refund-anticipation loan) fees," he said.

Despite criticism of the loans, businesses ranging from used car dealers to furniture sellers have joined tax preparers in the market as a way to boost sales. During recent tax seasons, for instance, CarBiz, a Canadian firm now based in Florida, offered used car dealers a program called TaxMax. The program — recently sold by CarBiz — enabled customers to have their taxes done and get a refund-anticipation loan that could pay off an existing car loan or finance an upgrade to a newer car.

Everson, without addressing specific examples, voiced concern about companies involved in such arrangements, "because there is a temptation to shuttle people into (loan) products" that make money for the firms. However, he said, the IRS has no authority over "what lines of business people can be in."

What the IRS has done is propose regulations Everson said would require stronger written taxpayer warnings — "very clearly in bold letters, large size" about the legal and financial ramifications of refund-anticipation loans.

For their part, some companies that facilitate the loans have responded to the concerns of consumer groups and government officials. H&R Block and Jackson Hewitt agreed to eliminate some fees the firms previously charged for refund-anticipation loans.

DOJ_NMG_0064017

At the Block shareholder meeting, Ernst announced a cut in fees on the loans for customers who open accounts with the recently established H&R Block Bank. In recent months, he has also called on competitors to avoid so-called pay-stub loans, which can be issued even before the IRS issues annual W-2 earnings statements.

Everson said Block's plan to cut loan fees “doesn't solve all the problems, but it is a step in the right direction.”

North Carolina State Treasurer Richard Moore, however, said he's seeking outright elimination of the loans. In August, he teamed with New York Comptroller Alan Hevesi and Connecticut Treasurer Denise Nappier to seek a meeting with H&R Block's board of directors. The company has agreed to the request.

Moore said he plans to use the session to tell Block officials the loans are “really bad for business.”

“Just because there's a market for it doesn't make it right,” he said.

“We've made significant changes to our refund-anticipation loans since the last time Treasurer Moore spoke publicly about this issue. We look forward to explaining these positive developments during our meeting with him,” H&R Block said in a statement.

Mark Brooks, 26, a pharmacy supervisor and police officer trainee from Dayton, Ohio, shares Moore's feelings. Brooks said he had to pay $124 in fees — $44 more than he anticipated — when he got a refund-anticipation loan in 2003 through Jackson Hewitt.

“I was mad, but I didn't have any other choice,” said Brooks, who is among those who have joined a proposed class-action lawsuit against Jackson Hewitt.

“I was a full-time student then. I needed the money to pay bills.”

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New Supreme Court Term Promises Early Drama (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, September 18, 2006

The U.S. Supreme Court's new term, which already offers controversial challenges involving abortion, affirmative action, punitive damages and global warming, promises to add significantly to the emerging portrait of the newly constituted Roberts court.

The justices will open the 2006-2007 term on the traditional first Monday in October -- Oct. 2 -- but in an untraditional way. There will be no oral arguments because of the Jewish holy day, Yom Kippur.

But on that day, or as has become more routine in recent years, on the Friday before the first Monday, the Court will announce new grants of review -- as well as denials -- of cases gleaned from the thousands that came into the Court throughout the summer.

The justices approach the opening day with a relatively spare argument docket, having agreed to hear arguments in 31 cases, fewer than the number granted review at this time a year ago. But there is none of the uncertainty that surrounded them last fall as they awaited the arrival of a new chief justice and dealt with the impending departure of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

But even if the high court only decided the 31 cases currently on the docket, there is plenty of potential drama and legal significance in that group, say scholars and court watchers.

"There are some stand-out cases and each of them will test whether this is a 'restrained' Court," said constitutional law scholar Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University School of Law, referring to the abortion, affirmative action and punitive damages challenges.

Each of those "headline" cases, he added, also reflects the influence of Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who has played a major role or has cast the decisive vote in the precedents or doctrines underlying those challenges.

The balance of the current docket, said Kmiec, is not like those cases but is "wonderfully lawyerly," many dealing with such issues as retroactivity or administrative law.

"One trend from last term which I really hope will continue is that the chief justice seems to be oriented toward trying to find, where he can, an opportunity for consensus resolution of cases," said high court scholar Mark Rahdert of Temple University James E. Beasley School of Law. One of the weaknesses of the last chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, said Rahdert, was that he made no serious effort to achieve consensus, and that resulted in many splintered decisions and a huge increase in concurrences.

"It was really kind of messy," said Rahdert. "Roberts seems not to like that and to think the Court should speak with something more nearly approaching a single voice. That's not to say he is afraid of dispute."

FACING DISPUTE

DOJ_NMG_0064018

Roberts' consensus-building efforts surely will be tested early in the new term in two of the most divisive issues for the high court -- abortion and affirmative action.

"I think the handwriting is pretty clear in both areas that the law is going to change significantly," said Rahdert. "If you just line up the votes -- replacing O'Connor with [Justice Samuel A.] Alito [Jr.] on both issues. The committed minority in the past that was opposed to affirmative action and any kind of permission for partial-birth abortion is set to become a majority."

The real question in both, added Rahdert, is how dramatically will the law change. "Will the Court announce some sort of bold, new set of principles or apply the existing framework in a different fashion and weigh the values in a different way?"

In Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, and Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382, the Bush administration seeks to overturn rulings by the 8th and 9th circuits that struck down the federal Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

Every court to review the law has found it invalid, generally because it is overbroad and because it lacks an exception to protect the health of the woman -- a requirement established by a 5-4 high court decision in 2000 in Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914, which held that Nebraska's partial-birth abortion law was unconstitutional. O'Connor was the critical fifth vote to invalidate the law. Kennedy wrote a bitter dissent.

In enacting the federal ban, Congress explicitly found that a health exception was not necessary for this type of medical procedure.

"Rather than enacting a law that conformed to Stenberg, Congress sought to overturn that ruling and made findings in the act that criticized factual findings of numerous federal district courts," wrote Priscilla J. Smith of the Center for Reproductive Rights, who is high court counsel to Dr. LeRoy Carhart and three other physicians in the 8th Circuit case.

"There are two aspects to the case that are intriguing: the extent to which Congress has found the facts, and [that Congress is] owed deference under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment," said Pepperdine's Kmiec.

That has implications that extend beyond abortion, he said. "And the particular issue of the health exception, which has been, for conservatives, one of the more duplicitous aspects of the entire body of abortion jurisprudence."

Kmiec concedes that it is "very difficult at first blush" to see why a conservative, restrained court would take the abortion challenges, since there is no circuit split and there is a recent precedent.

"Maybe the answer is: It's not a fully restrained court, especially in this case where Justice Kennedy has been waiting to prevail, and justices [Clarence] Thomas and [Antonin] Scalia have not fully signed on yet to the Roberts-Alito method of decision-making," said Kmiec.

The replacement of O'Connor with Alito may also be determinative in the Court's two key affirmative action cases: Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District #1, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

Parents in both cases are challenging school integration guidelines that prevented their children from attending their school of choice because of their race or ethnicity. The Bush administration has intervened in the cases on the side of the parents, arguing that the guidelines involve "outright racial balancing" which is "patently unconstitutional."

The high court last visited the issue of affirmative action in 2003 when it upheld the affirmative-action admissions policy at the University of Michigan Law School, but struck down a differently constituted admissions policy at the undergraduate school. Gratz v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 244 (2003); Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003). O'Connor was the key vote and voice in the law school ruling; Kennedy was in dissent. If the school districts here lose, "It would really, in the context it is before the Court, signal the end of the Brown v. Board of Education desegregation era," said Temple's Rahdert. "What's left of school desegregation are these voluntary plans that try, at the margins, to combat the tendency of having patterns of one-race schools."

REGULATING WARMING

The high court takes up one of the most hotly debated environmental issues of the time-global warming-in a challenge to the Environmental Protection Agency's interpretation of the Clean Air Act. Massachusetts v. EPA, No. 05-1120.

The case involves whether greenhouse gas emissions from cars and light trucks should be regulated by the EPA under the Clean Air Act because of their contribution to global warming. The agency in 2003 concluded that it had no authority to regulate air pollutants associated with climate change, regardless of the state of the scientific evidence. It also concluded that the four substances covered by a petition seeking regulatory standards were not "air pollutants" within the meaning of the Clean Air Act.

Thirty parties, including 16 states, unsuccessfully appealed the agency's decision to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

In the high court, Massachusetts Attorney General Thomas Reilly argues, "The ruling in this case is an extreme departure from this Court's precedents on statutory interpretation. To allow this decision to stand would be to sanction an enormous shift of power to administrative agencies, effectively letting them dismantle statutory regimes they simply do not like."

The Bush administration argues that petitioners have no standing and that the agency identified "a variety of sensible and appropriate reasons -- including the complex and highly uncertain nature of the scientific record" for its conclusion that even if it had authority to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from motor vehicles, "an endangerment finding would be inappropriate at this time."

While global warming is a "first" for the Supreme Court, a key sentencing challenge in the new term is continuation of fallout from the justices' sentencing revolution begun with Apprendi v. New Jersey, 540 U.S. 446 (2000). In Apprendi, the Court held that the Sixth Amendment prohibits judges from enhancing sentences beyond statutory maximums based on facts not found by a jury.

In Cunningham v. California, No. 05-6551, the justices will examine California's three-tiered, determinate sentencing system for compliance with the Sixth Amendment and Apprendi and its progeny. Cunningham is significant for at least two reasons, said sentencing scholar Michael O'Hear of Marquette University Law School. "We're talking here about potentially devastating results for the largest state criminal justice system in the country," he said. "If the state loses, it's going to result in chaos in this enormous system."

A decision, he added, also may result in the Court saying important things about the federal system, in which, because of U.S. v. Booker, 543 U.S. 220 (2005), sentencing guidelines are no longer mandatory. "The state in its brief is trying to analogize its system to the federal system," said O'Hear. "If the Court declares the state system unconstitutional, then there is a question about what has been happening in the federal system since Booker was decided and the Court may feel obliged to talk about that."

Other cases to watch include:

Burton v. Waddington, No. 05-9222: Is the sentencing decision, Blakely v. Washington, 542 U.S. 296 (2004), retroactive?

Lopez v. Gonzales, No. 05-547; Toldeo-Flores v. U.S., No. 05-7664: Is the commission of a controlled substance offense that is a felony under state law, but a misdemeanor under federal law, is an "aggravated felony" under the Immigration and Nationality Act and thus a deportable offense?

Carey v. Muladin, No. 05-785: Is a defendant's right to a fair trial violated when family of the dead victim wore buttons bearing his picture during trial?

Former Reed Smith Partner Selected For 3rd Circuit (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, September 18, 2006

Two of the vacancies on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals could soon be filled now that President Bush has nominated Thomas Hardiman, a 41-year-old federal judge who has been on the bench in federal court in Pittsburgh for less than three years.

If confirmed, Hardiman, a former partner at Reed Smith, will fill the vacancy created in July 2005 when Judge Richard L. Nygaard took senior status.

Likewise, the second nominee, Judge Kent Jordan, 49, had served less than four years on the District of Delaware federal bench when he was chosen in June to replace Senior Judge Jane R. Roth.

No nominee has yet been named to replace Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who was elevated to the U.S. Supreme Court in January.

Hardiman is the former treasurer of the Republican Committee of Allegheny County, but also has strong ties to the Democratic Party by marriage. His wife is the former Lori Zappala, the niece of former Pennsylvania Supreme Court Chief Justice Stephen A. Zappala and cousin of Allegheny County District Attorney Stephen A. Zappala Jr.

Appointed to the Western District bench at age 38, Hardiman is one of the youngest 3rd Circuit nominees in recent memory -- but not the youngest.

Alito, now 56, joined the 3rd Circuit at the age of 40 and former 3rd Circuit Judge Timothy K. Lewis, who stepped down from the bench in 1999, was 38 when he joined the 3rd Circuit after just one year on the Western District bench.

The late Judge Edward R. Becker was 48 when he joined the 3rd Circuit, but had started his judicial career at age 37 on the Eastern District of Pennsylvania bench. And Judge D. Brooks Smith was also 37 when he was appointed to the district court bench in Pittsburgh, and 51 when he joined the 3rd Circuit.

The earliest start on a judicial career for a current 3rd Circuit judge is that of Senior Judge Walter K. Stapleton, who was 36 when appointed to the District of Delaware and 51 when he joined the 3rd Circuit.

Hardiman earned his bachelor's degree in 1987 at the University of Notre Dame and went on to earn a law degree in 1990 at the Georgetown University Law Center.

He spent the first two years of his career in the Washington, D.C., office of Skadden Arps Slate Meager & Flom, and in 1992 moved to Pittsburgh to join Cindrich & Titus.

In 1999, Hardiman joined Reed Smith's Pittsburgh office as a partner in the litigation department.

DOJ_NMG_0064020

Sen. Arlen Specter said Hardiman is an "accomplished judge with excellent academic credentials," and that he expects Hardiman will be "an outstanding addition" to the 3rd Circuit.

Sen. Rick Santorum also praised the nomination, saying he had "enthusiastically supported" it, and that he was "pleased that President Bush nominated such an outstanding candidate to fill this vacancy."

Hardiman's colleagues on the federal bench in Pittsburgh have also sung his praises.

In the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette earlier this year when his imminent nomination was just a rumor, Western District Chief Judge Donetta W. Ambrose called Hardiman "an absolute star on our court."

And former Western District Chief Judge Donald E. Ziegler was quoted in the Post-Gazette as saying Hardiman was a "pleasant surprise" on the district court, and that he quickly earned high marks from lawyers.

Huns In The Control Tower? (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

The Federal Aviation Administration earlier this month had many of its 1,500 or so supervisory personnel in St. Louis to discuss, among other things, implementation of new work rules for air traffic controllers -- a move strongly opposed by the controllers union.

The supervisors were encouraged to focus on improving their leadership and management skills, lest there be a decline in employee morale. There was a list of books in the FAA's Center for Management and Executive Leadership Library Resource Center that might be useful.

Some of the titles are well known in the management world: "More Than a Motorcycle: The Leadership Journey at Harley-Davidson." That might come in handy, as would "Mentoring: A Practical Guide" or "Leader as Coach."

Our favorite? "Leadership Secrets of Attila the Hun ." The explanatory blurb describes this as a book about "the man who centuries ago shaped an aimless collection of nomads into rulers of the ancient world -- offers us lessons today."

Never heard air traffic controllers described as an "aimless collection of nomads," but . . .Noble Goal: 'To Leave With Dignity'

The plaudits have already begun for House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry Hyde (R-Ill.), who's leaving Congress at the end of this term.

At the end of a committee meeting Tuesday, likely one of the last Hyde will chair, his good buddy Rep. Tom Lantos (Calif.), the panel's ranking Democrat, praised Hyde's accomplishments and asked everyone to give him a round of applause for his service.

When the applause died down, Hyde reflected on his three-plus decades in Washington: "When I came here 32 years ago, I wanted to change the world. Now I just want to leave with dignity. The committee stands adjourned."Big Brother Is Watching the Watchdogs

Good news last week from the White House briefing room -- temporarily in a Jackson Place townhouse across the street on Lafayette Park. Reporters will no longer be able to tell whether the White House is watching them. They'll just have to assume it.

CBS News White House correspondent Bill Plante spotted something odd Tuesday during press secretary Tony Snow's morning's briefing, known as the "gaggle," which generally is not televised.

A small TV camera was mounted in the ceiling, Plante noted. It was black, matched the television lights and was unobtrusive, he wrote in his news blog.

Plante observed a White House aide panning the camera from one reporter to another as they asked questions. So what was this all about? Snow said he didn't know.

Turns out it's so the White House staff can watch the informal briefings -- and see who's asking what questions. White House officials assured reporters it was not for surveillance.

On Thursday, the camera was gone. Plante heard that it was being fitted with a wide-angle lens so it wouldn't need to swing around.

By Friday, the camera was back. And it indeed looked like it had a wide-angle lens.Treasury, Back in the Game. Maybe.

There was some chatter last week in the press about how new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is restoring his department to its traditional top-tier status after six years of downward drift under largely ignored predecessors John Snow and Paul O'Neill .

Yes, we're hearing about how heavy-hitters have been filling top positions at Treasury and how Paulson talks regularly with the White House and President Bush 's innermost circle, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice .

DOJ_NMG_0064021

Some White House and State Department reporters say they detect the hand of veteran Bush spinmeister Jim Wilkinson at work in all this scuttlebutt. After all, Wilkinson worked at the White House and more recently at State before becoming Paulson's chief of staff just a couple months ago.

Well, even so, still could be true.Matters of State and Style

While Paulson allegedly is quickly finding his place in the Cabinet firmament, superstar Rice, who is not running for president, was busy Friday afternoon doing a photo shoot and interview with Vogue magazine for a piece later this fall. Unclear, we were told, whether this was necessarily to be a cover, but there will lovely photos of Madam Secretary. Remember, she's not running.'Do-Nothing Congress,' Indeed

Low expectations award of the week. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), speaking at a gathering of the New American Foundation on Thursday night, said: "There are only six days left in this 109th Congress. It doesn't matter. We haven't done anything anyway."

Senate Struggles On Earmarks (RC)

By Tory Newmyer And Kate Ackley

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

The two Senators taking the lead on reforming their chamber's earmark rules need to come up with a measure that can sail through the Senate before GOP leaders approve it, a senior leadership aide said.

The Senate is struggling to match the reform enacted last week by their House colleagues, and with the clock ticking down to adjournment, it is unclear whether Senators will be able to produce any workable rules changes.

For now, Senate Republican leaders are deferring to Rules and Administration Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and ranking member Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), a GOP leadership aide said.

Similarly imperiled is a plan that Lott and Dodd want to push to eliminate the long-standing Senate tradition of secret holds, in which Senators can block legislation without identifying themselves. Republican leadership in the chamber remains opposed to the proposal.

While the holds change and the earmark reform likely would move separately, a leadership aide said it remains to be seen whether either one will advance.

A spokeswoman for Lott did not return requests for comment, and a Dodd spokeswoman said the Senator is waiting for Republicans to step forward with a plan.

"Sen. Dodd stands ready to listen and report back to his leadership, but we've not heard of any movement or proposals from the majority," Colleen Flanagan said, adding that Dodd "was very clear that he thinks the House ought to move forward and appoint conferees in the time still left to enact comprehensive reform."

Broader lobbying reform remains stalled, because the House-passed legislation includes a provision cracking down on 527s that is opposed by a cloture-proof majority in the Senate. Despite new calls for action from outside ethics groups after the Friday's news of an expected guilty plea by Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), prospects for a more comprehensive measure on lobbying laws continue to appear dim.

Meanwhile, focus has shifted to the Senate after House lawmakers approved a change to their internal rules requiring new disclosure for sponsors of earmarks on spending, tax and authorizing bills. With appropriations season in full swing, aides, lobbyists and outside watchdogs were struggling late last week to understand the House-passed language and gauge its impact on the remaining work on spending bills this year.

"It's unclear," said House Appropriations spokesman John Scofield. "Ideally it would apply to both chambers, but we lost that argument because of political expediency."

Members of the House spending panel mostly opposed the rules change. Their interpretation of the measure is that it cracks down more forcefully on appropriators than it does on taxing and authorizing committees. And while fiscally conservative Republicans hailed the reform's passage, some in their ranks were still unsure late last week exactly what it would accomplish.

"It's going to turn into the commencement of hot debates on exactly what earmarks are," one conservative House GOP aide said. "We see this as just the beginning."

For appropriations bills, the House earmark reform seems likely to have a limited impact this year. The change is only certain to apply to earmarks in the one spending measure the chamber has not yet passed — the Labor, Health and Human Services and Education bill. Other than that, only earmarks dropped into conference reports will have to include the names of their sponsors.

That means that if the Senate does not pass its own version of reform, only earmarks added in conference and in the House Labor bill will be identified.

DOJ_NMG_0064022

Steve Ellis of Taxpayers for Common Sense said not disclosing all earmarks in this year's spending bills would be "a slap in the face."

"I can certainly say we're going to be expecting" fuller disclosure, he said. "And if they don't provide it, then the taxpayers will know this has been a sham that's been perpetrated on them, and they will demand it."

Michael Fulton, an appropriations lobbyist at GolinHarris, said he's in favor of earmark transparency. "I think it will keep lobbyists and Members of Congress more clean, and that's good," he said. "It will make it better for those people that are following the rules and being transparent about their projects."

Richard Gold, who heads the lobbying practice at the firm Holland & Knight, which has many appropriations clients, said the reforms should have little impact on the business.

"The fact that you're going to slap somebody's name next to it, that's not going to make a difference for reputable lobbyists," he said.

But one appropriations lobbyist, who would speak about earmark reform only on condition of anonymity, said the reforms could have an impact on his and his colleagues' lobbying techniques.

Currently, this lobbyist said, his strategy is to get several Members to submit his clients' requests to the Appropriations committees and hope that the flood of requests, coupled with the clout of certain Members, carries the projects across the finish line. But if only one Member gets credit for securing an earmark, this lobbyist said, some Members will not want lobbyists to urge other Members to ask for the earmark. "One Member might say, 'I'm the champion — don't go to anyone else,'" this lobbyist said.

This lobbyist added that "the thing that concerns me the most is where this is going." He said he expects it to be "a roadmap for all these watchdog groups and federal investigators to attack every earmark and to look at who's the lobbyist, how much did they contribute."

He said that already, some senior-level Congressional staffers are spreading the word that lobbyists who want earmarks should not write checks to Members who are helping them get earmarks for clients.

We're Changing The Culture (USAT)

By Brian Bilbray

USA Today, September 18, 2006

The American people believe that the accountability and transparency they expect from their leaders have been replaced by backroom deals. The practice known as "earmarking" has fostered a system that places a premium on waste and abuse.

For far too long, earmarks were added anonymously without any debate. Special interests have too much influence in the appropriations process. Decisions were made behind closed doors and out of public view.

Last week, the House of Representatives took the first step in changing the culture that has left so many Americans disillusioned with their government. With the public demanding reform, the House adopted rule changes to the practice of earmarking that will bring more transparency to the legislative and appropriations process. For the first time, earmarks will be put in the public light where everybody will be able to see how their tax dollars are being spent.

This is the first step of many in what must be an ongoing commitment from this Congress to blow away the fog of anonymity that surrounds our governing process. If we are to make a profound and lasting change in how this institution handles the taxpayers' dollars, then we must be willing to adopt changes that will enable us to be better stewards and more responsible to the taxpayers.

That is why I am calling on Congress to adopt a two-year budget cycle, so that election-year politics wouldn't influence budget and appropriations decisions. I believe that decisions about the budget process should be made after elections, not before them. The American people believe their government is broken. It is up to us to repair it.

A two-year budget process would help create more oversight, accountability and transparency. The path to reform has only begun. We must have the will and commitment to restore the public's confidence.

Rep. Brian Bilbray, R-Calif., co-sponsored the House resolution on earmarks that passed last week. (House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis declined to provide an opposing view.)

Time For A Time-Out? (WSJ)

By John H. Fund

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

If Republicans lose big in November, one reason will be their tardy response to public outrage over profligate spending. The guilty pleas of former GOP Rep. Duke Cunningham and lobbyist Jack Abramoff prompted demands for reform of the earmarks -- pork projects members often secure in secret -- that were prominent in both scandals.

DOJ_NMG_0064023

On Thursday, the House did finally pass a rules change that will force sponsors to attach their names to projects. The Senate isn't expected to follow suit, meaning earmark reform there must wait until next year. On the plus side, both houses this month did pass the Federal Transparency Act. It creates a public Internet database that will allow Google-like searches of the $1 trillion in federal grants, contracts and loans. The "shame factor" the bill will heighten is needed, given that earmarks grew tenfold between 1990 and 2005.

As modest as it is, the transparency bill spent much of August in limbo after Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens of Alaska, chief defender of the infamous "Bridge to Nowhere," put a hold on it, using the tradition allowing any senator to secretly block a bill. These games feed the perception of an out-of-touch Congress and demoralize many GOP voters. "Every event I go to, someone complains about overspending and pork," says Rep. Chris Chocola of Indiana, one of the most embattled GOP incumbents. "They still don't think we get it."

Many members simply don't believe the political costs of pork can ever exceed the benefits. Democrats have been largely silent. After all, they get about 45% of them even as a minority. "One man's pork is another man's steak," is how many members dismiss reform.

Congressional appropriators argue that earmarks represent less than 1% of the federal budget and are often worthy projects. But earmarks have a budgetary impact far beyond their dollar cost. "They are a gateway drug on the road to spending addiction," says Republican Sen. Tom Coburn. Many members feel compelled to vote for bloated spending bills, fearing their local projects will be stripped out.

Earmarks have also dramatically expanded lobbying. "Lobbyists go client hunting, telling cities they can virtually guarantee an earmark," says Ron Utt of the Heritage Foundation. In 2005, nearly 4,000 companies or local governments hired lobbyists to pursue earmarks, up from just 1,865 five years ago. Jack Abramoff is a case in point.

Earmarks by the thousands inevitably bring scandals by the dozens. This month has already brought two. The U.S. attorney in New Jersey subpoenaed records from a deal involving Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez and a Hudson County nonprofit that starting in 1994 paid Mr. Menendez a total of $329,353 to rent a building that he owned. At the time, the nonprofit was run by a political ally of Mr. Menendez. Later, the same group was the recipient of millions in federal funding after Mr. Menendez, then in the House, broadened federal grant standards to include that nonprofit.

Meanwhile, Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Democrat from Washington state, helped arrange $11.6 million in federal earmarks in the past year for projects benefiting clients of a lobbyist who is advising her re-election campaign and still owes her between $15,000 and $50,000 from a personal loan. Both senators say they sought the funding because it benefited their states.

Republicans have their own earmark problems. The San Diego Union-Tribune reports that House Appropriations Chairman Jerry Lewis has steered hundreds of millions in federal funds to clients of lobbyist Bill Lowery, a former congressman who is so close to Mr. Lewis that they have exchanged two key staff members, "making their offices so intermingled that they seem to be extensions of each other."

Sen. Stevens defends the earmark process, claiming "discretionary federal spending isn't out of whack," despite all evidence to the contrary. He admits a lot of the earmarks now being handed out wouldn't have passed constitutional muster before the Great Society, but no one is more tenacious in seeing his state now gets its maximum share. Humoring him has cost Republicans credibility. He has become an icon of earmark excess, starting with the fact that he's given his name to Ted Stevens Anchorage International Airport. Earmarks appear to be a family business. Bill Bittner, his brother-in-law, is a D.C. lobbyist who has hauled in dozens of earmarks for his clients. His son, Ben, is the majority leader of the Alaska Senate, and while in office has collected large consulting fees from companies that benefited from some of dad's earmarks.

Last month, federal agents raided the offices of Ben Stevens and a half-dozen other Alaska legislators, investigating ties between them and an oil-services company. Some of the legislators involved even referred to themselves as "the Corrupt Bastards Club." Alaska officials admit the perception of favoritism in local contracts and federal earmarks is embarrassing the state.

Similar embarrassment is spreading to Congress. Staffers are appalled at how members prostitute the institution by scraping the bottom of the pork barrel. Rep. Dan Lungren of California says that "members are now much more mere errand boys for local government and constituents."

Rep. Chocola supports extending the term limits that now apply to all committee chairmen to all members of the Appropriations Committee. "It's clear appropriators see the world differently from all the rest of us," he told me. Term limits would at least limit how much their vision could be warped while serving on Congress's "favor factories." The ban on gifts to members and their staff should also be extended to local governments and universities seeking earmarks.

President Bush could also do more. Republican Sen. Jim DeMint notes that the Congressional Research Service has found that 95% of recent earmarks were slipped into committee reports and not written into law. "These non-legislated earmarks are not legally binding," he says. "President Bush could ignore them. He doesn't need a line-item veto."

DOJ_NMG_0064024

The federal government is now an astounding 185 times as big in real terms as it was a century ago. A general sense that Republicans have forgotten why they were sent to Washington is a big reason why only 43% of Republicans approve of Congress in this month's Fox News poll. If Republicans can't better explain how they plan to get a grip on spending, many voters will conclude they both deserve and need a time-out from power.

The Ghosts Of Corruption Present (NYT)

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

One of the shabbiest shell games under way in Congress is the attempt to convince voters that lawmakers are curbing their corrupt relations with power lobbyists. The cravenness was never clearer as G.O.P. House leaders passed a placebo rules change in place of honest reform — and on the very day when one of their own, Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, was plea bargaining in the corruption investigation of his old friend Jack Abramoff, the disgraced überlobbyist and influence peddler.

The political ghosts of Mr. Ney and Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, should haunt this Congress and its Republican bosses for their disgraceful refusal to end the Capitol's embrace of the lobbying industry. In the first burst of the Abramoff scandal last spring, both houses made all manner of reform vows, then cynically hung two hollow bills out to die on the vine.

Last week House leaders sanctimoniously promised an end to the "fog" and "shadows" with a rules change concocted of smoke and mirrors. The rule pretends to deal with just one part of lobbying corruption, the cramming of millions of dollars in special interest favors into must-pass budget bills.

Disclosure of these backdoor deals and their sponsors is promised. But lobbyists who have feasted on earmarks are already mapping their way around this fig leaf, just as lawmakers hungry for lobbyists' campaign money know they have once more voted for the shameless status quo.

Congress is offering this wink and a nod on earmarks only to cover its spinelessness on larger ethical issues. The Republican majority has already junked proposals to restrict the rise of lobbyists as campaign finance brokers for grateful lawmakers.

A more responsible Congress would ban lobbyists as political money bundlers, as well as the proliferation of lawmakers' relatives as lobbyists and the Capitol junkets catered by lobbyists on corporate tabs.

Playing Politics With Terror (WP)

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

"ILISTEN TO MY Democrat friends, and I wonder if they are more interested in protecting the terrorists than protecting the American people."

That was House Majority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio talking to reporters last week. He should apologize.

For five years the country has been debating how to balance aggressive action to prevent and punish terrorism with core concerns about privacy and other civil liberties. On many issues -- the treatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay and in secret prisons, warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency, prohibitions against torture -- Democrats, joined by some brave and responsible Republicans and more often than not backed up by the courts, have served as an important brake on an administration heedless of constitutional requirements, international law and national reputation. On some matters -- for instance, their overblown denunciations of the USA Patriot Act -- Democrats have been mistaken in their criticisms.

But whether one disagrees with Democrats on any particular issue, it is offensive to try to paint opponents, as Mr. Boehner did, as uninterested in "protecting the American people" -- and to dodge the implications of that statement by claiming, as Mr. Boehner did, that he was simply wondering. As the election season heats up, this is a line of argument that Republicans would do well to drop.

For Ex-Postal Service Official, Summer Scandal Heats Up (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

All summer, federal-dom has been abuzz over a steamy U.S. Postal Service Inspector General's report accusing the agency's former public affairs chief of heavy drinking, expense account chicanery and sexual harassment. But who knew that the subject of the report, Azeezaly S. Jaffer, has spent the season on vacation, courtesy of the Postal Service?

Jaffer's taxpayers' holiday bears witness, a Postal Service spokesman said, "to how hardworking he is."

The June IG report accuses Jaffer, who managed a staff of 160 and a $20 million budget, of, among other things: drinking at a work function until he passed out; running up $8,000 in extra hotel room charges so he could qualify for a suite with a bathtub for two; and following a female colleague into her hotel room, propositioning her, then passing out.

DOJ_NMG_0064025

The Postmaster General's office requested the report in mid-2005, after employee complaints about Jaffer's behavior, spokesman Gerry McKiernan said. Eleven days after the IG released its report June 19, Jaffer, who denies the allegations, left the agency "to pursue other career opportunities."

His departure was announced by Postmaster General John E. Potter, who wrote in a memo to officers that Jaffer "served us well during some of the most difficult public relations challenges faced by any organization," including the 2001 anthrax attacks. His efforts, Potter wrote, "were critical to maintaining public and employee confidence in the Postal Service and the mail."

And then, despite the allegations, Jaffer went on two months' paid vacation, which ended Sept. 1. Beyond that, Jaffer's attorney, Matthew Hsu, said, his client is in line for another two months' vacation pay; at his annual salary of $160,000, the four months of vacation pay amounts to more than $50,000.

Jaffer has paid the Postal Service $3,600, mostly for bills run up by his family last year.

Late last week, the Postal Service issued new post-Jaffer expense guidelines. Dinners, they say, should not exceed $50 per person, more frugal than, for example, the $1,066.08 that the IG says Jaffer charged the Postal Service for dinner for three, including 16 drinks.

McKiernan wondered last week why anyone remains interested in this summer's scandal. But Congress aims to keep Jaffer's endless summer warm at least through autumn.

On Friday, Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) who chairs the House Committee on Government Reform, and the committee's ranking minority member, Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.), sent a letter to Potter requesting a pile of records linked to Jaffer's case. "The Inspector General's report of clearly unacceptable conduct by a senior postal official is troubling to all of us," the letter reads. The Postal Service has until Sept. 28 to respond.

Jaffer spent some of his summer vacation telling his side to Sidley Austin, which recently released a 42-page "white paper" denying the charges against him.

A few excerpts follow:

The IG says: "Jaffer drinks to excess at official Postal Service functions and has done so to the point of unconsciousness on at least two occasions. . . . [Name redacted] . . . recalled going to dinner with Jaffer and others at a restaurant in New York City. . . . Halfway through dinner, Jaffer fell forward, almost hitting his head on his plate, apparently losing consciousness. [Name redacted] escorted Jaffer back to his hotel room."

Sidley Austin says: "The OIG alleges that Mr. Jaffer . . . was refused boarding on flights due to intoxication and that he left his shoes in a hotel lounge due to intoxication. . . . None of these allegations are true. Mr. Jaffer freely acknowledges that he has consumed alcohol at many different Postal Service events and business dinners. However, he has never consumed alcohol to the point of incapacitation or incoherence. . . . Postal Service employees who have worked with Mr. Jaffer . . . have never seen Mr. Jaffer lose consciousness or be carried to his room because he was intoxicated."

The IG says: "[Name redacted] stated that one evening in 2000 while attending the National Postal Forum held in Nashville, Tennessee, Jaffer offered to escort her to her hotel room. She did not realize how intoxicated he was when she accepted his offer. The manager stated that he followed her into her room, tried to touch her, and propositioned her. She could not convince him to leave her room, and Jaffer finally fell asleep on the floor. . . . The next morning Jaffer woke up and immediately left her room. . . . She stated that when Jaffer sees her in the building, he compliments her appearance, tells her he loves her . . ."

Sidley Austin says: "Mr. Jaffer treats female employees of the Postal Service with respect and dignity. . . . Specifically, in 2000 or 2001 at a Postal Forum in Memphis, Tennessee, Mr. Jaffer and [name redacted] shared a brief drink at the hotel bar. . . . He offered to walk her back to her room. . . . When they got to her room, he continued to talk with [name redacted] in her room, and then he eventually fell asleep on the couch. . . . He did not make any explicitly sexual or vulgar remarks to her, nor did he attempt to touch her or make sexual advances toward her."

The IG says: "When asked about the high per-person costs of the meals he hosted at Peking Gourmet Inn, Jaffer stated that they have to be looked at in context. . . . Jaffer stated that, in regard to wine, he considers anything up to $100 a bottle to be "halfway decent and reasonable."

Sidley Austin says: Mr. Jaffer's alcohol purchases were appropriate. . . . His requests for reimbursement were never denied. The Postal Service never cautioned or counseled Mr. Jaffer regarding his alcohol purchases. . . . Mr. Jaffer has acted as someone in his position should -- he has entertained individuals who have benefited or may be in a position to benefit the Postal Service."

DOT Specialist Accused Of Fraud (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

As a specialist on fuel cell technology in the U.S. Department of Transportation, Shang Hsiung traveled the country for years to attend trade conferences to discuss alternative fuel and other agency initiatives.

But federal authorities say the 54-year-old Takoma Park man had another agenda during his out-of-town trips.

Since 2001, prosecutors say, Mr. Hsiung used counterfeit checks and stolen credit-card information -- including co-workers' card numbers -- to pay for escort services while on government travel.

Mr. Hsiung, who has been placed on leave and has declined to comment, is scheduled to appear for a hearing in federal court in the District next month. He was charged with wire fraud last week.

If convicted, Mr. Hsiung faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison.

Charging documents do not state how much money investigators think was stolen over the years. A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in the District said the amount is not yet part of the public record but "is in the thousands of dollars."

The charges filed Sept. 11 state that Mr. Hsiung "stole credit card numbers and credit card information from co-workers at the Department of Transportation and from other people ... to purchase the services of escorts."

G. Allen Dale, Mr. Hsiung's attorney, said yesterday that there are "two sides" to the story.

"Often times, good people make mistakes," he said. "My job is to make sure that this person, whom I view as a good person, doesn't pay for it more than necessary."

From his office in the District, Mr. Hsiung used his government computer to find escort services in anticipation of trips, Jonathan R. Barr, assistant U.S. attorney in the fraud and public corruption section, wrote in charging documents.

Mr. Hsiung, a transportation-management specialist, also used his work telephone to contact escort services in California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Illinois, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Texas and Georgia, prosecutors say.

In addition, Mr. Hsiung is accused of impersonating the vice-president of an unnamed company that is traded on the New York Stock Exchange and creating counterfeit checks in the company's name.

Prosecutors said Mr. Hsiung told escort services that the company was trying to negotiate "a major deal with an Asian businessman and stressed that it was important for the businessman to be shown a good time."

According to public records, Mr. Hsiung has been a leader at the transportation agency in touting fuel-cell and hydrogen-technology initiatives to industry leaders.

He was the project manager for an agency study last year that focused on moving toward hybrid-electric technology for transit buses. He also was the point of contact in the agency for a $49 million fuel-cell, bus-technology grant program.

Report Offers 6 Keys To A More Successful Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

Federal managers looking for that road map to the future may want to check out a report, to be released today, on six trends that are keys to overhauling government operations and improving federal performance.

The trends were identified by three senior staff members at the IBM Center for the Business of Government with an eye to helping federal agencies prepare for an era in which incremental change may not be enough to meet public expectations or to address such megaproblems as terrorism.

"The challenges facing governments call for comprehensive and profound change," Jonathan D. Breul , a senior fellow at the IBM Center, writes in the report. He adds, "Those that play a waiting game, postponing these changes, will find their fiscal strength and programmatic effectiveness eroding."

For the report, Breul, Mark A. Abramson , the IBM Center's executive director, and John M. Kamensky , an IBM senior fellow, pull together themes from 150 research papers prepared for IBM since 1998. The center, a component of IBM's federal consulting practice, awards $20,000 stipends to researchers who produce papers on federal management issues.

Some of the trends have gained more traction than others and some are proving controversial. The trends, according to IBM, are:

Â· Changing the rules. The traditional personnel, procurement and financial management systems are being replaced. New organizations, such as the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, have been created to improve coordination and to determine who can be held accountable for certain activities.

With congressional approval, the departments of Defense and Homeland Security are leaving the decades-old federal pay system to set up performance-based pay systems. IBM research, however, cautions that shifting public-sector employees to performance pay is risky and may prove to be the most difficult challenge faced by many agencies.

Â· Using performance management. Strategic planning and information about agency performance and costs have increased substantially since passage of the 1993 Government Performance and Results Act.

The U.S. Postal Service and the Defense Finance and Accounting Service, for example, have created goals to reflect "the voice of the customer," "the voice of the employee" and "the voice of business," according to the IBM Center.

Â· Providing competition, choice and incentives. On taking office President Bush called for a "market-based government," but his efforts "have achieved limited success," the IBM Center says.

Bush's primary initiative has focused on job competitions to determine whether federal work should be turned over to the private sector. Research for the IBM Center found the competitions can achieve "better results at lower costs, regardless of whether the winner is the public or the private sector." But the center notes that "its future use is uncertain because of political concerns about potentially adverse effects on the federal workforce."

Â· Performing on demand. It's no longer business as usual because government must be much better at sensing and responding to economic, social, technological and health changes -- "be they terrorism, mad cow disease, or the processing of drug benefit claims," the IBM report says.

In addition to being more responsive, key agencies must find ways to maintain their service levels "no matter the impediment or threat," according to the center.

Â· Engaging citizens. Technology provides new opportunities for government to involve the public in decisions and policies. Research has found that trust in government increases when citizens are engaged, the report says.

Â· Using networks and partnerships. As society becomes more complex, agencies cannot succeed in delivering services or programs on their own any longer, the IBM report says. Agencies will probably be more successful by creating collaborative efforts that reach across agencies, across levels of government, and across the nonprofit and private sectors, according to the report.

In adapting for the future, Abramson says, agencies will need a strong career civil service and an experienced team of political appointees. If those ingredients are in place, he says, "our prediction is that we will see all six trends accelerate."

Washington Whispers (USNEWS)

By Paul Bedard

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

A father's influence on his son can be incredible, from shaping a boy's outlook on life to the tiny, seemingly unimportant things like choosing between Bic and Sharpie. That's certainly been the case in the Bush family, where President Bush has sometimes gone Texas-big with his dad's lessons. Where the 41st president played baseball, the 43rd owned a baseball team; while Dad stopped troops short of invading Baghdad, W made it his target; and as the former prez prefers to use Sharpies, the current prez demands them-and even gives them as presents.

"He asks for them by name," says a Bush insider, "and if someone hands him something else, he barks, 'Where's the Sharpie?'" How come? "They're so easy to use," says another Bushie. "And you can see what you've written." Bush's isn't just any Sharpie. Like those famous boxes of peanut M&Ms, Bush's Sharpies carry his signature and the words The White House. He even has Camp David Sharpies. If you're an important aide, the presidential Sharpies are included with a signed golf ball, baseball, tie clip, and cuff links in the White House trinket bag each gets.

Sharpie boss Howard Heckes, president of Sanford Brands North America, says lots of celebs-like tennis star Maria Sharapova-have personalized pens, but "it's pretty cool" to supply the prez. "Sharpies are good for the president of the United States or the president of the PTA."

Can Magnum P.I. Replace Moses?

That old National Rifle Association TV ad in which Magnum P.I. actor Tom Selleck says, "I am the NRA" might be making a comeback. That's because he's being talked about as the replacement for former five-term NRA President Charlton Heston, the Moses portrayer who is afflicted with Alzheimer's disease. NRA insiders like the idea of promoting Selleck, an off-and-on NRA-er since he was a kid and now one of 76 board members, to the top job. But some suggest that while it will eventually happen, it won't happen soon. Emilie Raymond, author of the new book From My Cold, Dead Hands: Charlton Heston and American Politics, agrees. "Maybe when Selleck hits a point in his career when he's doing less leading roles and more cameo spots," she tells us, "he'll have time to devote to the NRA in a fashion similar to Heston's presidency."

He Saw 9/11, Now He Sees 'the End'

Joel Rosenberg, the New York Times bestselling author whose books have eerily predicted bad things like 9/11, has a new one coming out, and in it he takes on the superbig question: Is the end near? Seems many think so. For Epicenter, a book on the Middle East crisis, Rosenberg had the polling firm McLaughlin & Associates ask 1,000 adults if they agreed that current events were evidence of what the Bible calls the last days. In the poll, provided exclusively to Whispers, a remarkable 42 percent agreed. The breakdown is even more startling: Half of women agree, 75 percent of blacks agree, and 57 percent of those ages 18 to 25 agree.

Country Before Politics (WT)

By Stephen Herbits

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Next week, the US Senate has yet another opportunity to choose between self-serving superficiality or a willingness to put country before politics.

Tomorrow, the Senate Armed Services Committee will hold hearings on two important military promotions and assignments. The two General Officer nominees served in succession between 2002 and 2006 as senior military assistants to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Obviously, it will be tempting for some senators to use the occasion to play "let's beat up on Rumsfeld" instead of truly considering the merits of the officers before them. It will be easy for these senators to take another temporal stab for small political gain, while ignoring the damage they are doing to the process of attracting and retaining the best to serve our country in uniform.

General officer promotions and assignment of three- and four-star officers require Senate confirmation. Prior to recommendation, a potential nominee's military records are scrutinized for performance, moral and ethical standards and superiors' recommendations. After full vetting by military and civilian leaders of an officer's military branch, the Office of the Secretary of Defense and subsequently the White House, nominations are then submitted to the Senate for its consent.

The Senate has every right -- even a clear obligation -- to review candidates for the most senior positions of our armed forces. Today, more than any time in recent history, our military is faced with dangerous threats coming from nationalistic and theocratic enemies, asymmetrical tactical and technological warfare, and demands for new strategies, capabilities and organizational approaches. We are at war and need the very best and brightest to lead our military. And so the Senate must scrutinize.

But the Senate role decidedly does not extend to punishment for serving in an assignment close to a political appointee. Worse, using a Senate hearing meant to judge qualifications for advancement to create a circus of criticism for policies for which these individuals were not responsible will tarnish the reputation of some of our most talented and honorable public servants. It risks deteriorating the quality of senior officers willing to seek such advancement.

A disturbing trend has emerged over the past several decades. Our federal government is less and less able to attract the best and the brightest of America to serve in positions requiring Senate confirmation. Many studies written by panels of experts analyze the discouraging and adversarial confirmation process facing Presidential nominees. We now face an even further deterioration of the process -- extending to the highest ranks of the military. In many ways, it will be the process that is on trial next week, and not the candidates.

Two exceptional officers will be testifying tomorrow. Both have served their country to an extraordinary degree. Both have earned the highest level of respect from civilian leaders and military peers as they have executed their responsibilities. And both Gen. John Craddock and Vice Adm. James Stavridis have served brilliantly as senior military assistants to the secretary of defense.

Two other great military leaders, Gen. James Jones, current Supreme Allied Commander Europe, and Adm. Edmund Giambastiani, current vice chairman of the Joints Chief of Staff, both also served as senior military assistants to secretaries of defense and gained invaluable experience by witnessing the civilianpolicy-making process up close. Only the best are given such an opportunity to gain this invaluable perspective and this experience serves the nation well.

How Senate committee members treat the two gentlemen before them next week will convey to other military officers in line behind them the degree of the futility of sacrificing financial gain and family stability, in order to hold challenging positions for our country's well-being.

Yes, the Senate should study the candidates closely. But the Senate has no place pillorying them for decisions they don't make or policies they don't construct. And as difficult as it may be for some, it wouldn't hurt if diligent questioning was also relevant and respectful.

DOJ_NMG_0064029

We expect our military officers to sacrifice self-interest for country. We should accept no less from our senators.

A Vote For A Smarter Census (NYT)

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

The Census Bureau has stubbornly rebuffed critics who argue that the nation's prison inmates should be counted at their homes instead of where they are serving time. But a persuasive new report from the National Research Council makes the current method difficult to defend. The Census Bureau commissioned the report, which deals with residency rules in general. In one of its most important findings, the report says that the practice of counting inmates at prisons sometimes distorts the political process and "raises legitimate concerns" about "equity and fairness in the census."

Prison inmates are stripped of the right to vote in all but two states. But state lawmakers often treat them as "residents" of their prisons when drawing legislative maps, to help underpopulated districts raise their numbers. That shifts political influence from the densely populated urban districts where inmates actually live to the sparsely settled rural areas where prisons are typically built.

The report says that the question of residency should be decided on a case by case basis. It recommends that the Census Bureau gather information on time spent in prison and expected date of release. The bureau could then differentiate between a prisoner serving a lengthy sentence and one who is due to return home within a few years.

Questionable and incomplete state and prison records are a clear obstacle to this fairer system, and the report proposes that the Census Bureau undertake a research program to unravel those problems. It also suggests a sensible interim remedy. The bureau could make it easier for lawmakers to remove inmates from the count altogether, by publishing detailed, block-level counts of prison populations. That would also allow voters to keep watch on redistricting committees that now deliberately draw legislative districts around prisons, thus masking population shortfalls and cheating voters in other parts of the state.

Markets Shift Into Record-setting Gear (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, September 18, 2006

NEW YORK — Round up those rally caps. Chill the champagne. Glue your eyes to the ticker tape. Blue-chip stocks may soon slay the bear.

Six years, eight months and three days after etching a record close of 11,722.98 into the history books, the Dow Jones industrial average starts the week just 162 points shy of topping that.

If it succeeds, it will erase all of the 37.8% loss it suffered during the 2000-2002 bear market, a painful period on Wall Street that shook investors' faith in stocks.

"We can break out to new '06 highs and even to new all-time highs," says Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management.

In May, the Dow came within 81 points of a new, post-crash peak but was thwarted by a nasty global sell-off caused by fears of interest rates tightening around the globe. But in recent weeks, the "twin worries" of a potential recession and runaway inflation have receded, says John Forelli, portfolio manager at Independence Investments. That angst has been replaced by a growing belief among investors that the Federal Reserve will succeed in slowing the economy without killing it.

The idea of a not-so-hot, not so-cold economy favored by investors is gaining traction, he says.

The mood shift on Wall Street is being driven by a few key trends, including:

·A belief that the Fed chairman's forecast is playing out. When the Fed decided not to raise its target for short-term rates in August after 17 boosts, Fed chief Ben Bernanke based that decision on the belief that a slowing economy would relieve inflationary pressures. He also noted that if energy prices retreated, it would also help abate price pressures.

He's been right. A barrel of crude has dropped to $63.33, or 17.8% from its July 14 high of $77.03. Readings on inflation have also stabilized after spikes earlier in the year. Friday, an inflation gauge that tracks consumer prices rose 0.2% in August, below forecasts. "What the chairman told us would happen," Paulsen says, "is coming to pass."

·Relief that consumers are still shopping. Fears of a severe consumer slowdown due to $3 gas have yet to materialize, helped in part by relief at the pump. Retail sales numbers out last week show a customer still willing to spend, says Ken Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader.

DOJ_NMG_0064030

·A feeling that the Fed is done. Odds for a post-pause rate increase by the Fed are falling. “The Fed is out of the way for a while. That is our thinking,” says Forelli. Still, Forelli says, a new Dow record “is not the new buy signal.” The real time to buy, he says, will be three months before the Fed starts lowering rates. “But,” he says, “we are not sure when that will be.”

Day Of The Dow? Blue Chips Again Close In On Record (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

As fall officially begins this week, investors are hoping they won't see a repeat of the spring.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average in May pulled within about 80 points of its record high, only to tumble. It was off more than 936 points, or 8%, by the time it bottomed a month later. Many shareholders took the spring peak as a chance to book profits rather than stick around for even heftier gains to top the Dow's all-time high reached in January 2000.

After a solid rise last week, the blue-chip average is once again within striking distance of the high now just 162 points away. The Dow gained 168.66 points last week, or 1.5%, to 11560.77, leaving it up 7.9% on the year. A pullback in energy prices and fresh data showing little inflation in the U.S. economy helped spur the rally.

Given the Dow industrials' earlier miss, most Wall Street pros aren't touting the prospects for a record too loudly this time around. But while risks remain, many are upbeat about the type of big-name companies included in the 30-stock average. They also see signs that investors have become a little more willing to take risks, which could bode well for avoiding another sharp selloff.

"I don't think [a Dow record] is that tough an obstacle at this point," says Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investors in San Francisco. "If we continue to get encouraging inflation news, that would go a long way toward making it happen."

Friday, the Labor Department reported that consumer prices, excluding volatile food and energy prices, inched up 0.2% in August, in line with analysts' expectations. The data buoyed hopes that Federal Reserve policy makers will leave their key interest-rate target unchanged when they meet Wednesday.

Crude-oil prices have plunged recently amid robust inventory data and easing geopolitical worries in major producing countries. Crude futures are off about 18% from summer highs, at $63.33 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday. That has pushed the average retail price of regular-grade gasoline down about 14% over the past month, to $2.554 a gallon, according to the drivers' organization AAA. This means consumers will have more money to spend on other things, which could boost corporate profits.

Helped by such developments, other stock indicators also have rallied, although they remain further from their records, all set in 2000. The technology-stock heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 3.2%, or 69.80 points last week, to end at 2235.59, up 1.4% on the year. It still would have to more than double from its current level to reach its record 5048.62, which was fueled by dot-com mania. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index last week rose 1.6%, or 20.95 points, to 1319.87. It is up 5.7% on the year and 16% away from its record.

Compared with its lows this summer, the Nasdaq index is up nearly 11%, beating the Dow's and S&P's gains of less than 8% from their recent troughs. So has the small-stock Russell 2000, up 8.5%.

Many investing pros interpret the relative strength of the Nasdaq and Russell 2000 as a sign that stock investors are again willing to pile into riskier stocks that aren't necessarily household names. "It's a fairly rational response to this notion of a slowing economy," says Mr. Koesterich of Barclays. "If growth is generally getting harder to come by, investors are going to be willing to pay more for the stocks where they can find it."

It isn't clear how long that trend will continue, but in the short term, a higher tolerance for risk could have some positive effect on the Dow industrials as well. At least for now, investors don't appear to be making what Wall Street calls a "rotation" from large caps into small caps, dumping one for the other.

The Dow's rise has been fueled by big gains in just a handful of stocks with company-specific news. Shares in Dow component General Motors have soared 63% so far this year, based largely on its restructuring plans. Altria Group, which accounts for the greatest chunk of the price-weighted Dow, is up 11% based on the mostly favorable outcome of some tobacco litigation and rumors of a spinoff involving its Kraft Foods unit. (Altria officials have declined to comment on specific steps it might take.)

AT&T is up 30% this year, but that is after declining nearly 50% over the previous five years. And Hewlett-Packard shares are up 26% but have been hindered recently by a scandal involving the way a subcontractor obtained telephone records in an investigation of leaks from the company's board of directors.

DOJ_NMG_0064031

Strategist Jack Caffrey of J.P. Morgan Private Bank believes investors are still mostly in a defensive mode, which means they will continue to buy shares in big, multinational firms that are perceived as safe. He says the Dow could head higher, although he steers clear of calling for a record.

"If I'm right in terms of why these names go up, then I'm happy," he says. "If it hits a record, well, then double kudos. But that's not my focus."

One risk facing the Dow is that some unexpected economic development -- perhaps a steeper selloff in energy -- could upset the gradual economic slowdown that much of Wall Street is hoping for.

Most strategists believe a so-called Goldilocks economy -- one that's not too hot, not too cold -- would be the best scenario, offering ample room for stocks to head higher. But if inflation gets out of control, or if the economy teeters into recession, such an outcome could be upset.

Jim Paulsen, chief investment strategist at Wells Capital Management, thinks the dollars consumers are saving at the fuel pump will flow toward other purchases. In turn, he thinks that will spur the Fed to increase rates again to slow the economy, perhaps spooking stock investors. Higher interest rates can crimp corporate profits by boosting borrowing costs and also deter consumer spending.

Dow Nudges Peak Of Six Years Ago (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

The US stock market is finally nearing the peak levels it reached in 2000 - before a recession, terrorist attacks, and surging oil prices exacted a toll on American financial wealth.

As bull markets go, this one has been slow and faltering, but the comeback is nearly complete.

In the past two months, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has jumped about 8 percent. It's welcome news for investors, but more broadly it reflects a vote of confidence for America's economy at a delicate time.

Some economists worry about a possible recession, especially if the housing market stumbles badly. Others fear that inflation will persist. But the stock market is riding on hope of a more moderate outcome: that the economy can continue growing, if perhaps more slowly, as a housing boom fades and inflationary forces diminish. A recent drop in oil and gasoline prices has bouyed those hopes.

"The background in the economy is pretty good," says Michael Cosgrove, who publishes the Econoclast, a market newsletter based in Dallas. If it stays that way, he says stocks could hit new highs and "we could have a pretty good run in 2007."

If this week's performance matches last week's, the Dow Jones Industrial Average will push through a kind of millennial milestone - the 11722.98 peak reached on Jan. 14, 2000.

The widely watched index of 30 major stocks closed last week at 11560.77, just 162 points or 1.4 percent away from matching its old record. The broader Standard & Poor's 500 stock index was still about 10 percent off its early-2000 level.

Analysts are divided over just how far the current bull run might go. Some say a string of record corporate profits is bound to end as the economy cools. Others say the presence of such bearish sentiment could provide a backdrop for some good gains.

"There's a pretty well-rehearsed bearish story out there," says Max Bublitz, chief strategist of Seneca Capital Management, an investment firm in San Francisco. But that story, he says, is "a little shopworn."

His forecast is for solid but unexciting gains in the short term and next year.

"What we are is kind of defensively bullish," he says. He reckons the S&P 500 index could end this year at around 1360 and next year at 1450, for a price gain of about 9 percent in 15 months.

The bearish view points to a range of challenges: a likely slowdown in corporate profits, uncertainty about the economy and inflation, past history of market declines during the fall months, and concern about US elections or flash points in the Middle East.

Factors such as those have been holding investor sentiment in check. In one way, that could be good news. Stock prices often "climb a wall of worry," in Wall Street- jargon, when investors gradually overcome a pessimistic trading environment to generate marked gains.

By contrast, strong bullish sentiment can be a sign of a market reaching its upper limit.

There's certainly been no such frenzy in this bull market, which will celebrate its fourth birthday in October, according to Standard & Poor's. The bull began its upward climb late in 2002 as the economy was struggling to find its feet after the dotcom stock bust and the Sept. 11 attacks. After a sharp initial rise of nearly 30 percent in 2003, US stocks have risen slowly even as corporate profits have soared.

DOJ_NMG_0064032

Normally, over the long term, share price gains are closely related to corporate profits, which in turn depend heavily on the performance of the US and world economy.

But stocks hit such a high peak in 2000 that it has taken a long time to reestablish equilibrium.

"We think that the market's fairly valued," says Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at S&P in New York. "In this period of increased risk, investors are not willing to pay up for stocks."

Standard & Poor's forecasters predict that the S&P 500 will end the year at 1315, slightly below its Friday close.

At that level, the stocks will be valued at about 15 times their actual earnings for the calendar year.

S&P expects its index, which covers 500 of America's largest companies, to gain about 9 percent in price next year.

"I'm a single-digit bull," not a raging bull, says Mr. Stovall.

Indeed, he acknowledges that a record string of 17 quarters of double-digit earnings growth by the companies in the S&P index may be nearing its end. Perhaps two more quarters of such gains remain.

Richard Bernstein, chief strategist at the investment house Merrill Lynch, talks of an outright "profits recession" next year, with earnings growth turning negative for a time as companies face a cooler economy.

The firm recommends that investors devote a bit less of their money to stocks than usual - 50 percent instead of 60 percent - with the remainder in bonds and cash. Mr. Bublitz, by contrast, recommends putting more like 65 percent in stocks.

Amid the debate over where the market will head next, some recent economic news has been reassuring. An inflation report on Friday was subdued, offering hope that the Federal Reserve won't have to raise interest rates when it meets this week - and that the Fed's rate-tightening may have ended.

But Mr. Cosgrove, the Dallas economist, cautions that when the S&P 500 index is adjusted for inflation, it is still only halfway back to its 2000 peak. Stocks remain the best place to invest, he says, but the decade may be done before the S&P's price is again at its inflation-adjusted 2000 level.

Rates Not Expected To Go Up This Week (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve is expected to leave short-term interest rates unchanged when it meets Wednesday, given recent signs of moderating inflation and growth.

A market that bets on future Fed moves was pricing a 90% chance that the central bank will stand pat this week for the second straight meeting. But there is less agreement about the Fed's long-term strategy.

John Silvia, Wachovia's chief economist, says that while inflation is higher than the Fed would prefer, recent signs of moderating prices give the Fed room to sit tight on rates to get a better sense of where the economy is headed.

“If housing deteriorates faster, they may (cut rates) in the first quarter,” Silvia says. “If housing stabilizes and the rest of the economy picks up, they may raise rates. … It's that open.”

After 17 quarter-point rate increases from June 2004 to June 2006, the policymaking Federal Open Market Committee voted in August to stand pat, leaving its target for short-term rates at 5.25%.

Though core inflation, which doesn't include food and energy prices, has been running above the Fed's informal comfort zone of 1% to 2%, Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and other officials have said in speeches and statements they expect a slowing economy to reduce price pressures.

There is some evidence that's happening. On Friday, the Labor Department said consumer inflation was 0.2% in August, down from July's 0.4% jump. Excluding food and energy, prices rose 0.2%, the same as in July, and are up 2.8% in the past 12 months. Light, sweet crude has fallen sharply from its July high of $77.03 a barrel, easing inflationary pressure from energy prices. U.S. crude prices settled at $63.33 Friday in New York trading.

“So far, it looks like everything is playing according to the script that (Bernanke) laid forth,” says Dan Jester, economist at Economy.com.

Jester predicts the Fed will hold pat into next year but adds there are big risks to the outlook.

Those risks have economists and Fed officials divided about the course of policy down the line. Richmond Fed President Jeffrey Lacker voted against the August pause and warns that inflation, mainly from wage pressure, is building.

But Roger Kubarych of international bank HVB says declining factory output could mean the slowdown is broader than expected. The Fed reported Friday that industrial output fell 0.1% in August, with manufacturing activity flat and declines in mines and utilities.

How Stock Options Muddle The Relationship Among Wages, Corporate Profits And Inflation (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

DOJ_NMG_0064033

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Scorekeepers at the Commerce Department last month discovered that American workers were earning far more than previously estimated -- and that created an economic puzzle.

The new data were out of step with other measures showing sluggish wage growth, a factor in widespread worker dissatisfaction turning up in the polls. And the increased income wasn't matched by more production -- that is, in gross domestic product -- as it should have been.

Solving this puzzle is important for understanding how well American workers and companies are doing and whether rising wages pose an inflation threat.

The answer appears to be stock options, a growing part of compensation for top-end workers. Accounting for them properly has been a major source of controversy for companies. Now it is complicating the government's economic accounting, as well.

The Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis, which keeps the nation's GDP books, treats profits from the exercise of options as labor income. But options aren't counted in most other measures of wages. So the BEA reports -- which are important both to markets and the Federal Reserve -- may be overstating the extent of wage pressure, and, for related reasons, at least temporarily understating profits.

Here is what's going on:

Last month, the BEA declared that labor income for all Americans in the first half was an annualized $95 billion, or 1.3%, more than it had estimated just a month earlier. This suggested Americans were flush with cash, welcome news for those worried about a slowing economy, but it also raised inflation alarm bells.

From 2001 to 2004, the productivity of American workers -- the amount they produced for each hour on the job -- rose enough so that companies could pay somewhat higher wages without raising prices. The new data changed that benign picture. They showed that business compensation per employee-hour soared almost 8% in the year through June. Adjusted for higher productivity, labor costs jumped 5%, a near six-year high.

But something didn't seem right. That jump in labor costs should have squeezed profit margins, yet margins are at a 40-year high. Plus, the 8% rise in hourly compensation far outstripped better-known measures of labor costs. The Labor Department's employment-cost index -- which includes hourly wages, benefits and bonuses -- rose just 3% in the same period. The weekly wage of workers at the statistical middle rose only 2.5%.

Adding to the mystery was the economic-textbook fact that Americans' income -- wages, benefits, profits, etc. -- is supposed to equal the value of what they produce. But after the revisions, gross domestic income was rising much faster than GDP. The two seldom match perfectly, but the divergence was striking.

The likely explanation: stock options. The income earned when employees cash in stock options is counted in both gross domestic income and the Labor Department's productivity-adjusted labor-cost measures, but not in most of the other wage measures.

"The stock market was strong in the first quarter, so that suggests probably quite a bit of stock-option exercise," says Brent Moulton, associate BEA director for national economic accounts. Because higher-paid employees are more likely to have stock options, this helps explain why the advance in labor income doesn't reflect the average worker's experience.

Stock options also might have led the BEA to overstate profits, and thus gross domestic income. Here's why: Corporations keep separate books for shareholders and for the Internal Revenue Service. The BEA uses the latter to measure profits.

The two treat stock options differently. When reporting profits to shareholders, companies must expense only the fair value of the option on the day it was granted. That's usually quite low (unless the option was backdated, but that's another story).

But when reporting profits to the IRS, the company may expense the (usually) far-higher value of the option the day it was exercised. So in periods of heavy options exercise, shareholder profits will be higher than taxable profits.

"For wages and salaries, we now have very accurate data," Mr. Moulton says, thanks to speedier access to unemployment-insurance data, which track both regular wages and options. For corporate profits, though, the agency relies a lot on reports to shareholders. Because these generally exclude full options expense, the BEA must estimate it. The BEA must wait as long as a year for the annual reports for the details on option expense, and two years for comprehensive IRS tabulations.

"We sometimes can get quite large revisions when we get the IRS data," Mr. Moulton says. It is "a possibility" that profits will be revised down when BEA gets the complete detail, he says.

If options expense has squeezed profits, is that a problem for inflation? Probably not. Corporations don't think of stock-option expense as ordinary labor compensation, says Robert Willens, a tax-and-accounting expert at Lehman Brothers. Option expense is "dependent on how the stock does, which is sort of out of the company's or the employee's control."

DOJ_NMG_0064034

Thus, investors and the Fed are likely to discount swings in the BEA labor-cost measures once they figure out they have more to do with swings in the stock market than anything else. The bottom line: Wage increases, while accelerating, aren't flashing a warning sign.

Democrats Bolster Economic Message (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

Forced to play defense on national security for the third election year in a row, Congressional Democrats have been huddling in recent days to try to sharpen their attacks on the one issue they believe puts Republicans on the run: the economy.

"We've been aggressively pushing back on these national security issues that we know are on their turf," said a senior Democratic aide. "Now we want to go on our turf.

"We've got to go on the offensive and keep our eye on the ball — and that's the economy."

While the economy has long been a central focus of both the Democratic and Republican election-year platforms, Democrats in both the House and Senate have been working behind the scenes to redouble their efforts to draw attention to the issue.

Democrats in both chambers say they cannot sideline their economic message, even as they attempt to battle a powerful GOP political machine that's trying to paint them as weak on terrorism.

Privately, Democrats say they believe they can tap into voters's anxieties about economic security just as effectively as the Republicans play into Americans' fears about their safety at home.

"Bush and the Republicans have clearly tried to keep us focused on national security, and while Democrats are going to hit back hard, we also have to make sure we get them to play on a field that's favorable to us," said a high-level House Democratic staffer. "We have to be able to walk and chew gum at the same time."

Sen. Ron Wyden (Ore.) said Democrats have been talking about the economy "every step of the way" but acknowledged that Republicans, armed with the megaphone of the White House, recently have been able to define "the entire agenda" around the issue of fighting terrorism.

But, Wyden added, "we don't take a back seat to anybody" on national security, and will fight "strenuously" to further the Democratic agenda on the economic front.

"Yes, they have the bully pulpit to talk about security, but that's the only issue they have," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.). "In all other areas, they have essentially been failures."

Democratic lawmakers and aides say they believe the 2006 elections will turn on several factors, but in many of the top competitive races across the country — including contests in states such as Michigan, Ohio, New York, Indiana and Kentucky — the economy is likely to be the driving issue. And internal and external polling suggests that the economy remains the No. 1 concern on most voters' minds this cycle, even behind the Iraq War, those Democratic sources said.

The Democratic House aide said while the party may be able to make gains on Nov. 7 on the GOP's handling of the war by itself, the Democrats' stance on the economy is the issue that will bring the party across the goal line.

"We're not going to win 15 seats on the war in Iraq," the staffer said.

Sen. Debbie Stabenow (D-Mich.), running for her second Senate term, said the economy is the issue atop Michigan voters' minds, calling it "the No. 1 focus of everyone in my state." And while national security is important to her constituents, she said, the 2006 election "is all about jobs."

Democrats acknowledge they aren't inventing a new economic message, nor are they laying out new proposals with just seven weeks until Election Day. But they are planning to once again ramp up the number of media events, floor speeches and legislative maneuvers where they press key economic issues, including a minimum-wage increase, Social Security protection, college affordability, Medicare prescription drug coverage, the extension of certain tax provisions beneficial to the middle class and energy policy reform.

The latter has lost much of its urgency now that gas prices have started to fall in recent weeks, something Democrats acknowledge does neutralize one of their top selling points to voters. Democrats plan to modify their message, however, with an argument that gas prices remain unstable because the United States remains too dependent on foreign oil and hasn't done enough to invest in alternative energy supplies.

Wyden added that concerns about the price at the pump haven't gone away, saying, "It's clear that gas prices are going to be on a roller coaster" for sometime to come, and Democrats effectively can argue that the GOP has "made no progress" addressing the cause.

DOJ_NMG_0064035

Senate and House Democrats, in session for about two more weeks, are calling their final push a "dual track" that counters the GOP on national security while holding a series of events to drive home an argument that Republicans have stretched the middle class too thin with failed economic policies.

"We've got to talk about it," Hoyer said. "Our folks are focused on our [election platform], 'Six for '06,' many of which are involved with real security, but the rest are focused on jobs, health care, energy independence. We'll do it in the near term. We'll engage immediately."

Republicans remain comfortable using national security as the key issue this fall, and they don't think the Democrats can stop that momentum, no matter what strategy they use.

"Wait, is the economy yet another 'new direction' for the Democrat leadership?" asked one senior Republican staffer, poking fun at the minority's election-year slogan. "Good luck. Gas prices are down, jobs and wages are up and security is still the top concern."

Still, Democrats are pressing ahead. The plan is to devote this week's House Democratic Caucus session to the party's two-track economic and national security strategy and message, and the party is organizing a series of upcoming events on the economy, including a Member-driven "wage forum" at the end of this week.

Senate Democratic leaders, in the meantime, have called on their Caucus to put the economy back in full focus, telling Senators in a memo Friday that they cannot waste any time pushing the Democrats' two-part battle plan on national security and the economy.

The leadership memo, sent to Senate Democratic staff, said that "while Iraq may be high among the concerns of the American people, it is a distant reality in comparison to the day to day challenges many families face filing their gas tanks, paying for college, saving for retirement and securing a job."

"Given Republican failures, it would be a mistake for us to shift the economy to the back burner as we continue our offensive on terrorism and security," the letter stated.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) took to the floor Friday to set the tone for his Caucus on the upcoming economic offensive, chastising the Republican Congress "for blocking middle-class tax relief" and making the case for extending a series of tax provisions designed to help different segments of the country.

Democrats are hoping that on Election Day, the public will view them as the protector of the middle class and agree with their argument that the GOP is to blame for job losses, wage stagnation, rising health care costs and fluctuating gas prices. But Democratic lawmakers emphasize they have to keep reminding voters of that.

"Most people understand this economy is Bush's economy," said Sen. Byron Dorgan (N.D.). "We have to defend ourselves on security, regrettably, but we are very intent on making certain America knows the series of things we have proposed with respect to the economy is very different than [what] the Republicans" have proposed.

Republicans Gain In Midterm Polls (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Republicans appear to be gaining on the Democrats in the 2006 midterm campaign because of growing confidence in the economy, falling gas prices and President Bush's sustained political offensive on the terrorist threat, according to pollsters and campaign strategists.

The most significant political movement in the past week or two has been in the battle for control of Congress. National preference polls on the so-called "generic ballot" question -- which party's candidate voters say they would choose -- show Republicans have narrowed the once-substantial lead Democrats held and are now trailing them by three percentage points, independent pollster John Zogby said Friday.

Mr. Zogby credited the Republican Party's sudden political turnaround to "the president's focus on the war on terrorism, a rebound among his own base," and the Democrats' failure to lay out a clear plan of their own on "how are we're going to get out of Iraq and what they would do about terrorism that's better than the Republicans."

Democrats "are not giving their Democratic base what it needs to hear on those issues," Mr. Zogby said. "Republicans are severely wounded. The Democrats should be crushing them, and they are not."

Top election forecasters have pointed to an anti-Bush and anti-Republican "wave" that they predict will return the Democrats to majority power in the House, but Mr. Zogby said, "I don't see the landslide that others are seeing. That doesn't mean it can't materialize, but as of today, it's not happening and this is mid-September."

Some pollsters, such as Gallup, still show the Democrats enjoying larger, 12-point leads in the generic surveys. But Mr. Zogby's numbers mirror a tightening in several other voter-preference polls, including a Fox News poll of likely voters, and what campaign strategists and political reporters say they are seeing in the battleground states.

DOJ_NMG_0064036

The Republican Party's improving polls coincide with a number of positive developments on the economic front that Republicans hope will further lift their political prospects in November. The price of oil dropped to nearly $62 a barrel Friday from a high of $77 last month, as gasoline prices continued their descent to a national average of $2.62 per gallon, though many battleground states were reporting lower prices for regular.

Some of the lowest averages included Iowa, $2.32; Indiana, $2.36; Missouri and Ohio, $2.25; Minnesota, $2.35; Michigan $2.37; and Kentucky, $2.34.

As gas prices fell, the stock market was rising, with the Dow Jones industrial average soaring to 11,560 Friday, 162 points from its all-time high, that boosted worker pensions -- and a consumer confidence survey showed Americans were "in a decidedly more optimistic mood," the Ipsos poll reported Friday.

The Republicans' improving poll numbers were also reflected in a number of tighter House and Senate races, while a separate Zogby poll showed that Republicans in three high-profile Senate races -- in New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Ohio -- had improved their poll numbers significantly in just the past week or two.

Much of the party's gain was the result of Republicans coming home to their party as Mr. Bush focused on the issues that most deeply divide the country -- Iraq and the war on terrorism.

"The base is finally coming around. Democratic intensity has been strong for the last year, but Republican intensity all of a sudden has increased," said Republican campaign strategist John Brabender, who is advising Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania in his re-election campaign.

"Some of the positive things that are happening in the economy are starting to cause some excitement among Republicans," Mr. Brabender said.

"We're seeing a tightening up in the congressional races, too, in the last 10 days. The president is putting out a much more targeted message, talking about the security of the country. For the first time, he's playing more offense than defense and that's helping Republicans," he said.

Inside Politics (WT)

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Get over it

"Stop apologizing, already," wrote John Hinderaker of Power Line yesterday.

"Now Pope Benedict says he's 'deeply sorry' that he offended Muslims. Meanwhile, no Muslim leader has been reported apologizing, or even expressing regret over, the murder of an Italian nun in Somalia. Witnesses to the murder say it 'appeared to be linked' to Muslim hysteria over the Pope's speech; those witnesses spoke 'on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals.' Reprisals? From members of the Religion of Peace? Why on earth would they be worried about reprisals?"

"The Pope has nothing to apologize for, and the last thing he should do is chase after Muslim spokesman with an ever-more-abject series of apologies. They can't be satisfied ... . There is a fundamental conflict here between many Muslim leaders, who demand that no one say anything about Islam except as approved by them, and the West, which recognizes freedom of speech. Pope Benedict serves neither himself nor the West when he appears to recognize as legitimate Muslim demands for a veto on all discussion of their religion and their place in the world. The Pope's message to Muslims should not be an apology; it should be: Get over it."

Self-absorbed affairs

"Why is the left afraid to face up to the threat of radical Islam?" asked Bret Stephens of the Wall Street Journal Online yesterday.

"Here's a puzzle: Why is it so frequently the case that the people who have the most at stake in the battle against Islamic extremism and the most to lose when Islamism gains -- namely, liberals -- are typically the most reluctant to fight it?" Mr. Stephens added. "An instinct for pacifism surely goes some way toward explaining the left's curious unwillingness to sign up for a war to defend its core values."

Mr. Stephens later concludes: "Whatever else distinguishes Islamism from liberalism, both are remarkably self-absorbed affairs, obsessed with maintaining the purity of their own values no matter what the cost ... Liberal beliefs deserve to be protected and fought for. A liberalism that abandons its own defense to others does not, something liberals everywhere might usefully dwell on during this season of sad remembrance."

Tsk-tsk, tut-tut

Heavy-duty Democratic donor George Soros conceded on CNN yesterday that his claim made in his new book "The Age of Fallibility: Consequences of the War on Terror" -- that "the Bush administration and the Nazi and communist regimes all engaged in the politics of fear" -- was dicey, at best.

DOJ_NMG_0064037

"Maybe I did go over the line. But I think that on the whole, my assessment is balanced," Mr. Soros insisted to host Wolf Blitzer, later saying, "But I should have probably kept it to myself."

Mr. Blitzer observed, "I guess you acknowledge you went over the top."

Not too shabby

"President Bush is receiving his highest job-performance numbers in a few months," according to a Harris poll of 1,004 adults surveyed between Sept. 8 and 11 that was released yesterday.

According to the respondents, 12 percent said Mr. Bush's job performance was "excellent," 27 percent felt it was "pretty good" and 22 percent deemed it "fair." Thirty-eight percent said it was "poor."

Tending the fires

The America of yesterday has vanished and the America of tomorrow holds promise of becoming a land our parents would not recognize," cautions Pat Buchanan in the September edition of the American Conservative magazine, declaring that the nation "rose from kin and culture, not an abstract proposition."

Mr. Buchanan later continues, "Before Americans ever adopted a creed, Americans were a people and a nation. Those who equate that creed with the nation rewrite that history to convert America into something she never was: an imperial democracy imposing her ideology on a resisting world, to the ruin of the Republic she was meant to be. And they will turn America into something she cannot survive becoming: a multicultural, multiethnic, multilingual Tower of Babel."

"If we are a creedal nation, united by a commitment to democracy, equality and liberty, with a mandate and a mission to impose those ideas and ideals on mankind, we shall have a foreign policy like that of George W. Bush. But if we are a traditional nation, our national interests will be traditional: the defense of the land and the preservations of the lives and liberty of our people."

Fit to print?

Beginning today, the New York Times begins a campaign to convince the public that it's still the newspaper of record, even in the post-Jayson Blair era. The paper has inaugurated a new "branding campaign" for itself which it calls "These times demand the Times."

The marketing blitz will use 30- and 60-second TV spots to highlight how the news is reported while showcasing select reporters and columnists with "vignettes of their personal stories."

"Journalism is everything to the New York Times," observed spokeswoman Alyse Myers.

Bubba yes, Scooter no

Some conservatives wonder if they should defend the honor of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby in charges related to the Valerie Plame matter when they previously called for the impeachment of President Clinton on charges of perjury.

"Unlike Libby, Clinton was not indicted despite overwhelming evidence of his actionable lies and obstructions. Indeed, Clinton's offenses went so far as lying under oath during a deposition overseen by a federal judge, who later held him in contempt of court," pointed out Mark Levin on National Review Online yesterday.

"Clinton never challenged the judge's holding. During the course of that sworn deposition, he also knowingly lied to his attorney and knowingly allowed his lawyer to submit an affidavit at the deposition he knew to be false and, in fact, helped to concoct," he wrote.

"Clinton's lies had nothing to do with issues of recollection or confusion, but were both overt and conspiratorial -- including suborning perjury. Clinton led the cover-up, and Clinton sought to fix the sexual-harassment lawsuit filed against him," Levin continued.

"Unlike Libby, Clinton was the subject of the investigation. Libby was a bit player. Clinton had every reason to lie and cover-up his conduct as both the Paula Jones and Monica Lewinsky matters would be politically devastating and expose him to civil liability. Libby had no reason to conceal anything about his discussions with reporters as those discussions were not criminal and, as we now know for certain, he was not part of some White House cabal to destroy Valerie Plame, as critics have long (and falsely) asserted."

What To Expect Over The Next Seven Weeks (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, September 18, 2006

It's a good idea to try to anticipate the ups and downs of this election cycle's stretch run, so when the inevitable stories about a Republican "surge" hit the newspapers, you won't be taken completely by surprise.

First, this is the kind of cycle when long-shot challengers suddenly appear, even as late as mid-October. If the national environment doesn't change, Republican seats previously taken for granted could show up as vulnerable in late polling, as the Democrats experienced with then-Rep. Dan Rostenkowski's Illinois district in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0064038

But since polling across the country shows that Democratic voters already have rallied to Democratic candidates, some of these surprisingly close polls simply may reflect the Democratic generic vote in the district rather than a Democratic challenger's strength.

Democrat Charlie Brown, for example, who is challenging Rep. John Doolittle in California's 4th district, has a poll showing him running virtually even with the GOP incumbent. But while Doolittle has loads of personal problems, his district is heavily Republican.

More important, Brown, a career military man, has the warmth of a second-degree frostbite. And that's before you get to the contradictory and confusing way he talks about issues and his personal philosophy. So once Doolittle starts to spend his substantial resources on beating up Brown, the challenger's prospects are likely to dim.

I'm certainly not suggesting that all of the late-developing races will be mirages, only that it's wise not to overreact to news of "surprises." Take a deep breath, check them out and look for reasons not to take them at face value (especially if you want them to be true). If, after being as skeptical as you can be, you still think a "surprise" looks interesting, then you can start getting excited.

Second, beware of all national surges. And remember: Journalists always want a horse race, not a blowout.

I've been doing this long enough to know that in pretty much every election cycle, there is talk, invariably sometime in October, that one party or the other is "surging." In 1994, for example, the last time a truly significant partisan wave hit, there were reports in October of a Democratic surge.

Back then, Democrats expected to hold control of the House of Representatives until the Earth fell into the sun, so they waited throughout the summer and fall for the inevitable point at which Democratic candidates strengthened in the polls. That point never came, but it didn't stop a flurry of media reports in October that a Democratic surge was under way.

An article in the Oct. 28, 1994, Los Angeles Times, for example, asserted that "there are signs of subtle shifts in public sentiment and political strategy that suggest Democratic Party loss[es] on Nov. 8 might not be as severe as many experts predicted."

The reports of a Democratic rebound were so widespread that the lead in my own pre-election newsletter that year asserted that I could find no surge in my reporting. I wouldn't have done that if I hadn't been forced to address the "surge" hysteria.

The likeliest culprit for starting a premature, or totally incorrect, surge panic this year is a national poll that reports on a dramatic closing of the generic ballot or a spike in the president's job ratings. That's likely to lead the Republican National Committee and the two federal campaign committees to send out a flurry of buoyant e-mails.

Mind you, I'm not ruling out improved prospects for Republicans. Maybe the White House's efforts to redefine the elections as a choice on national security will prove at least partially successful, or maybe an event or a news story will change the political discussion. But I'd be wary about buying talk of a "surge" until I saw multiple national polls showing a fundamental shift in opinion or until district-level and state-level polls in competitive contests show Republican candidates doing better.

I know this will be hard to believe, but some of the people who talk about politics or conduct polls want to grab as many headlines as they can, and they may create a surge frenzy, or jump on a surge bandwagon, merely to promote themselves and get quoted.

Third — and this doesn't contradict my last warning — don't be surprised if there is some normal "firming" of the GOP base in the next six weeks that helps GOP candidates in Republican-leaning districts. In fact, I'm expecting it.

I've been struck by the unusually early firming of the Democratic vote, which has resulted in some Democratic candidates for Congress exceeding their name identification in the ballot test by 10 points or even 20 points.

Early polls showed independent voters so disproportionately Democratic that it's likely some of them, who usually vote Republican, will slide back into the GOP column. And some Republican and conservative voters remain undecided, as in the Tennessee Senate race I wrote about recently. Certainly some of those voters are likely to rally behind Republican candidates as Election Day nears and the prospects of dramatic Democratic gains seem more real.

No, I don't really expect most in the national media or the blogs to heed these warnings. Overreaction is a way of life for many of them. But now is exactly the time to be cautious about rumors and news. It's better to get it right than to get it first.

Niall Ferguson: The GOP Will Hang On (LAT)

Niall Ferguson

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

All those predictions of an autumn of discontent will likely go up in smoke.

DOJ_NMG_0064039

WILL IT ONLY be the leaves that descend this fall? Or could some Republican legislators also end up being swept into piles and incinerated?

At first sight, the omens are good for the Dems in November's midterm elections. Gallup's national poll of voting intentions has given them a 10-point lead over the Republicans for most of the last year. The obvious explanation is gloom about Iraq, which remains the No. 1 issue in voters' minds. President Bush defended his policy trenchantly in the run-up to the fifth anniversary of 9/11, but his approval rating has improved only slightly as a result.

Then there's the economy. If that proves to be the key issue of this campaign, the Democrats look unstoppable. Voters give them a 12-point advantage when it comes to handling the economy, and twice as big a lead on Social Security. Small wonder so many of my liberal colleagues have a spring in their step.

Asked if they feel more enthusiastic than usual about voting, 56% of Democrats say they do, compared with just 43% of Republicans. For three good reasons, however, I expect the Dems to be disappointed — just as they were two years ago.

First, on closer inspection, Iraq is still far from being a vote winner for Democrats. Many Americans still believe that invading Iraq was a rational response to 9/11, even if evidence to link Saddam Hussein to the perpetrators is conspicuous by its absence. So they buy Bush's notion of Iraq as the "central front" in the war on terror. Moreover, when asked which party they trust to wage that war, they prefer the Republicans to the Democrats by a margin of 14%.

Crucially, if asked to choose between a Republican who wants to maintain troop levels in Iraq and a Democrat seeking "immediate and orderly withdrawal," 48% of voters plump for the Republican and just 41% for the Democrat. Americans may want troop reductions; they are not ready to cut and run. If the Republicans can portray their opponents as favoring withdrawal, they win the Iraq argument.

Second, despite widespread fears over the summer, the U.S. economy looks to be landing softly. Growth has slowed, not stopped. Consumption is still growing, as are earnings. Sure, inflation is up, but unemployment is down (4.7% compared with 4.9% a year ago), and crude oil prices have dropped sharply since August, easing the pain Americans feel when they fill up their cars. The stock market has bounced back since the dog days of July. The threatened real estate crash has failed to materialize, though house prices have certainly cooled.

And to appease those Americans who blame their economic difficulties on immigration, squabbling Republicans in Congress have sidelined the president's plan for a partial amnesty for illegal immigrants.

In most democratic systems, of course, that kind of internal dissension causes parties to lose credibility. But thanks to the constitutional separation of powers, party unity matters less here. Indeed, under Karl Rove's direction, the Republican Party is adopting its own strategy of separation, allowing legislators to do whatever it takes — including, if necessary, criticizing their own president — to ensure their own political survival. This is the third and most important reason to expect a non-event in November.

IT'S AN OLD ADAGE that in the United States all politics are local. That's even more true today than it was a generation ago. Gerrymandering has tended to increase the political homogeneity of most electoral districts. This in turn increases the chances that incumbents will be reelected. Once a district has a critical mass of either Republicans or Democrats, the key to victory is to mobilize the "base" of active voters. There's much less need to woo floating voters from the center, who may in any case fail to turn out on election day. This trend explains why there's less bipartisan cooperation in Congress than there used to be. It also explains why legislators don't hesitate to badmouth the president if they feel he's out of tune with local sentiment.

In one of last week's primary contests, Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee of Rhode Island comfortably saw off a conservative challenger in a primary. Chafee, deemed more palatable to general election voters in November, was backed by the national party despite being one of the party's inveterate Bush bashers.

The big question is whether or not the strategy of separation can work in two years' time, when voters have to elect a new president. It's a challenge. Separation is one thing; a split personality is another.

For the Republican candidate in '08, it might actually be better if the Democrats did well in the midterms, because a brief return to power on the Hill would expose their chronic incoherence, making the case for a Republican comeback two years down the line. That scenario, however, is not on the cards. The leaves may be falling in George Bush's America, but the Republicans look like they're hanging on.

Seven weeks before Election Day, roughly a dozen Senate races-a full third of this year's matches-are hotly contested. Most of the tightest races are for seats now held by Republicans, putting control of Congress's upper chamber within reach for Democrats, if everything goes their way. Here are three races that got more interesting last week:

Maryland: In a close contest, Rep. Ben Cardin beat ex-Congressman and former NAACP chief Kweisi Mfume in last week's Democratic primary. Maryland has long been dependably Democratic, but GOP Senate nominee Michael Steele, an African-American, is courting the state's sizable black community. Because the white Democratic establishment backed Cardin over Mfume, the telegenic Steele may have an opening.

Virginia: Sen. George Allen's "macaca" gaffe has cost him, with a double-digit lead over challenger Jim Webb all but evaporating, according to new polling. A navy secretary under President Reagan, Webb launched a TV ad that featured Reagan praising him. The spot provoked Allen into attack mode, with an ad spotlighting Nancy Reagan's request for Webb to pull the footage.

Pennsylvania: After debating on Meet the Press, Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is closing in on Bob Casey Jr., who once held a commanding lead. Casey is catching flak for his low-energy style-including in the nationally televised debate-and for being more anti-Santorum than pro-anything. Santorum is campaigning like a proud Republican, calling President Bush "terrific" and insisting weapons of mass destruction have been found in Iraq.

What Bush's Body Language Means (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, September 18, 2006

The President is standing face to face with NBC's Matt Lauer by the immaculate oak desk in the Oval Office, jabbing emphatically toward the Today anchorman's chest and insisting, "My job is to protect this country, Matt. And it gets second-guessed all the time by people who don't live in the United States." Lauer has interviewed Bush several times, and they have a convivial relationship, bonding about golf and bikes during breaks in the taping. But at the moment, Lauer is pressing the President on the legality of the CIA's secret detention program for accused terrorists. Lauer holds his ground on the big rug as the Commander in Chief edges forward, encroaching on his space to the point that Lauer finally puts a hand on Bush's forearm to prevent a collision. When the cameras are turned off, according to a witness, Lauer tells the President, "Whoa! I thought you were coming after me there." Aides to both men laugh. The President lightens too, but adds, "I feel really strongly about this subject."

Friends and staff members have maintained that Bush has been a Steady Eddie through the nearly ceaseless storms since his re-election, confident that history will treat him right and disinclined to sweat the day's headlines or chatter. But as he stares down one last campaign, the President suddenly seems to be all adrenaline and testosterone. It shows in his frenetic schedule and in his assertive choice of words but perhaps most especially in his body language as he tries to win over midterm voters by looking and sounding commanding--he's practically shaking voters by their lapels.

With the press, the President has been brimming over with restless energy. Rich Lowry of National Review, who was in a group of conservatives ushered onto the Oval Office couches and found the President to be "utterly self-assured," says the President nearly leaped out of his chair when he made some points. Lowry wrote that Bush untwisted what looked like a paper clip as he talked, "then twisted it around his finger until it was in a little bow." During a Rose Garden press conference, the President thrilled photographers with so many two-handed gestures--now up high, now out wide--that their motor drives could barely keep up.

During a day of chats just before the fifth anniversary of 9/11, ABC's Charles Gibson asked the President whether the nation's security would be harmed if Democrats carried the House this fall. "In my mind," Bush said, stabbing the air word by word with his pointer finger, "the Republican Party and its members are much better suited to defending this country." Then the two of them jumped into the armored Caddy. Bush leaned deeply against the Presidential Seal in the middle of the backseat as he handicapped the '06 races.

It was revealing that when Bush eulogized former Texas Governor Ann Richards last week, he saluted not just the ability of his home state's legendary political characters to "talk Texan" but also their physical presence--"people larger than life, people that could fill the stage." The President has been on just about every imaginable stage lately. He went to Capitol Hill; gave a prime-time address; held the Rose Garden news conference; invited an anchorman into his limo, an editorialist onto Air Force One and a columnist into the Oval; held an off-the-record session for conservative radio hosts; and sat down chummily with a clutch of conservative opinion writers who had favored the war in Iraq but now think more troops are needed. That was all in nine days. He's so determined to be everywhere that he even did a White House interview with CBS's Katie Couric, despite his rough history with the network and the view among many Republican operatives that she's too liberal. It was a reserved, wintry performance. When they were about to take a break and Couric joked that he had a country to run, he offered, "I've got more than one thing to do on a regular basis, on a daily basis." But this time he did not jab his finger.

2000 Redistricting Shields GOP Seats (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

One of the last lines of defense that Republicans hope will repel the Democrats' attempts to win back the House are the thicker "fire walls" they installed in their congressional districts under reapportionment.

Although Republican campaign officials think other factors will help them maintain control of the House -- including what even some Democrats say is the Republicans' stronger voter-turnout operation -- they say their earlier efforts to redraw congressional districts to account for population changes after the 2000 census will thwart many challenges on Election Day.

Three top Democratic takeover opportunities are in Republican-leaning Ohio, where a gloomy political climate has raised Democratic hopes of a major comeback in the state.

They are:

·The 1st Congressional District, where Rep. Steve Chabot faces a tough rematch with Democratic challenger John Cranley, a Cincinnati City Council member who ran against him in 2000.

·The 15th Congressional District, where Franklin County Commissioner Mary Jo Kilroy, a Democrat, is aggressively challenging Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce.

·The 18th Congressional District currently held by Republican Rep. Bob Ney, who pleaded guilty Friday to federal corruption charges and will not seek re-election. Republican state Sen. Joy Padgett is running against Democratic lawyer Zack Space.

All of them are on elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg's list of "pure tossups," but Republican officials said the districts have been redrawn to withstand just the kind of aggressive Democratic offensive they expect in November.

"Both the 15th and 18th district lines were changed and strengthened after the 2000 census, as was the 1st district," Ohio Republican state Chairman Bob Bennett said.

"I feel good about where we are and feel we've turned the corner, though it doesn't mean we don't have a battleground here. We do," he said.

Election analysts compare the political environment this year to that of 1974, when Democrats gained 49 House seats, or to 1994, when Republicans won 52 congressional seats and took control of the House.

But election analysts who have studied the changing political makeup of congressional districts and the increasing power of incumbency say sophisticated redistricting technology has made many more districts virtually invulnerable to all but the strongest anti-incumbent wave.

"All the available evidence in the 2002 and 2004 elections is [the Republicans] have created a fire wall, because very little moved from one side to the other. It was almost static," said Rhodes Cook, a nonpartisan election analyst.

"Democrats only have to win 15 seats to take control, but the playing field is smaller now than it was, fewer races are in play, incumbents are safer, and because of the way they've drawn the district lines, they are more fortified," he said.

"I can see powerful factors rubbing up against each other of nearly equal size, but I'm reluctant to predict a Democratic takeover, because I appreciate the Republicans' successes," Mr. Cook said. "They know how to win of late, and the Democrats don't."

Obama: Dems Need Tough Security Stance (AP-Y)

By Mike Glover, Ap Political Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., warned Democratic activists Sunday that the party must take a tougher stance on national security if it wants to succeed in the November elections.

"What Democrats have to do is to close the deal," said Obama, the keynote speaker at Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's 29th annual steak fry. "We have got to show we have a serious agenda for change."

Obama's appearance in Iowa, where precinct caucuses launch the presidential season, has raised a number of eyebrows about his intentions for a presidential run in 2008. Though only a first-term senator, Obama has burst onto the national scene.

But he wouldn't say Sunday whether he was considering a run at the White House.

"My only attentions right now are focused on '06," said Obama. "Whoever is looking toward 2008 without focusing on 2006 makes a mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0064042

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner also spent Sunday afternoon at the steak fry, and left little doubt that he is looking ahead to 2008.

"You know and I know that it all starts in Iowa," Warner told the audience. "Do your part. We're going to take back the Congress this year and then we're going to take back our nation."

Warner accused President Bush of using the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to inject the issue of terrorism into the 2006 race. Warner said the strategy is proof that the GOP is nervous and trying to scare voters.

"I think Americans feel President Bush missed an opportunity on the fifth anniversary of 9/11 to bring our country together, to call us to some level of common cause and shared sacrifice," Warner told The Associated Press.

Obama said he and other Democrats want to take the nation in a different direction, but he vowed not to "demonize" Republicans. He said a carefully cast message could lure moderate Republicans who are uncomfortable with the White House's hard-line conservative stance.

"The American people are ready for change," he said. "The American people recognize the path (of) the last five years has not made us more competitive, has not opened more opportunities and has not made us safer."

Obama called the attention he has received "flattering," recalling how he was treated like a hero when he traveled to Kenya this summer to visit his father's home village. He also noted that rumors of his presidential ambitions began the day after he was elected to the Senate in 2004, when someone asked him about his plans for 2008.

"I said you'll have to wait a little while," he said.

In his speech to more than 2,000 activists gathered in a county park, Obama also warned that many voters are losing hope that the government is on their side.

"Even those of us in public life get a certain cynicism," he said. "We've got a lot of self-important leaders who are long on rhetoric and short on ideas.

"People still believe that in America the promise is limitless, but they aren't sure their leaders do."

For This Red Meat Crowd, Obama's '08 Choice Is Clear (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

INDIANOLA, Iowa, Sept. 17 — Senator Barack Obama insists, as always, that he is not running for president. But there are compelling clues that he is not exactly not running, either.

The most obvious was his keynote appearance here on Sunday at Senator Tom Harkin's legendary steak fry, a popular Democratic ritual in Iowa — and a prominent staging ground in this first presidential caucus state. The crowd rushed Mr. Obama when he arrived, then mobbed him for hours as other politicians wandered the fairgrounds introducing themselves and shaking hands.

But beyond his first trip to Iowa — a visit that was guaranteed to set off new speculation about his presidential ambitions — Mr. Obama is in the midst of an unconventional publicity tour of sorts. Fresh off a closely watched journey through Africa, including a stop at the home of his Kenyan-born father, Mr. Obama is about to publish a second book that supporters believe will outpace his best-seller from 1995.

With the book, titled "The Audacity of Hope," will come an October appearance on "The Oprah Winfrey Show," magazine profiles and a national speaking tour. Throughout, Mr. Obama is keeping up a full schedule of political speeches on behalf of Democrats nationwide; his fame has made him one of the most requested fund-raising guests in the party.

All of which means that, despite his efforts to coolly play down expectations for his future, Mr. Obama has allowed his already stratospheric profile to grow a little higher of late and has done less to tamp down the celebrity buzz than he did when he first arrived in the Senate last year.

"What a wonderful reception; I'm going to have to come to Iowa again," Mr. Obama said as he took the podium under a sunny sky here on Sunday afternoon in front of an estimated 3,500 people. In response, someone in the audience shouted, "Obama '08," a sentiment reflected in T-shirts and buttons featuring his name throughout the crowd in defiance of his repeated claim that he is focused on his duties as a first-term senator.

His 40-minute speech was punctuated by applause and standing ovations but also, at its most serious moments, brought the audience to a silence hushed enough for rustling trees to be heard. It focused on the importance of a Democratic victory in the 2006 midterm elections. Characteristically, he spoke in mostly moderate language.

"I don't think that George Bush is a bad man," he said. Referring to Republicans, he said, "They believe in different things."

But he touched on core Democratic themes, praising labor unions, defending the role of government and excoriating the Bush administration over the war in Iraq, the politicization of the threat of terrorism and the so-called ownership society.

DOJ_NMG_0064043

If it was not a presidential stump speech, it certainly had the underpinnings of one. “Our parents and our grandparents faced greater challenges than we face, and yet somehow they were able to overcome it,” Mr. Obama said. “That’s the essence of America.”

The trip, which had been hyped for weeks, took on greater significance when news leaked that Mr. Obama had invited along Steve Hildebrand, a political strategist who ran Vice President Al Gore’s campaign in Iowa in 2000. (Advisers to Mr. Obama insisted he merely wanted an old Iowa hand at his side.) In a frenetic question-and-answer session in front of dozens of camera crews before his speech, Mr. Obama got nearly a dozen questions about the presidential campaign and only one about national security.

Tom Vilsack, the governor of Iowa, chatted easily with constituents, watching the news media crush from afar. Mr. Vilsack, who is also considering a presidential bid and recently came in fourth place in a poll of Iowa caucusgoers, played down the response to Mr. Obama, describing it as “certainly predictable.” Asked whether the senator should run, Mr. Vilsack replied, “That’s a question you’re going to have to ask the voters,” and walked away.

Mark Warner, the former Virginia governor, who is also testing the waters for a presidential campaign, made brief remarks at the start of the event, although he was barely audible from the back of the crowd amid the frenzy over Mr. Obama.

Mr. Harkin, a legendary political figure and the sponsor of the event, seemed amused by the Obama phenomenon. “Honestly, tell you the truth — I really tried to get Bono this weekend,” Mr. Harkin said in his introduction. “I couldn’t get him, so I settled for the second biggest rock star in America today.”

For all of Mr. Obama’s star appeal — a recent Newsweek article compared his arrival in Kenya to the second coming of the Messiah — he has earned a reputation for persuasive rhetoric about the role of religion in politics, which is one strand of his new book, due out Oct. 17. Unlike his original memoir, “Dreams From My Father,” an autobiographical reflection on his African father and his Kansas-born mother, the new book is a series of meditations on matters like race and family.

Books have generated speculation about a presidential race in the past. In 1995, when Colin L. Powell published “My American Journey,” it spurred months of urging for him to run for higher office. He ultimately declined.

Whether Mr. Obama decides to take his own shot at becoming the first black president, the paraphernalia, and the popular movement, designed to persuade him to do so is already in full development. His fellow senator from Illinois, Richard J. Durbin, has urged him to consider running; so has the state comptroller, Dan Hynes, who in recent weeks said that Mr. Obama “alone can restore the hope and optimism that has made this country great.”

Several people in the crowd on Sunday expressed a similar sentiment. Matt Hawkins, a 38-year-old wearing a blue “Illinois for Obama in 2008” T-shirt, pushed his way through the mass of people to meet the senator. Mr. Obama’s response left him undaunted.

“He’s telling us he’s got to pay his dues,” Mr. Hawkins said, “and we’re telling him, ‘Learn as you go.’ ”

Webb, Allen Spar Over Iraq (RTD)

By Peter Hardin

Richmond Times-Dispatch, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Democratic challenger Jim Webb and Republican Sen. George Allen went to the mat over Iraq today as the increasingly unpopular war dominated their national TV debate.

"If we had the right people in the Senate there would have been more questions asked and a better policy in place in order to defeat international terrorism," Webb, a former Navy secretary, said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism, we have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there," Webb said.

"I think the world's better off with Saddam Hussein not in power," Allen said, defending his vote in favor of authorizing the use of military force in Iraq.

"You can't be constantly second-guessing, Monday-morning-quarterbacking," Allen added, saying Webb had made opposition to the Iraq war -- opposition Webb voiced in advance of the war -- "the whole theme of his campaign."

Allen tried to deflect, or sidestepped, a number of pointed questions from moderator Tim Russert on the war. They included whether Allen would have voted the same way if the Senate had known Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction.

Allen also refused to take sides with either President Bush or Sen. John W. Warner, R-Va., and Senate Armed Services Committee chairman, in a GOP split over rules for CIA interrogations of terror suspects. The junior senator said he hoped to serve as a "bridge" on the issue.

"I'm with Senator Warner on this," Webb said. Warner and several Republican allies favor greater legal protections for terror suspects.

A decorated Marine combat veteran of Vietnam, Webb said the issue splits the "theorists who have never been on a battlefield" with those who have had to worry about the fate of their troops. Allen did not serve in the military.

DOJ_NMG_0064044

Regarding the future U.S. role in Iraq, Webb again urged collaboration with other countries in the area who have a stake in the outcome, and said the United States has not talked to Syria or Iran.

After the debate, Allen blasted what he called "kind of a strange idea from my opponent, that we're going to count on Iran, that's also on a nuclear weapons program, to somehow be our key allies in Iraq."

With some of his questions, Russert showered embarrassment on both sides, bringing up Allen's gaffe when the Republican used an alleged racial slur to address a Webb campaign volunteer last month, and also Webb's writing in 1979 an article about women in the military, entitled, "Women Can't Fight." Both politicians have apologized.

Political scientist Robert Holsworth of Virginia Commonwealth University said both men did fairly well, and that Allen is faced with defending a position on Iraq that a majority of Americans don't support.

Webb is seeking to make the campaign a referendum on the national direction under Bush, "and Allen is simply his instrument," Holsworth said. Contact staff writer

Va. Hopefuls Spar On Terror Legislation (AP-Y)

By Bob Lewis, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Virginia Democratic Senate candidate Jim Webb said Sunday that President Bush's terror-detainee legislation would weaken the Geneva Conventions and potentially subject captured U.S. soldiers to torture.

"We have to stay on the moral high ground," Webb said during a debate with his opponent, Republican Sen. George Allen, on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Allen said he has not decided whether to back Bush's plan to detain, question and prosecute suspected terrorists or another measure supported by Republican Sen. John Warner, Virginia's senior senator.

The president's measure would allow classified evidence to be withheld from defendants in terror trials and use coerced testimony.

The legislation also would revise the law that interprets the nation's obligations under the Geneva Conventions, the treaty that sets the standard for treatment of war prisoners, so that harsh interrogations of detainees would not be questioned in court.

The Senate bill requires a judge to dismiss charges if evidence cannot be shared and excludes any testimony obtained by cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

"I don't want to stop these interrogations. I'm not for torture, I'm not for waterboarding. But some of these techniques have been very helpful to us, whether they are sleep deprivation or whether it's loud music," Allen said.

"I need to be absolutely certain that what the interrogators are doing now — which is completely fine as far as I'm concerned — will not be harmed," Allen said.

Allen, who last year voted with the White House 96 percent of the time, said he needs more facts before making a decision and hopes to be "a bridge" between the rival GOP plans.

Webb said he sided with fellow war veterans — Warner, Republican Sen. John McCain and former secretary of state Colin Powell — on the issue.

Powell put himself at odds with Bush last week when he wrote in a letter to McCain: "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

In siding with his fellow combat veterans, Webb, a decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War, sharpened their differences with Allen, who has no military experience, and Bush, who served stateside in the National Guard during Vietnam.

"What you see here is a split between the theorists who have never been on a battlefield or never worn the uniform" and those who have, Webb told host Tim Russert.

Russert asked Webb about a 1979 Washingtonian magazine article, in which Webb wrote that women can't lead men in battle, and criticism from five female Naval Academy graduates who blasted Webb for it at an Allen-sponsored news conference last week.

Though Webb had issued a statement expressing regret, one of the women, Kathleen Murray, said it fell short of an apology. Russert asked Webb if a fuller apology was in order.

"I don't think it was wrong to participate in the debate at that time. It's been 27 years, it was a magazine article, and, if I may say, I am fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today," Webb said.

Russert pressed Allen on why last month he called a Webb campaign volunteer of Indian descent "Macaca," considered a racist slight in some cultures.

"Tim, I made a mistake. I said things thoughtlessly. I've apologized for it, as well I should. But there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone," Allen said.

DOJ_NMG_0064045

When asked about his fondness for Confederate flags and other Old South icons, Allen said, "There are a lot of things I wish I had learned earlier in life."

"The Confederate flag — as a kid, I was rebellious, antiestablishment, I still am. And I looked at the flag as a symbol of that."

Allen and Webb meet again Monday for a luncheon debate before the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce.

Allen, Webb Quarrel Over War In Iraq, Bush Policies (WP)

By Michael D. Shear And Tim Craig

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

Virginia's U.S. Senate candidates clashed on national television yesterday over the war in Iraq and President Bush's leadership, offering the sharpest contrast yet in a campaign that has become central to the partisan struggle for control of Congress this fall.

Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," Republican Sen. George Allen and Democratic challenger James Webb also confronted issues of race and gender and debated the use of torture in the war on terror. But the exchange largely centered on a controversial war that has become the defining issue of the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

Webb, a decorated Marine and former Navy Secretary, called the Iraq war an "incredible strategic blunder of historic proportions" and said he has lost confidence in Bush's foreign policy. He repeatedly reminded viewers that neither Bush nor Allen, a former governor, had served in combat.

"Very few people who have brought us this war have served, and very, very few of the children of these people who have brought us this war have served," said Webb, whose Marine son began a tour in Iraq this month.

Allen steadfastly defended Bush's Middle East policies, telling moderator Tim Russert that "staying the course" in Iraq means "that we don't tuck tail and run, that we don't retreat, that we don't surrender." Asked whether more U.S. troops should be sent, Allen said, "We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed."

The outcome of Virginia's contest could be critical to GOP hopes of retaining control of the Senate in a year when anger toward incumbents -- fueled in part by the Iraq war -- is tangible.

Webb, a former Republican and early critic of the war, was persuaded to challenge Allen by national Democrats and activists who believed his military background would make him the ideal candidate to tap into antiwar sentiment.

But questions about character -- including Allen's comment to a Webb campaign volunteer and allegations about Webb's view of women in combat -- have dominated a race that polls indicate has tightened.

Russert devoted his entire Sunday show to the Virginia debate and focused nearly a half-hour on the Iraq war. He grilled Allen repeatedly on the vote he and other lawmakers made authorizing the president to go to war.

"If you knew Saddam did not have weapons of mass destruction, was it still worth going to war?" Russert asked.

"I stand by my vote," Allen said. "We had a choice whether to listen to the critics and do nothing and then have this world more dangerous if we were right."

Russert asked both candidates whether the $300 billion spent on the war in Iraq could have been better spent on homeland security and the war on terror.

"We have spent money on all those things," Allen said. "You can't be constantly second-guessing, Monday-morning quarterbacking."

Webb said the money would have been better spent on security. He criticized Allen and others in Congress for failing to ask tough questions about the ultimate effect of deposing Saddam Hussein.

"If we had the right people in the Senate, there would have been more questions asked," Webb said. "We didn't go into Iraq because of terrorism. We have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there."

Allen said the United States should continue to consolidate its forces into four large military bases in Iraq, a proposal Webb criticized.

Webb said the United States should begin moving troops to friendly Arab countries and seek the help of Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. That drew derision from Allen, who said to reporters after the debate that the United States should not be working with "sponsors of terrorism."

Allen also lashed out at Webb, accusing him of failing to support the first Iraq war. "Heck, the French were even in favor of military action in 1991," Allen said.

Webb responded aggressively, often returning to his experience as a Marine in Vietnam. Using a line from his son, Webb said, "George Allen didn't fight in Vietnam. Even the French fought in Vietnam."

DOJ_NMG_0064046

The candidates also clashed over Bush's proposed interpretation of the Geneva Conventions' provisions on interrogating enemy prisoners. Webb sided with Virginia's other Republican senator, John W. Warner, who said the president's plan would be an invitation to other countries to reinterpret the Geneva rules if they ever held U.S. soldiers.

"I'm with Senator Warner on this," said Webb, saying Bush's view is dictated by "theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on . . . who have never had to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands."

Allen declined to say how he will vote on the issue when it comes up in the Senate. But he said the United States needs to interrogate terrorism suspects effectively. "I don't want to stop these interrogations," he said. "I'm not for torture . . . but some of these techniques have been very helpful to us."

Russert devoted the second half of the show to character issues that have bedeviled both candidates in recent weeks.

His first target was Webb, who last week was assailed over an article he penned in 1979 that critics say was demeaning to women. Several female U.S. Naval Academy graduates said Webb's article arguing against women in combat helped lead to harassment against women at the school.

Webb repeated a statement he had made earlier in the week, in which he expressed regret "to the extent that my writing subjected women . . . to undue hardship." On the show, he said he regretted writing that the Naval Academy is "a horny woman's dream," adding that "if I were a, you know, a more mature individual, I wouldn't have written" that.

But he declined to go further, even after Russert said he had received a letter from one of the women indicating that Webb's statement was not good enough.

Russert then turned his attention to Allen, quizzing him on his opposition to allowing women as cadets at Virginia Military Institute and later turning to the senator's comments to a Webb volunteer of Indian descent on the campaign trail last month.

Russert aired the video of Allen calling Webb volunteer S.R. Sidarth "macaca" and of welcoming him "to the real world of Virginia."

Allen again apologized, calling the comments "a mistake." He said the word "macaca" was "just made up" and added, "There was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone."

Russert also asked Allen about having once displayed a Confederate flag and a noose. Allen said he had once seen the Confederate flag as a symbol of heritage and regional pride but now sees it as hateful.

"Through the years, I've learned and I've grown," he said.

The candidates will meet again today at a luncheon debate hosted by the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce.

Russert closed the show on a light note, asking both men whether they thought their habit of chewing tobacco made them good role models for children.

Allen conceded that it probably did not. Webb noted that he doesn't chew at public events and added, "We all have our vices."

Allen, Webb Face Off On NBC (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, and his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., used a national TV debate yesterday to spar over U.S. interrogation policy and the Iraq war, part of a high-profile U.S. Senate race with issues that have come to define midterm elections across the country.

Appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," Mr. Allen said he has not decided whether to support President Bush's push to revise Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which regulates the interrogation standards of military prisoners.

Mr. Webb, 60, agreed with Republican Sens. John W. Warner of Virginia and John McCain of Arizona, two former Marines who are concerned that the president's plan to redefine the provision to deal with terror suspects would open the door to torture of U.S. troops.

"What you're seeing is a split between the theorists who have controlled so much of the policy in this administration, theorists who have never been on a battlefield, who have never put a uniform on, and who are looking at this thing in a totally different way from people who have had to worry about their troops and themselves possibly coming under enemy hands," Mr. Webb said in the second debate between the two front-runners.

Most of the debate centered on the link between the Iraq war and the fight against international terrorism.

Mr. Allen, 54, reiterated Mr. Bush's push for the United States "to stay the course" in Iraq.

When asked what "stay the course" means, Mr. Allen said, "Staying the course is meaning we don't tuck tail and run. ... This is a central battlefront in the war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0064047

Mr. Webb disagreed, saying the United States did not go into Iraq because of terrorism, and that decision has drained the military resources needed to fight terrorism.

"We have terrorists in Iraq because we went in there," he said.

Mr. Webb, a former Navy secretary, cited a report released last week by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, saying, "Saddam Hussein was not an aligned with al Qaeda -- they were natural enemies."

He said the administration must work with Iraq's neighbors on a plan that allows U.S. troops to leave without jeopardizing the region's stability.

"There are limits to what the military can do," said Mr. Webb, a Vietnam veteran. "Eventually this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment, and that's where this administration seems to have blinders."

The candidates offered separate apologies -- Mr. Allen for a statement he made in August that has raised questions about his racial sensitivity, and Mr. Webb for an article he wrote 27 years ago that has called into question his views on the role of women in the military.

Mr. Allen apologized again for calling one of Mr. Webb's staffers "macaca," the name of an Eastern Hemisphere monkey. The word is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

"I made a mistake," he said. "I said things thoughtlessly, but there was no racial or ethnic intent to slur anyone."

His remark also led to the resurfacing of his opposition as a Virginia legislator to a state holiday for Martin Luther King and his proclamation honoring Confederate History Month.

Mr. Webb expressed regret for his 1979 article titled "Women Can't Fight," in which he described the hard-core conditions of life as an infantryman in Vietnam and said he had never met a woman "whom I could trust to provide those men with combat leadership."

Five women who graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in the 1980s said at a press conference last week that the article led to harassment of women, who were admitted to the academy for the first time in 1976.

"I don't think it was wrong to participate in the debate at that time," Mr. Webb said. "It's been 27 years. I am fully comfortable with the roles of women in the military today."

Last week, Mr. Webb said he was "profoundly sorry."

After the debate, Mr. Allen's campaign e-mailed reporters a letter sent to host Tim Russert from retired Cmdr. Kathleen Murray, a 1984 graduate of the Naval Academy, in which she said Mr. Webb's apology "comes too late."

As Senator Falters, A Democrat Rises In Virginia (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, Sept. 17 — From the start, the Virginia Senate race was an emblematic campaign for 2006: combat boots vs. cowboy boots, in the inevitable shorthand.

A highly decorated Vietnam veteran and former secretary of the Navy who opposed the war in Iraq (James Webb, Democrat) in an uphill battle against a paragon of sunbelt conservatism with national ambitions (Senator George Allen, Republican.)

But in the past month, ever since Mr. Allen's demeaning reference to a young man of Indian descent at a campaign event, this race has become more than an intriguing clash of symbols; according to the polls, it is now truly competitive.

Increasingly, Democratic strategists see Virginia as a prime target for one of the six seats they need to regain a majority. Perhaps most important for Mr. Webb, whose late-starting campaign has lagged far behind Mr. Allen's in fund-raising, the Democrat's contributions have begun to climb, advisers say. "He's got George Allen on the run in the Commonwealth of Virginia," said Bob Kerrey, former Democratic senator from Nebraska, who was rallying donors at a reception for Mr. Webb last week in New York.

In one of the sharpest exchanges of the campaign, Mr. Webb and Mr. Allen squared off on the war in Iraq on "Meet the Press" on NBC on Sunday, with Mr. Allen defending the Bush administration's policy and denouncing the "second-guessing and Monday-morning quarterbacking" of the critics. "We're going to need to do what it takes to succeed," Mr. Allen said, when asked if he would support additional troops in Iraq, "because it's essential to the security of the United States of America."

Mr. Webb responded: "I know what it's like to be on the ground. I know what it's like to fight a war like this, and either — there are limits to what the military can do. Eventually, this is going to have to move into a diplomatic environment, and that's where this administration seems to have blinders. They are not talking to Syria, they are not talking to Iran, and there are ways that we can do this, move this forward."

Mr. Webb also took several digs at what he called theorists in the administration and among its allies who know combat only in the abstract. Mr. Allen, like the majority of the current Congress, did not serve in the military.

DOJ_NMG_0064048

In recent days, the Allen campaign, acknowledging a newly competitive race, has gone on the attack. A Mason-Dixon poll conducted this month found Mr. Allen's lead, once in the double-digits, had shrunk, with 46 percent for Mr. Allen, 42 percent for Mr. Webb, and a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

For his part, Mr. Webb, 60, a writer and former marine who served four years in the Reagan administration, was rolling through Virginia in a camouflaged Jeep last week, driven by a buddy from Vietnam, reflecting on his long, strange political journey.

He entered the race, his first for elected office, early this year, starting with "zero dollars and no staff." He eventually won the support of national Democrats, who saw him as a compelling voice for their party on national security. He was propelled into the race, Mr. Webb said, in large part by the war in Iraq.

As he is quick to remind his audiences, Mr. Webb spoke out against an invasion early on, arguing that containment had worked in the cold war and would work, again, against Saddam Hussein. American occupation forces in Iraq would "quickly become 50,000 terrorist targets," he warned in an op-ed article in The Washington Post in September 2002. He went to see Mr. Allen to voice his concerns, and said Mr. Allen's position, essentially, was "you're asking me to be disloyal to my president."

Mr. Webb, who had voted for Mr. Allen, said he left that meeting thinking, "Boy, did I make a mistake." Mr. Allen has said he cast his vote for the war out of loyalty to the country, not the president.

The war is not an abstract issue for Mr. Webb. His son, Jimmy, 24, a lance corporal in the Marines, shipped out to Iraq this month. He wears his son's old combat boots on the campaign trail, in tribute to him and "all the people sent into harm's way."

Mr. Webb tells his audiences that the idea came from his son, who noted that Mr. Allen always wore cowboy boots, though "there are no cowboys in Virginia."

Asked at a news conference last week if he felt torn about his son heading to Iraq, given his views on the war, Mr. Webb replied: "My son is doing what our family has always done. I'm very proud of his service. Like most people in the military, we separate politics out from service to country."

Mr. Webb has not only lived but chronicled the American military tradition in novels like "Fields of Fire," films like "Rules of Engagement" and in nonfiction works like "Born Fighting," an exploration of his Scotch-Irish roots. A graduate of the Naval Academy, Mr. Webb served as a rifle platoon and company commander in Vietnam, where he was badly injured and awarded the Navy Cross and the Silver Star.

He said he was drawn to the Republicans, 30 years ago, because of their stance on national security. "Those were real issues to me, and I cared a lot about them," he said. He worked on Capitol Hill and joined the Reagan administration in 1984 as an assistant secretary of defense, becoming Navy secretary in 1987. He resigned in a fight with his superiors over budget cuts and other issues, saying at the time, "It's no secret that I'm not a person who wears a bridle well."

He said he was ultimately drawn to the Democratic Party because of the tradition of Andrew Jackson and his commitment to giving average people a voice. On the campaign trail, he talks about the growth of inequality and the pressures on the middle class.

Mr. Allen, 54, a former governor and the son of a legendary coach for the Washington Redskins, has been running as an experienced leader strong on national security, focused on innovation and education and committed to what he calls Virginia values and Reaganesque conservatism on issues like cutting taxes.

His record as governor from 1993 to 1997 included tougher education standards, welfare legislation with time limits on benefits and parental notification requirements for abortions. In 2000, he defeated the Democratic incumbent, Charles S. Robb, for a Senate seat. Mr. Allen has proved a loyal ally of President Bush, a point Democrats hope to use to their advantage, given Mr. Bush's decline in popularity. Mr. Allen is considered to be a potential candidate for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, and refused to rule it out in Sunday's debate.

But Mr. Allen was thrown badly off stride by the reaction to his comments to the college student and Webb volunteer who attended an Allen rally in southwestern Virginia. Mr. Allen has insisted that his use of the term "macaca" had no racial connotations.

Dick Wadhams, the Allen campaign manager, said the race was competitive, "no doubt about it," but said Mr. Webb's political inexperience, fuzziness on the issues and lack of enthusiasm for campaigning — Mr. Webb does not appear to have a high comfort level on the campaign trail — would all work in the Allen campaign's favor. "We still have a financial advantage," Mr. Wadhams said. "And we still have an incumbent who's won two tough elections."

In the past week, the Allen campaign has taken aim at Mr. Webb on two counts: highlighting his opposition, in an article he wrote 27 years ago, to women in combat and at the Naval Academy, and asserting that Mr. Webb has no right to use videotape of President Ronald Reagan praising him in a new television advertisement.

On women in combat, Mr. Webb said that he was sorry for any pain his writing had caused, that times had changed, and that he should be judged by what he did in the intervening years to expand opportunities for women.

DOJ_NMG_0064049

Some Republicans worry that the growth of Northern Virginia, with its increasingly urban voters and what some pollsters say is discontent with the status quo in Washington, poses a real challenge to their party. Mr. Webb's allies, for their part, worry he will not have enough money to hold his own against Mr. Allen on television.

The anxieties on both sides point to a central truth: Virginia, at the moment, is a very competitive race.

Straight Shooters (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, September 25, 2006

MISSOULA, MONT.-Jon Tester, the Democratic U.S. Senate candidate, fits right in amid the sea of barbecue grills and beer at this tailgating party outside the opening University of Montana football game. A burly farmer wearing a Grizzlies team T-shirt and his signature flattop haircut, Tester doesn't resemble most politicians. He's probably the only Senate candidate who took six days off from campaigning recently to harvest grain-on his farm near Big Sandy. Political observers thought it was a little crazy to give up prime campaigning time against three-term incumbent Republican Sen. Conrad Burns in one of the country's premier Senate races. But Tester just shrugs: "I'm a farmer, not a politician. I'm running to get honest representation back in Washington, D.C."

That down-home attitude is clearly appealing to many Big Sky Country voters and has Burns facing the toughest test of his career. Burns's job is also one the national Democratic Party is eyeing hungrily in its quest to gain six seats and win back the Senate. The most recent polling put Tester, president of the Montana state Senate, slightly ahead-a shocking turnabout for the incumbent.

Those poll numbers probably reflect the generally sour mood of voters nationwide, as well as the particular ethics problems facing Burns because of his relationship to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Burns thought he could count on the fact that Montana likes Republicans-especially those who bring home federal dollars. President George W. Bush carried the state 59 to 39 percent over John Kerry in 2004, and Burns has brought back billions to a state dependent on ranching and farming aid. And that still makes for a substantial advantage: Burns's campaign war chest-which is more than four times Tester's-will enable him to flood the airwaves with ads against his challenger. "A lot of this race is about who Tester is and which campaign will be successful in defining him," says Christopher Muste, a political science professor at the University of Montana in Missoula. "Everyone already knows who Burns is at this point."

Tainted money. Which may or may not be a good thing. The publicity over Burns's relationship with Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January to corruption-related charges, knocked him off a clear path to an easy re-election victory. Burns received $150,000 in contributions from Abramoff and his Indian tribe clients. Burns later said he would return the money, but he's had a rough time explaining why Abramoff told Vanity Fair, "Every appropriation we wanted [from Burns's committee] we got."

Ethics issues took center stage at the most recent Burns-Tester debate in Hamilton, Mont., in the heart of the Bitterroot Valley in the western part of the state. When Burns asked a rhetorical question about who was holding up a bill in Congress, a Tester supporter shouted out: "Abramoff!" Burns laughed with the audience, but later Tester said to raucous applause, "It is well documented what's gone on with my opponent in relationship to lobbyists back in Washington, D.C. Senator Burns has changed. He's not the same guy he was in 1988 ... Washington has changed him."

Corruption That Shook Capitol Isn't Rattling Elections (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

HAMILTON, Mont. -- Sen. Conrad Burns gazed at a debate audience and asked if anyone could guess who was blocking efforts in Washington to control health-care costs.

"Abramoff?" shouted a heckler. The crowd at a packed high school auditorium here in Montana's Bitterroot Valley erupted in hoots and jeers.

Visibly angered, Burns, 71, shot the audience a don't-mock-me glare. But his debating point (blaming Democrats for health-care costs) and his senatorial dignity were swamped by the contempt of constituents who for nearly a year have been lapping up revelations about his ties to disgraced Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Burns, though, soldiered on through the catcalls and sneers -- and not without reason. He may be carrying Abramoff on his back, but in this thinly populated, Republican-leaning state, he continues to run neck and neck with his Democratic challenger, Jon Tester, president of the Montana Senate. Poll numbers have not moved much in months.

For all the influence-peddling that has been exposed in the run-up to the midterm election, corruption on Capitol Hill has not become a decisive issue -- here or in much of the country. The Abramoff scandal, having ended the careers of a few lawmakers and stained the reputations of several others, can certainly rile up ardent Democrats, as the debate here demonstrated. But it is not making fundamental changes in the nation's partisan landscape, especially in races, as with Burns in Montana, in which candidates are facing only unsavory stories rather than indictments or guilty pleas.

In an interview, the senator said his polling shows that most voters regard the "Abramoff deal" as merely a political liability and not a damning verdict on his character. Several pollsters and observers of politics in this state agreed with that assessment. The controversy is almost certainly the main reason Burns is in a competitive race this year, but by no means is it a guaranteed career-ender.

"The Democrats started way early with baseless allegations, and now a majority of people are saying, 'Oh, well,' " Burns said. "We are just moving on."

What, then, are the consequences of the oiliest congressional scandal in a generation as it percolates into races far from Washington? There are, of course, some early goners:

Tom Delay (R-Tex.), once the most powerful man in the House, resigned as majority leader and quit Congress, with Abramoff favors and an indictment for improper fundraising hanging over his head.

Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) decided not to run for reelection and pleaded guilty Friday to conspiracy and making a false statement as part of his admission that he traded official acts for campaign contributions and lavish meals in the Abramoff affair.

And Ralph Reed, the telegenic former Christian Coalition executive director, lost the Republican primary for Georgia's lieutenant governor after being tarred by his ties with the lobbyist.

The hand-me-down taint of scandal could still hurt Republicans trying to win the House seats abandoned by DeLay and Ney. "Bob Ney's transgressions resonate despite his departure," said Zack Space, a Democrat running for Ney's seat. "People are very hungry for change."

But in strongly Republican areas, scandal-driven change is far from a sure thing. In a special election to fill the California congressional seat vacated by Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R), now in prison after he admitted taking bribes from defense contractors, a well-funded Republican beat a Democratic challenger in June.

"Democrats ran on a corruption message in a district where a sitting member went to jail, and they didn't win, so how the heck are they going to use that message somewhere else?" asked Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

With Burns, though, the taint is not left over from someone else: He pressured the Interior Department to award a $3 million grant to a wealthy Indian tribe that was an Abramoff client, according to news accounts. A former top Burns aide worked with Abramoff's firm, and Abramoff himself told Vanity Fair that he and his clients received "every appropriation we wanted" from a subcommittee chaired by Burns. The senator is apparently not under investigation, but he did accept $150,000 in campaign donations from Abramoff, his lobbying team and his clients -- donations that Burns later returned.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), who is leading the Democrats' campaign committee in the Senate, acknowledged that the corruption issue is just one bullet, and hardly a silver one. Ethical controversies such as those Burns has weathered in Montana, he said, send a message to voters: "He's gotten too comfortable, we need a change." The general backlash is what endangers incumbents, "rather than corruption itself," said Schumer.

"Making Abramoff stick as a campaign issue is going to be hard for Democrats with a well-known Republican incumbent, but with Sen. Burns, who has such a direct link, it is pretty powerful stuff," said Fred Yang, a Washington-based Democratic pollster whose firm has worked on Montana races for decades.

Montana is a critical piece in the Democratic strategy to gain the six seats necessary to take control of the Senate. And the scandal, it seems, has shaped every aspect of the race here, beginning half a year before Democrats even had a candidate. Statewide television ads, paid for by the Democratic Party, pounded away last fall at Burns's ties to Abramoff. In the senator's first television ad of the 2006 campaign, he had to play defense, declaring that the lobbyist "never influenced me."

The Abramoff issue even seems to have dictated who would run against Burns. Tester said in an interview that the scandal was responsible, in part, for his easy primary victory in June over a better-known, better-financed rival, two-term state Auditor John Morrison. The Billings Gazette disclosed last spring that Morrison had an affair with a woman who later married a man investigated by Morrison's office.

The scandal apparently spooked Democrats longing for a candidate who could rail righteously about Abramoff without having to defend what was in his own closet.

"I think voters went into that primary saying to themselves, 'Who is the best candidate to beat Burns?'" said Tester, 50, a farmer and former schoolteacher from Big Sandy, population 703.

Tester, who has criticized the conduct of the Iraq war and promised health insurance for every family, has tried to introduce himself to voters statewide as the kind of real Montanan that he says Burns (a former auctioneer, football referee and radio announcer) no longer is.

DOJ_NMG_0064051

Tester's campaign flaunts his authentic big-country look: NFL lineman shoulders, a belly that's headed south and a flattop haircut. His left hand is particularly authentic, missing three fingers that were gnawed off by a meat grinder when he was 9. "Still have that same grinder," Tester said, when asked about the hand.

"I don't look like the other senators," Tester boasts in a TV ad. "But isn't it time the Senate looked a little bit more like Montana?"

Another ad has Tester driving across Montana and talking about his pickup: "You see, special interests have a tight grip on Washington, leaving us out. It doesn't have to be that way. Special interests will never hitch a ride on this truck."

In recent weeks, Burns has damaged his own cause with a series of gaffes. He has insulted local firefighters (by observing in July that they did a "piss-poor job" of fighting a wildfire east of Billings), suggested that all taxi drivers are terrorists and joked about the immigration status of the "nice little Guatemalan man" who works on his house.

Still, Burns remains viable among many Montanans, according to pollsters. As Tester said, "This thing is far from over."

The senator's shield against Abramoff and his own rhetorical blunders may well be the state's extraordinarily strong economy. As growth slows in much of the country, Montana is bulling ahead, on track for its fourth consecutive year of 4 percent growth. Consumer sentiment in the state is at an all-time high, and the annual rise in per-capita income -- measured last year at 6.3 percent -- ranks third in the country. At 3.7 percent, the unemployment rate is about a percentage point below the national average.

"We are in the midst of a natural resource boom of historic proportions," said Paul Polzin, director of economic research at the University of Montana. "At the same time, all other industries are holding their own. This is benefiting exactly those counties where Burns has been strong."

Burns argues that the federal money he has sent Montana's way over the past 18 years helped ignite the boom -- and his argument resonates. It "matters a lot" for a state with just 935,000 residents, said Craig Wilson, a political science professor at Montana State University in Billings.

"Burns has been extraordinary in his ability to bring money to poor little old Montana," said Tom Britz, a consultant to the credit card industry who lives in the booming northwest Montana town of Whitefish. "When it is time to vote, the many people who have been touched by that money know where their bread is buttered."

What may also matter in the Senate contest here is the atypical optimism of many Montanans, as compared with voters' attitudes in most states.

"This is one of the few places in the country right now where people are not hankering for change," said John Russonello, a Washington pollster who works for Democrats and liberal nonprofit groups and who has led focus groups on social issues across Montana this year.

Unlike some Republican incumbents facing reelection, Burns has embraced the war -- and Bush's conduct of it -- as essential to the country's fight against terrorism. Betting that most Montanans see Iraq as he does, Burns has launched blistering TV and radio attacks on Tester, accusing him of taking money from "extreme liberal groups that mocked American deaths."

"Tester's not tough," one ad says. "He is deceitful, and he'll say anything to get elected."

In the recent debate, Tester responded to those accusations by saying that Burns, whom he described as bought and paid for by lobbyists such as Abramoff, is just not honest.

"Washington has changed him," said Tester, pointing at Burns. "The fact is we have to have people back there who have Montana values."

Burns smiled and said he had not changed and never would: "I have the same wife, the same kids; got the same principles, same values."

As pro-Tester hecklers booed, hissed, cursed and at one point called the senator "psycho," Burns spent much of the 90-minute debate reminding the crowd that he -- not Tester -- is a specialist in funneling federal money back home. By these lights, a candidate who knows the corridors of insider Washington might have an advantage. "It is going to take a guy who has got a little seniority and a little position to get it done," he said.

GOP Eyes Washington State Seat (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Washington state voters tomorrow will formally choose their nominees for the U.S. Senate, setting the stage for a West Coast showdown that Republicans hope will help them capture a Democratic seat.

Sen. Maria Cantwell, a Democrat, faces anti-war candidate Hong Tran in a primary that serves as the opening act for a race with Republican Mike McGavick, who is expected to easily win his own primary contest today.

DOJ_NMG_0064052

Republicans and some pollsters think Mr. McGavick, a business executive who casts himself as an independent, has a good shot at ousting the freshman senator this fall.

Miss Tran, a nonprofit lawyer who fled Vietnam as a young girl, spent yesterday at a Seattle Peace concert wooing last-minute voters.

Miss Cantwell is not considered in danger of losing tomorrow's primary as did her Democratic colleague Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut. Mr. Lieberman lost his primary to Ned Lamont last month, largely because of his support of President Bush on the Iraq war, and will run as an independent in November.

Initially, Miss Cantwell faced opposition from several Democrats critical of her stance on the Iraq war.

Mark Wilson, who announced that he would challenge Miss Cantwell more than a year ago, was hired by the senator's campaign this summer. He became an outreach director with an $8,000 monthly salary, prompting accusations that she was trying to buy off her critics.

Miss Tran has accused state Democratic Party officials of withholding voter databases from her campaign, saying they don't want voters to know about her candidacy.

Miss Cantwell voted in favor of the Iraq war in October 2002, but recently supported a Democratic effort to initiate a "phased redeployment" of troops from Iraq by Dec. 31.

Miss Cantwell and Mr. McGavick were closely matched earlier in the race, but recent revelations that the Republican was arrested for driving under the influence in 1993 have contributed to his sagging poll numbers. Mr. McGavick, a millionaire who was chief executive at insurance giant Safeco, characterizes the event as "embarrassing" and "one of my biggest mistakes in life."

"Candidates shouldn't be afraid to admit that they are human and to talk about lessons they've learned," Mr. McGavick told supporters in an e-mail recently.

He first told voters that he had coasted through a yellow light, prompting a DUI citation. However, news reports based on the police report show that he ran a red light and was both cited and arrested.

A Sept. 6 Rasmussen Reports poll showed Miss Cantwell with a 17-point lead, but others had her with an eight-point advantage. A poll from the previous month had the senator with a six-point lead.

However, the Associated Press reported last week that Miss Cantwell secured more than $11 million in federal projects for a lobbyist who advises her campaign.

The accusations involve Ron Dotzauer, her former campaign manager who still owes her between $15,000 and $50,000 from a loan she gave him in the 1990s.

The loan was still listed as outstanding on Miss Cantwell's May financial-disclosure report, the AP reported. The senator's office told the AP that the federal projects helped Washingtonians.

Support For Electronic Filing Of Senate Candidates' Campaign-Finance Records Gains Momentum (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

In the next few weeks leading up to Election Day, money will pour into candidates' coffers and voters will be able to see which lobby groups are trying hardest to buy their lawmakers' favor.

Except if the candidates happen to be running for Senate.

In one of the most controversial quirks in election law, candidates for Senate are not required to file their campaign-finance reports electronically. That means voters can't effectively find out how much and from whom their would-be senators have collected money until long after the election -- too late for them to act.

A growing number of senators and public-interest groups have been working for years to change this rule. They contend that it's only reasonable that senators should be required to file their disclosures electronically -- just as candidates for the House and the presidency do. In that way voters can easily see within 24 hours via the Internet what the candidates are spending and from whom they are getting their funds.

As it is, almost all senators and Senate candidates deliver their reports on paper (even though those reports are written on computers). The paper filings are laboriously scanned and then key-punched into an electronic system, a procedure that often takes six weeks to finish and costs hundreds of thousands of dollars.

After the reports are submitted to the Secretary of the Senate (often well past published deadlines), they are placed onto the Federal Election Commission's Web site in a page-by-page format. The listings are not searchable, which makes it almost impossible for anyone to glean useful information. Think of the process like rummaging through thousands of disorderly papers in a very large box.

The net result: Senators have insolated themselves from criticism that stems from their very important, end-of-campaign donations because they have denied voters accessible information when it would be most useful.

"The Senate has repeatedly voted to mandate timely electronic disclosure and Web searchability for House and presidential candidates, non-Senate party committees, political action committees, Section 527 political organizations and lobbyists," said Stephen R. Weissman, associate director for policy at the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute. "The level of hypocrisy is unbelievable, and the American voter pays a heavy price."

The Senate's Committee on Rules and Administration is in charge of deciding what to do about the issue and, despite pleas from a bipartisan group of senators, has done nothing. I tried many times in the past two weeks to get the spokeswoman for the committee's chairman, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), to return my phone calls and to answer questions on the topic. But she did not respond.

In fact, it's hard to find anyone who will defend the current law. On the other hand, lots of folks have problems with the situation and are eager to say so, including the Federal Election Commission. The FEC has recommended that the Senate move to electronic filing on "multiple occasions," said Michael E. Toner, the FEC's chairman. "Senate campaigns are the only ones that don't file electronically," he said, "even though there's widespread agreement that electronic filing works well and allows data to be publicly available within hours of it being received."

Senators from both sides of the aisle agree. Eleven senators (seven Republicans and four Democrats) sent a letter to Lott in July urging him to approve legislation that would mandate electronic filing. "We believe there is consensus among our colleagues to move to electronic filing and online disclosure of campaign finance reports," said the letter, which was primarily authored by the political odd couple of Sens. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.). "The next step in this process is Senate action."

Voters surely would have been better off if such a law been in effect in prior elections. When the polls opened in November 2004, voters were in the dark about $53 million in individual Senate contributions of $200 or more dating all the way back to July, according to the Campaign Finance Institute. If you were a South Dakotan choosing between Tom Daschle, the Senate's Democratic leader, and Republican challenger John Thune, you were almost certainly unaware of large donations totaling $24,000 from employees of the mortgage finance giant Fannie Mae to Daschle, as well as large contributions to Thune from employees of Coastview Capital and L.E. Lehrman and Co. ($12,000 each).

The only way you might have known about these and other major gifts would have been to leaf through the candidates' reports, each of which was about 3,400 pages long. North Carolina voters had it slightly better, but not much; the reports of major party candidates there were only 1,100 pages long.

The House started to make its disclosures simpler to obtain more than a decade ago. In 1995, the House began filing its reports directly with the FEC, and two years later it allowed the reports to be filed electronically. But the Senate took neither step, standing firm on the principle that it should control its own reports, a notion that one Senate aide summarized as "senatorial prerogative."

How this makes sense in an information age is hard to fathom.

Good Deed Bounty Hunting

The Sunlight Network is offering cash to citizens who do what it thinks is the "right thing." The nonprofit group is advertising that it will pay up to a total of $680,000 to people who persuade members of Congress, or prospective members, to agree to put their daily schedules on the Internet for all to see.

The Sunlight Network, which is affiliated with the Sunlight Foundation, thinks that it is well past time that voters knew who their elected representatives were meeting with and how often. But there's no way to find out short of publishing their schedules, something that is not required and, in fact, is never done.

So the network says that it will pay a cash fee of $1,000 to anyone who persuades a lawmaker to sign an agreement to disclose his or her daily calendar, and $250 to anyone who gets a candidate for Congress to do the same. The Sunlight Foundation is underwritten by securities lawyer and entrepreneur Michael R. Klein and headed by Ellen S. Miller, a longtime advocate for disclosure of campaign finances.

The organization takes its name from a quotation by former Supreme Court justice Louis D. Brandeis: "Sunlight is said to be the best of disinfectants." Its goal is to shed light, or public attention, on candidates' big donors and lobbying contacts as a way to change government. But so far no one has taken advantage of this latest gimmick.

Face Of His Campaign Isn't Bush's (LAT)

By Sam Howe Verhovek

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

BELLEVUE, Wash. — A funny thing happened Friday when Karl Rove, the White House advisor, came to the Seattle suburbs to headline a fundraiser for freshman Republican Rep. Dave Reichert: The congressman did nothing to publicize the visit, and his challenger drew every bit of attention to it she could.

On the day Rove was in town, Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft Corp. executive who is Reichert's Democratic opponent, issued her fifth news release of the week casting the visit in a negative light, and while Rove and Reichert were attending a round-table briefing for Republican donors, about 60 Burner supporters mugged for cameras outside.

But both of Rove's appearances — at the fundraiser and at the round table — were private and closed to the media, so there were no news photographs of Reichert, 56, with campaign mastermind Rove.

For Burner, 35, who is making her first run for public office, there was an obvious strategy in focusing attention on a reliable Republican bogeyman in what state pollster Stuart Elway described as a "classic swing district." The 8th District has voted Democratic in the last four presidential elections yet consistently has sent a Republican to the House.

The Reichert-Burner race in Seattle's suburbs east of Lake Washington shows up on nearly every national list of competitive races, and the Rove fundraiser comes on the heels of campaign filings showing that the challenger has raised more money this year than the incumbent.

According to federal disclosure reports filed this month, Burner has raised about $1.2 million this year, Reichert $1 million — which Burner cites as evidence of her campaign's momentum and of a sense she gets in the district that "people are very disturbed about the direction of this country."

On the other hand, Reichert campaign officials point out that the congressman has raised $2.2 million overall, much more than Burner, and that he has more cash on hand — $1.1 million to Burner's $728,000 — an indicator of each side's ability to buy ads going into the stretch run of the campaign.

"It's very clear that the Democrats are building a war chest for a negative campaign that they really have already started," said Reichert spokeswoman Carol Beaudu. "But we are right where we want to be, and it will go a long ways toward telling 8th District voters about Dave's independent voting record."

Reichert highlights his support for stem-cell research, and his opposition to drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and to federal interference in the Terri Schiavo feeding-tube case, as examples of his willingness to buck party leaders.

Pollster Elway said that was a telling dynamic of the campaign: Democrats seem to be doing everything they can to tie Reichert to the Bush White House, and especially to the war in Iraq, whereas Reichert is taking pains to show that he's willing to disagree with the president.

In a district like the 8th, Elway said, Burner is almost certain to benefit from a general discontent with President Bush. The question is how much.

"If the national tide is running strong with the Democrats, this is exactly the kind of race they could win," he said. "If it's not such a strong tide, then it's a pretty good example of a place where a Republican could hang on, by emphasizing that he's shown some independence from the administration."

Some voters here indeed seem potentially swayed by the incumbent's assertions of independence. "I like Reichert; he's his own man," said Dave Purdy, 39, an imaging-equipment salesman in Bellevue who voted for Reichert in 2004 and said he would probably do so again. But Purdy added that he wanted to learn more about Burner and would probably focus more on the race after the candidates' debate next month.

Still, it is also clear there is a deep vein of discontent, especially over the Iraq war. Though Reichert appears more popular personally than Bush here, the discontent could hurt Reichert in November.

Reichert flew to Seattle from Washington, D.C., on Friday for the Rove events and to see his family (he and his wife of 36 years, Julie, have three children and six grandchildren), but he had no campaign appearances over the weekend and was not available for an interview, his spokeswoman said.

Burner, in an interview after a fundraising event of her own Thursday, said the war in Iraq had been an "incredible drain on [the nation's] resources and our spirit" and that many voters "simply don't believe that the war in Iraq is the same thing as the war on terror."

But she stopped short of calling for an immediate withdrawal. Instead, she said, Bush "needs to go to the military leaders and say, 'What is the plan for giving Iraq back to the Iraqis and bringing our troops home with honor?' "

Burner graduated from Harvard University, majoring in economics and computer science. She and her husband, Mike, have a 3-year-old son, Henry. She worked in software in Boston and Silicon Valley, Calif., before moving to the Seattle area in 1998.

She said she had strong ties to Washington state dating to childhood summers spent with her grandparents in Rochester, south of Olympia.

In campaign appearances, she mixes emotion and humor, saying public service is a calling in her family — one brother served in Iraq with the 101st Airborne, a sister is a nurse, and another brother, she said, performs a vital duty too: He drives a delivery truck for Miller Brewing Co.

An Arizona Win Puts Immigration Back In Play (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, September 17, 2006

A few weeks ago, it was became suddenly clear that the Republican free-for-all primary in the southeastern corner of Arizona was anything but ordinary. Randy Graf--a former golf pro, state representative and cowboy-boots-clad founding member of the Minutemen border group--had vaulted into the lead with his focus on fixing what he called the "security crisis" at the border. Opponents attacked him as extreme, and the national Republican party Party went so far as to buy at least $122,000 worth of ads for Graf's most formidable moderate challenger, state Rep. Steve Huffman.

It didn't work. Graf won last week, roiling some Republican circles and raising questions about the wisdom of the party's floundering immigration strategy. It has also put in jeopardy a precious House seat in a mostly moderate district that has been represented since 1984 by retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe, an abortion-rights centrist and the only openly gay Republican in Congress.

Fizzled rallies. In some ways, Graf's victory came at a moment that seems ripe for immigration restrictionists. After this spring's May Day rallies drew thousands of protesters in cities all over the country, efforts to duplicate that momentum this fall have largely fizzled. There were puny numbers at a September march on Washington that activists said would draw hundreds of thousands. A large coalition of advocacy groups that had vowed to register 1 million new immigrant voters now widely acknowledges they it won't meet that goal.

In this atmosphere, Graf's win was electrifying--at least in some corners. "I think it shows people are furious about immigration," says Ira Mehlman, a communications director with the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group advocating restricting immigration. "And it's not just Arizona." Vulnerable incumbents like Sen. Rick Santorum, Rep. Chris Shays, and Sen. Jim Talent, who weren't vociferous on immigration a year ago, have already taken a hard line on border security. With Graf's win, Mehlman says the trend could easily grow stronger.

That tough rhetoric stands in contrast to what the Republicans in Washington didn't get done this year. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist announced two weeks ago that he won't try to reconcile a punitive House immigration bill with a more moderate Senate measure that includes a guest-worker program before November. In an atmosphere where people talk about "a do-nothing Congress," that move was probably a mistake, says GOP strategist Whit Ayers. Last week, the House seemed to scramble to do something: Republicans passed a bill that would build 700 miles of double-layered steel fencing on the southern border, basically resurrecting one of the controversial aspects of their stalled bill.

Still, some observers of the Graf race urged caution. "I'm still waiting, for someone to show me the races where the [hard-line immigration] approach actually wins our party something," says Rep. Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican. He said Graf benefited from a five-man race. "This isn't," Flake says, "the uprising some think it is."

Graf, however, tapped right into the frustration that's very alive in the Eighth District, which includes about 100 miles of the U.S.-Mexican border and runs up to the some prosperous suburbs near Tucson. "Down here," Graf he says, "illegal immigrants are killing cows, trashing people's ranches, and putting families near violent criminals, and Congress hasn't done anything about it." He also hopes his desire to slash bloated spending will spark Arizona's famed mile-wide independent streak.

Graf faces stiff competition from former state Sen. Gabrielle Giffords, a Democrat who says she fits the district's moderate profile: She was a Republican until 1999. "I jumped into this," she says from her volunteer-filled Tucson office," because I think the country is in trouble." Giffords emphasized healthcare and education in her primary, but as a Fulbright scholar who studied in Mexico in the early 1990s, she's credible on immigration and plans a push for more sanctions for illegal-alien employers and reform that includes a guest-worker program.

But many experts say if Republicans want to keep the seat, they'll have to unite behind Graf and convince Arizonan swing voters to do so too as well. Graf did a victory lap through Washington last week and picked up the endorsement--and a $5,000 check--from his former foes at the Republican congressional committee. Though Kolbe has refused his support, that didn't deter a delighted Republican Rep. Tom Tancredo, the toughest immigration reformer in Congress. "I don't just want to work with Randy," Tancredo told U.S. News; "I want to someday pass the baton to him." And if Graf and the other hard-liners win, it will surely be an even bigger baton.

Ken Mehlman (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064056

Even Democrats acknowledge the prowess of the political machine Ken Mehlman oversees as chairman of the Republican National Committee (RNC).

When Mehlman came to a Monitor-sponsored breakfast with national reporters on Friday, the policy-oriented National Journal magazine had just released a poll of political insiders ranking the performance of the RNC and the Democratic National Committee (DNC).

As National Journal reporter Jim Barnes notes, it is no surprise that 94 percent of Republican insiders think the RNC is doing a better job than the Democratic National Committee in the run-up to the midterm elections. The surprise is that 68 percent of the Democratic insiders agree that the RNC is out-performing the DNC.

Mehlman, a Harvard-trained lawyer who delivers his points in rapid-fire fashion, downplayed the role of organization in elections. "The reason I am confident we are going to keep our majority is not because of our operations. It is because of the candidates on the ballot," he said. "We won in '04 because of George W. Bush, not because we had a smart turnout operation. 80 percent of politics is motivating voters based on ideas, based on ideology, and based on the candidate that expresses ideas and ideology. I think what has hurt Democrats is the fact that for so long you've had uncertain trumpets leading the party. And that makes it very hard to do the rest."

The RNC chair came to visit in a week when polling data showed a change in the public's view on the issue of terrorism, which could tend to help the president and candidates tied to him. The ABC News political blog "The Note" quoted ABC polling director Gary Langer as saying, "Terrorism has inched up in importance in the 2006 midterm elections and Republicans have regained an edge in trust to handle it, helping George W. Bush's party move closer to the Democrats in congressional vote preference."

Langer noted that Republicans lead Democrats in trust to handle terrorism by a 48-41 percent margin among registered voters in the latest ABC News poll. That is a flip from a seven-point Democratic advantage last month. Part of the change came from independent voters, the key to winning elections.

Mehlman attributes a bump in the president's job approval numbers to "a combination of speeches and realities in the world that have reminded people that a lot of what he is saying makes sense."

The GOP chief did not want to make a specific numerical forecast for the Congressional elections. He declined to confirm press reports citing unnamed senior White House officials predicting Republicans would hold the Senate by a 52-48 or 53-47 margin and lose ground in the House but still maintain control there as well.

While voicing optimism about maintaining control of Congress, Mehlman cited a number of factors that add up to what he called an overall environment that is "very challenging" for Republicans.

"We've got a headwind," he said. "We've got a headwind because we are in the sixth year of a presidency. We have a headwind because voters clearly are in a sour mood. We've got a headwind because we are in a tough war. I have acknowledged that from the beginning. So people who say it is another status quo election, race by race, I don't necessarily agree with that either. My point is it is actually a combination of factors. You do have a headwind at the same time we have certain assets we bring to the table...."

Money is a key GOP asset, Mehlman noted. "We will spend at least $60 million just on ads and turnout. In these congressional elections, Howard Dean will spend $12 million. If you add together the ... national parties on each side, if you add together the state parties around the country, in the competitive states, and if you add together the competitive congressional House and Senate campaigns, all together, when you look at cash, we have a $47 million cash advantage."

While it may be ahead on cash, the GOP last week was less than unified. The Senate Armed Services Committee rebuffed the president, after he had made a rare personal visit to the Hill, and voted for legislation that assures those on trial for terrorism receive Geneva Convention protections. The move came after former Secretary of State Colin Powell released a letter saying, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism."

Mehlman downplayed the political impact of the committee vote on how to treat terrorism suspects. "The average American is not paying attention to committee mark-ups. The average American is looking at the overall picture. And what the average American is seeing and they are saying is 'ok, what are the tools we need to win?' ... I am hopeful and confident the president is going to have the ability to have the kind of program he talked about last week, which is a program [that] is critical to defending America."

While the RNC chairman's presentation accentuated the positive, it was clear Mehlman is concerned about the outcome of the 2006 elections. "I am never comfortable. I am always concerned. I am always watching. I think we've got good efforts.... The fact that [the Democrats] have the resources they do, the fact that the environment is tough, that all worries me a lot. This is a very challenging environment."

DOJ_NMG_0064057

In an earlier life, the Mehlman was campaign manager for Bush-Cheney '04. Prior to moving to the campaign, he was director of Political Affairs at the White House, and deputy to Karl Rove. He is a trustee of Franklin and Marshall College, his undergraduate (Class of 1988) alma mater.

The Democratic Entourage (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman And Holly Bailey

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

It is getting late in the season, but John Yarmuth still wants in—into the club, the entourage. He is the Democratic candidate for Congress in Louisville, Ky., hoping to oust Republican incumbent Anne Northup. The club is the Democrats' Red to Blue Program. If you are a member—there will be about 40 of them—donations from strangers across the country will blow through your campaign mail slot like letters from Hogwarts. All you have to do is convince Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Chicago that you are worthy and that you can win. But that is the hard part. Under Emanuel, the program runs like a cross between a Chicago political clubhouse and a movie studio with too many way-over-budget projects. "I made my case to him when he was down here a couple of weeks ago," Yarmuth says. A friend of Yarmuth's flew to Washington last week to make the pitch to an Emanuel deputy. "We've got a good chance," says Yarmuth.

Most politicians hate to say no; Emanuel can't say it enough. He is a one-man pecking order. "All right, what's going, whaddya got?" he impatiently asks a reporter who stops by. Perched behind a clean desk in his campaign office, he talks while thumbing his BlackBerry as though it contained the secrets of the universe. Aides appear in the doorway with bulletins from the front; he glances up now and again at news on a flat-panel TV; someone hands him a personal cell phone (it's a call from his wife); he tries to put on a Norah Jones CD—loud—until the reporter objects. "For us to win we have to focus," he says. "It's all about picking, making good judgments about priorities." The Red to Blue Program is a Good Housekeeping Seal, he says. "It means a lot of things: campaign well run, campaign well financed, good candidate. It means a good opportunity to pick up a seat." Donors know whom they should give to—and Emanuel easily can check later to see if they do. "Candidates want to be on [the list] and donors want the clarity," he says.

If the man, the scene and the rope-line mentality remind you of something you have seen on television—say, "Entourage" on HBO or "The West Wing" on NBC—it is no accident. In a "life imitates art imitates life" moment, the Democrats' hopes for winning control of the House rest on whether real people can be as effective as they have been portrayed as being on TV. Consider: the hard-charging character of Josh Lyman on "The West Wing" was modeled on Emanuel. How did that happen? Because the part was created and written by Aaron Sorkin (who created the whole show) and played by Bradley Whitford. Both men are clients of Emanuel's younger brother, Hollywood agent Ari Emanuel. The maniacally in-your-face character of agent Ari Gold on "Entourage" is modeled on Ari Emanuel, who represents Steve Tompkins and Mark Wahlberg, executive producers of the show. In real life, Ari Emanuel is fast becoming a political networking force in Los Angeles, issuing his clients and partners invitations to fund-raising events, including one for Rahm himself and for his House campaign committee. "Ari's a definite player and very strategic," says Robin Bronk, who heads the nonpartisan Creative Coalition, an arts lobbying group.

It will take all the hard-charging that Democrats can muster if they are going to assemble an entourage that can take back the House of Representatives. A switch of just 15 seats would give them their first foothold in Washington since George W. Bush became president. But at a time when political divisions are so entrenched and opinions are so fixed—on the war in Iraq, on terrorism, on economic security, on pretty much everything—the outcome could well depend (again) on money and get-out-the-vote machinery.

As has been the case since Bill Clinton left town, the Republicans have the organizational and financial advantage. However beleaguered and angry the president is—and however at odds he is with GOP senators over issues such as the treatment of terrorism suspects—the campaign apparatus Karl Rove built is intact and internally disciplined. It's a "cohesive unit," says Ken Mehlman, Republican Party chairman. "Every decision, we've all talked about it," he says.

Among Democrats, by contrast, national, Senate and House campaign units maintain their independence—and often behave like rival homies in an "Entourage" bar scene. Emanuel has clashed repeatedly with Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, whose "50-state" approach to organizing strikes Emanuel as disastrously unfocused. Only in the Democratic Party would campaign officials need to sign a written peace treaty, which Dean and Emanuel did last week. The national committee agreed to funnel $12 million of its cash into congressional get-out-the-vote efforts; Emanuel basically agreed (though not in writing) to shut up. He did so in an interview. "They want me to take my beta blockers," he says with a somewhat defiant shrug. "So I'm going to take my beta blockers, OK?" The disputes, he says, "have not hampered us."

Meaning his own clubhouse. A native of Chicago, Emanuel learned his politics from the legendary Daley family, with whom he remains close. The family lesson: take care of your own. While Republicans as a whole have $30 million more in the bank than Democrats do now, Emanuel's own Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is now roughly even with its GOP counterpart—a position it hasn't enjoyed for a decade. And there is evidence that the Red to Blue Program is working: Democratic candidates are even or ahead in fund-raising in most of the races that neutral observers regard as competitive.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, Emanuel teamed with Senate campaign chair Chuck Schumer to tap uncharted donor fields in the financial industry. "We're working outside of traditional banks," he says proudly, "into the private-equity world, the hedge-fund world, the distressed-debt world." These "worlds" know they are talking to a guy who not only runs the campaign committee, but who could be in the majority of the key financial committee—and maybe even majority leader.

The entertainment industry remains a major source of cash for the Democrats, who get two out of every three dollars given to federal candidates. It has been a tough sell. Donors felt tapped out and depressed after what they regarded as Sen. John Kerry's badly run 2004 campaign. The mood changed after the Democrats' congressional prospects improved, and some fund-raisers developed a novel, typically self-doubting pitch for selling into a down market. It goes this way, explains a screenwriter who declined to speak on the record for fear of angering big machers such as Ari Emanuel: "Hillary Clinton is going to be nominated in 2008, John McCain is going to be president, so the House is our only chance to get in the game."

Whatever the pitch, it's working. The industry has given about $10 million to Democrats so far. And while Ari Emanuel is hardly the key moneyman, he is emerging as a leader of a newer generation of Hollywood fund-raisers, who rely less on their own wallets than their networks' and who are willing to become public political figures, not just backroom types. Famously abrasive (Jerry Seinfeld reportedly once had a bumper sticker printed that read: I HATE ARI EMANUEL, TOO), he can also be charmingly insistent. He phoned one client who left his fold on friendly terms to ask, "Why are you ruining your career?" Ari called him the following week, and the next—for a year.

Persistence pays. Ari cosponsored a $220,000 fund-raiser for his brother's personal PAC in June; in the days before and after the event, the PAC received $30,000 in checks from employees of the Endeavor Agency, the firm Ari founded. Other contributors included Ari's celebrity clients, among them Sorkin and Michael Douglas. (Rahm's PAC, in turn, has donated some of that cash to members of the Red to Blue Program.) Endeavor employees have given more than $50,000 to the House campaign committee; clients such as Sorkin have given generously, too. "He can pick up the phone and get anyone—anyone—on the line," says a friend who deals with Ari on a daily basis but who is still afraid to talk about him on the record.

In Washington, meanwhile, brother Rahm is turning his attention to turnout operations. Focused like a laser beam, not so much in a hurry as in a controlled frenzy, he is almost literally driven crazy by professional ineptitude and sloth. In one legendary incident from the 1988 cycle (he was a top staffer then of the committee he now runs), he sent a dead fish to a pollster whose work he disliked. He has carefully studied the GOP's expensive, cutting-edge voter "outreach" program. Using huge databases, it connects like-minded people by using market research to develop profiles of their interests and concerns. The aim is to re-create an over-the-back-fence digital/personal endorsement.

The Democrats' system isn't nearly as robust, but perhaps one of their best GOTV masterminds—Harold Ickes—last week announced an independent effort (they hope to raise $25 million) to target key voters. "People are really beginning to understand that the House is really competitive and Democrats have a real chance to win," says Ickes. Maybe so, but Emanuel isn't making grand predictions. Privately, he's telling friends that the current number is a pickup of 15 to 19 seats—too close to call, in other words, for the Red to Blue crew to start breaking out the champagne.

Emanuel is releasing what probably is his final Red to Blue list this week. He and his team considered Yarmuth's case. The district is a tough one to win, even though Kerry carried it in 2004. Yarmuth owned a local magazine in which he published articles that might cause controversy. ("Rahm had read all of those articles before last December, when I first met him," Yarmuth says.) Perhaps most important, Yarmuth is independently wealthy. Scorn does not begin to describe Emanuel's response to the idea, as he put it, "of giving money to a multimillionaire." Yarmuth was not invited to join the entourage.

UCLA Attracts Retired General Wesley Clark (LAT)

By Rebecca Trounson

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

Wesley K. Clark, a former NATO commander and 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, will join the University of California, Los Angeles, this fall as a senior fellow, university officials are set to announce Monday.

Clark, who is expected to arrive on campus about the first of October, will teach occasional seminars, publish policy papers and organize and hold an annual conference on national security, officials said. He will be affiliated with the university's Ronald W. Burkle Center for International Relations.

The retired general's wide-ranging military, political and teaching background will serve UCLA and its students well, said Patricia O'Brien, executive dean of the university's College of Letters and Science. "I am especially pleased that our students at UCLA will benefit from General Clark's extraordinary experience, as well as his dynamic leadership and teaching credentials," O'Brien said in a statement.

Clark, who taught economics and political philosophy at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point in the early 1970s, said in a brief phone interview Friday that he was looking forward to returning to the classroom, although initially he will be a guest lecturer in other professors' courses and not teach his own.

"I'll be looking at U.S. national security in the broadest terms, including military, diplomatic, energy, environmental and trade issues," said Clark, who served as NATO's commander during the 1999 Kosovo conflict. "There's never been a time in American history when Americans have been more impacted by events abroad, and we need a strategy that touches all those areas."

Clark also said he was looking forward to living and working in the Los Angeles area, where he has a son. The appointment is open-ended, he said.

Previous lecturers and scholars at the Burkle Center have included former Presidents Clinton and Carter and other U.S. and foreign officials.

Early Admissions (WP)

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

HARVARD UNIVERSITY'S much-applauded decision no longer to allow the early acceptance of students should help ensure a more equitable admissions process and attract a more diverse group of students. Before other universities and colleges conclude they can't follow Harvard's example, they need to take a hard look at how they admit.

Starting next year, Harvard said, it will abolish the practice of early admissions of undergraduates because the program, attracting mainly the white and well-off, places minorities and the poor at a disadvantage. Early-admission programs vary but generally guarantee acceptance to students who promise in advance that they will attend. (Harvard's program hasn't required this promise.) Colleges get to lock in top students while also boosting yield (the number of offers accepted and a figure widely seen as a measure of a school's desirability). For the student, early admission increases the chance of acceptance and takes some tension out of senior year, but it prevents the offer of one college (including financial aid) being weighed against another.

It's true that Harvard -- with its prestige and billions in endowment funds -- risks little; it will enroll a strong class with or without the early-admission tool. In that sense, the University of Delaware took a bigger chance last spring when it eliminated early admissions to ensure a fairer process for both student and school. "Why," asked University of Delaware Admissions Director Louis L. Hirsh, "should applying for college be about strategizing rather than finding which of the 4,000 colleges and universities in this country is the best fit for you?"

It's a good question, but not the only one that needs to be asked in the effort to make higher education more accessible. Are standardized tests being used correctly in the admissions process? Is financial aid being distributed fairly -- the balance between merit and need-based scholarships, for instance? Do college ranking systems really make any sense? How about college marketing?

As other schools ponder whether they can afford to follow the example of Harvard and Delaware, they would do well to note the widespread reaction of parents, teachers and guidance counselors who see the decision as a step toward easing the anxiety, tension and premature pressure that has come to permeate the process for too many students.

What Would War Look Like? (TIME)

By Michael Duffy

Time, September 25, 2006

The first message was routine enough: a "Prepare to Deploy" order sent through naval communications channels to a submarine, an Aegis-class cruiser, two minesweepers and two mine hunters. The orders didn't actually command the ships out of port; they just said to be ready to move by Oct. 1. But inside the Navy those messages generated more buzz than usual last week when a second request, from the Chief of Naval Operations (CNO), asked for fresh eyes on long-standing U.S. plans to blockade two Iranian oil ports on the Persian Gulf. The CNO had asked for a rundown on how a blockade of those strategic targets might work. When he didn't like the analysis he received, he ordered his troops to work the lash up once again.

What's going on? The two orders offered tantalizing clues. There are only a few places in the world where minesweepers top the list of U.S. naval requirements. And every sailor, petroleum engineer and hedge-fund manager knows the name of the most important: the Strait of Hormuz, the 20-mile-wide bottleneck in the Persian Gulf through which roughly 40% of the world's oil needs to pass each day. Coupled with the CNO's request for a blockade review, a deployment of minesweepers to the west coast of Iran would seem to suggest that a much discussed--but until now largely theoretical--prospect has become real: that the U.S. may be preparing for war with Iran.

No one knows whether--let alone when--a military confrontation with Tehran will come to pass. The fact that admirals are reviewing plans for blockades is hardly proof of their intentions. The U.S. military routinely makes plans for scores of scenarios, the vast majority of which will never be put into practice. "Planners always plan," says a Pentagon official. Asked about the orders, a second official said only that the Navy is stepping up its "listening and learning" in the Persian Gulf but nothing more--a prudent step, he added, after Iran tested surface-to-ship missiles there in August during a two-week military exercise. And yet from the State Department to the White House to the highest reaches of the military command, there is a growing sense that a showdown with Iran--over its suspected quest for nuclear weapons, its threats against Israel and its bid for dominance of the world's richest oil region--may be impossible to avoid. The chief of the U.S. Central Command (Centcom), General John Abizaid, has called a commanders conference for later this month in the Persian Gulf--sessions he holds at least quarterly--and Iran is on the agenda.

On its face, of course, the notion of a war with Iran seems absurd. By any rational measure, the last thing the U.S. can afford is another war. Two unfinished wars--one on Iran's eastern border, the other on its western flank--are daily depleting America's treasury and overworked armed forces. Most of Washington's allies in those adventures have made it clear they will not join another gamble overseas. What's more, the Bush team, led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, has done more diplomatic spadework on Iran than on any other project in its 51/2 years in office. For more than 18 months, Rice has kept the Administration's hard-line faction at bay while leading a coalition that includes four other members of the U.N. Security Council and is trying to force Tehran to halt its suspicious nuclear ambitions. Even Iran's former President, Mohammed Khatami, was in Washington this month calling for a "dialogue" between the two nations.

But superpowers don't always get to choose their enemies or the timing of their confrontations. The fact that all sides would risk losing so much in armed conflict doesn't mean they won't stumble into one anyway. And for all the good arguments against any war now, much less this one, there are just as many indications that a genuine, eyeball-to-eyeball crisis between the U.S. and Iran may be looming, and sooner than many realize. "At the moment," says Ali Ansari, a top Iran authority at London's Chatham House, a foreign-policy think tank, "we are headed for conflict."

So what would it look like? Interviews with dozens of experts and government officials in Washington, Tehran and elsewhere in the Middle East paint a sobering picture: military action against Iran's nuclear facilities would have a decent chance of succeeding, but at a staggering cost. And therein lies the excruciating calculus facing the U.S. and its allies: Is the cost of confronting Iran greater than the dangers of living with a nuclear Iran? And can anything short of war persuade Tehran's fundamentalist regime to give up its dangerous game?

ROAD TO WAR

The crisis with Iran has been years in the making. Over the past decade, Iran has acquired many of the pieces, parts and plants needed to make a nuclear device. Although Iranian officials insist that Iran's ambitions are limited to nuclear energy, the regime has asserted its right to develop nuclear power and enrich uranium that could be used in bombs as an end in itself--a symbol of sovereign pride, not to mention a useful prop for politicking. Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has crisscrossed the country in recent months making Iran's right to a nuclear program a national cause and trying to solidify his base of hard-line support in the Revolutionary Guards. The nuclear program is popular with average Iranians and the élites as well. "Iranian leaders have this sense of past glory, this belief that Iran should play a lofty role in the world," says Nasser Hadian, professor of political science at Tehran University.

But the nuclear program isn't Washington's only worry about Iran. While stoking nationalism at home, Tehran has dramatically consolidated its reach in the region. Since the 1979 Islamic revolution, Iran has sponsored terrorist groups in a handful of countries, but its backing of Hizballah, the militant group that took Lebanon to war with Israel this summer, seems to be changing the Middle East balance of power. There is circumstantial evidence that Iran ordered Hizballah to provoke this summer's war, in part to demonstrate that Tehran can stir up big trouble if pushed to the brink. The precise extent of coordination between Hizballah and Tehran is unknown. But no longer in dispute after the standoff in July is Iran's ability to project power right up to the borders of Israel. It is no coincidence that the talk in Washington about what to do with Iran became more focused after Hizballah fought the Israeli army to a virtual standstill this summer.

And yet the West has been unable to compel Iran to comply with its demands. Despite all the work Rice has put into her coalition, diplomatic efforts are moving too slowly, some believe, to stop the Iranians before they acquire the makings of a nuclear device. And Iran has played its hand shrewdly so far. Tehran took weeks to reply to a formal proposal from the U.N. Security Council calling on a halt to uranium enrichment. When it did, its official response was a mosaic of half-steps, conditions and boilerplate that suggested Tehran has little intention of backing down. "The Iranians," says a Western diplomat in Washington, "are very able negotiators."

That doesn't make war inevitable. But at some point the U.S. and its allies may have to confront the ultimate choice. The Bush Administration has said it won't tolerate Iran having a nuclear weapon. Once it does, the regime will have the capacity to carry out Ahmadinejad's threats to eliminate Israel. And in practical terms, the U.S. would have to consider military action long before Iran had an actual bomb. In military circles, there is a debate about where--and when--to draw that line. U.S. intelligence chief John Negroponte told TIME in April that Iran is five years away from having a nuclear weapon. But some nonproliferation experts worry about a different moment: when Iran is able to enrich enough uranium to fuel a bomb--a point that comes well before engineers actually assemble a nuclear device. Many believe that is when a country becomes a nuclear power. That red line, experts say, could be just a year away.

WOULD AN ATTACK WORK?

The answer is yes and no.

No one is talking about a ground invasion of Iran. Too many U.S. troops are tied down elsewhere to make it possible, and besides, it isn't necessary. If the U.S. goal is simply to stunt Iran's nuclear program, it can be done better and more safely by air. An attack limited to Iran's nuclear facilities would nonetheless require a massive campaign. Experts say that Iran has between 18 and 30 nuclear-related facilities. The sites are dispersed around the country--some in the open, some cloaked in the guise of conventional factories, some buried deep underground.

A Pentagon official says that among the known sites there are 1,500 different "aim points," which means the campaign could well require the involvement of almost every type of aircraft in the U.S. arsenal: Stealth bombers and fighters, B-1s and B-2s, as well as F-15s and F-16s operating from land and F-18s from aircraft carriers.

GPS-guided munitions and laser-targeted bombs--sighted by satellite, spotter aircraft and unmanned vehicles--would do most of the bunker busting. But because many of the targets are hardened under several feet of reinforced concrete, most would have to be hit over and over to ensure that they were destroyed or sufficiently damaged. The U.S. would have to mount the usual aerial ballet, refueling tankers as well as search-and-rescue helicopters in case pilots were shot down by Iran's aging but possibly still effective air defenses. U.S. submarines and ships could launch cruise missiles as well, but their warheads are generally too small to do much damage to reinforced concrete--and might be used for secondary targets. An operation of that size would hardly be surgical. Many sites are in highly populated areas, so civilian casualties would be a certainty.

Whatever the order of battle, a U.S. strike would have a lasting impression on Iran's rulers. U.S. officials believe that a campaign of several days, involving hundreds or even thousands of sorties, could set back Iran's nuclear program by two to three years. Hit hard enough, some believe, Iranians might develop second thoughts about their government's designs as a regional nuclear power. Some U.S. foes of Iran's regime believe that the crisis of legitimacy that the ruling clerics would face in the wake of a U.S. attack could trigger their downfall, although others are convinced it would unite the population with the government in anti-American rage.

But it is also likely that the U.S. could carry out a massive attack and still leave Iran with some part of its nuclear program intact. It's possible that U.S. warplanes could destroy every known nuclear site--while Tehran's nuclear wizards, operating at other, undiscovered sites even deeper underground, continued their work. "We don't know where it all is," said a White House official, "so we can't get it all."

WHAT WOULD COME NEXT?

No one who has spent any time thinking about an attack on Iran doubts that a U.S. operation would reap a whirlwind. The only mystery is what kind. "It's not a question of whether we can do a strike or not and whether the strike could be effective," says retired Marine General Anthony Zinni. "It certainly would be, to some degree. But are you prepared for all that follows?"

Retired Air Force Colonel Sam Gardiner, who taught strategy at the National War College, has been conducting a mock U.S.-Iran war game for American policymakers for the past five years. Virtually every time he runs the game, Gardiner says, a similar nightmare scenario unfolds: the U.S. attack, no matter how successful, spawns a variety of asymmetrical retaliations by Tehran. First comes terrorism: Iran's initial reaction to air strikes might be to authorize a Hizballah attack on Israel, in order to draw Israel into the war and rally public support at home.

Next, Iran might try to foment as much mayhem as possible inside the two nations on its flanks, Afghanistan and Iraq, where more than 160,000 U.S. troops hold a tenuous grip on local populations. Iran has already dabbled in partnership with warlords in western Afghanistan, where U.S. military authority has never been strong; it would be a small step to lend aid to Taliban forces gaining strength in the south. Meanwhile, Tehran has links to the main factions in Iraq, which would welcome a boost in money and weapons, if just to strengthen their hand against rivals. Analysts generally believe that Iran could in a short time orchestrate a dramatic increase in the number and severity of attacks on U.S. troops in Iraq. As Syed Ayad, a secular Shi'ite cleric and Iraqi Member of Parliament says, "America owns the sky of Iraq with their Apaches, but Iran owns the ground."

Next, there is oil. The Persian Gulf, a traffic jam on good days, would become a parking lot. Iran could plant mines and launch dozens of armed boats into the bottleneck, choking off the shipping lanes in the Strait of Hormuz and causing a massive disruption of oil-tanker traffic. A low-key Iranian mining operation in 1987 forced the U.S. to reflag Kuwaiti oil tankers and escort them, in slow-moving files of one and two, up and down the Persian Gulf. A more intense operation would probably send oil prices soaring above $100 per bbl.--which may explain why the Navy wants to be sure its small fleet of minesweepers is ready to go into action at a moment's notice. It is unlikely that Iran would turn off its own oil spigot or halt its exports through pipelines overland, but it could direct its proxies in Iraq and Saudi Arabia to attack pipelines, wells and shipment points inside those countries, further choking supply and driving up prices.

That kind of retaliation could quickly transform a relatively limited U.S. mission in Iran into a much more complicated one involving regime change. An Iran determined to use all its available weapons to counterattack the U.S. and its allies would present a challenge to American prestige that no Commander in Chief would be likely to tolerate for long. Zinni, for one, believes an attack on Iran could eventually lead to U.S. troops on the ground. "You've got to be careful with your assumptions," he says. "In Iraq, the assumption was that it would be a liberation, not an occupation. You've got to be prepared for the worst case, and the worst case involving Iran takes you down to boots on the ground." All that, he says, makes an attack on Iran a "dumb idea." Abizaid, the current Centcom boss, chose his words carefully last May. "Look, any war with a country that is as big as Iran, that has a terrorist capability along its borders, that has a missile capability that is external to its own borders and that has the ability to affect the world's oil markets is something that everyone needs to contemplate with a great degree of clarity."

CAN IT BE STOPPED?

Given the chaos that a war might unleash, what options does the world have to avoid it? One approach would be for the U.S. to accept Iran as a nuclear power and learn to live with an Iranian bomb, focusing its efforts on deterrence rather than pre-emption. The risk is that a nuclear-armed Iran would use its regional primacy to become the dominant foreign power in Iraq, threaten Israel and make it harder for Washington to exert its will in the region. And it could provoke Sunni countries in the region, like Saudi Arabia and Egypt, to start nuclear programs of their own to contain rising Shi'ite power.

Those equally unappetizing prospects--war or a new arms race in the Middle East--explain why the White House is kicking up its efforts to resolve the Iran problem before it gets that far. Washington is doing everything it can to make Iran think twice about its ongoing game of stonewall. It is a measure of the Administration's unity on Iran that confrontationalists like Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld have lately not wandered off the rhetorical reservation. Everyone has been careful--for now--to stick to Rice's diplomatic emphasis. "Nobody is considering a military option at this point," says an Administration official. "We're trying to prevent a situation in which the President finds himself having to decide between a nuclear-armed Iran or going to war. The best hope of avoiding that dilemma is hard-nosed diplomacy, one that has serious consequences."

Rice continues to try for that. This week in New York City, she will push her partners to get behind a new sanctions resolution that would ban Iranian imports of dual-use technologies, like parts for its centrifuge cascades for uranium enrichment, and bar travel overseas by certain government officials. The next step would be restrictions on government purchases of computer software and hardware, office supplies, tires and auto parts--steps Russia and China have signaled some reluctance to endorse. But even Rice's advisers don't believe that Iran can be persuaded to completely abandon its ambitions. Instead, they hope to tie Iran up in a series of suspensions, delays and negotiations until a more pragmatic faction of leadership in Tehran gains the upper hand.

At the moment, that sounds as much like a prayer as a strategy. A former CIA director, asked not long ago whether a moderate faction will ever emerge in Tehran, quipped, "I don't think I've ever met an Iranian moderate--not at the top of the government, anyway." But if sanctions don't work, what might? Outside the Administration, a growing group of foreign-policy hands from both parties have called on the U.S. to bring Tehran into direct negotiations in the hope of striking a grand bargain. Under that formula, the U.S. might offer Iran some security guarantees-- such as forswearing efforts to topple Iran's theocratic regime--in exchange for Iran's agreeing to open its facilities to international inspectors and abandon weapons-related projects. It would be painful for any U.S. Administration to recognize the legitimacy of a regime that sponsors terrorism and calls for Israel's destruction--but the time may come when that's the only bargaining chip short of war the U.S. has left. And still that may not be enough. "[The Iranians] would give up nuclear power if they truly believed the U.S. would accept Iran as it is," says a university professor in Tehran who asked not to be identified. "But the mistrust runs too deep for them to believe that is possible."

Such distrust runs both ways and is getting deeper. Unless the U.S., its allies and Iran can find a way to make diplomacy work, the whispers of blockades and minesweepers in the Persian Gulf may soon be drowned out by the cries of war. And if the U.S. has learned anything over the past five years, it's that war in the Middle East rarely goes according to plan.

How Close Is Iran To Having Nuclear Weapons? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, September 18, 2006

American intel agencies appear to be pushing back against conservatives who claim that their judgments about Iran's nuclear program are not hair-raising enough. In a development that reminded some experts of the fights over prewar Iraq intel, hard-liners on the House intelligence committee last month produced a report declaring the U.S. intel community "needs to improve its analysis and collection" on Iran's WMD programs. A caption in the report even claimed that "Iran is currently enriching uranium to weapons grade."

Last week, however, the House committee assessment was slammed by U.N. nuclear experts, who pointed out that there's little evidence Iran is anywhere near producing weapons-grade uranium. And three U.S. officials familiar with recent intel reporting on Iran, who asked for anonymity due to the sensitive subject matter, said that U.S. agencies have not altered assessments that Iran is years away from producing a nuclear bomb. As two of the officials acknowledge, recent intel reporting indicates that if anything, technical problems are slowing down Iran's nuclear program. David Albright, a former U.N. WMD inspector and independent expert, told NEWSWEEK: "Iran's gas-centrifuge program is moving unexpectedly slowly. The program was expected to be much further along by this point." Albright says this assessment is supported by data produced by U.N. investigators; one of the government officials says that because U.N. inspectors still have some access to Iranian nuke facilities, their reporting is at least as good as info being produced by clandestine U.S. spies. Another of the U.S. officials said intel reports show Iran was experiencing significant problems with gyroscopes it has been trying to install on missiles that could deliver Iranian bombs to targets in the region and even further.

Officials in National Intelligence Director John Negroponte's office have told journalists that U.S. intel believes Iran will not be able to produce a nuke until about 2010 at the earliest, and perhaps not until 2015. A spokesman for Negroponte's office says intel agencies are now working on a new National Intelligence Estimate—a classified report laying out the consensus view of all agencies—about Iran's nuclear effort; the spokesman said that for the moment, the agencies' Iran nuke timeline was unchanged, "but we're researching it."

"We Do Not Need Attacks" (TIME)

By Scott Macleod

Time, September 18, 2006

TIME: What were your impressions of New York during your visit to the U.S. last year?

Ahmadinejad: Unfortunately we didn't have any contact with the people of the United States. We were not in touch with the people. But my general impression is that the people of the United States are good people. Everywhere in the world, people are good.

TIME: Did you visit the site of the World Trade Center?

Ahmadinejad: It was not necessary. It was widely covered in the media.

TIME: You recently invited President Bush to a televised debate. If he were sitting where I am sitting, what would you say, man to man?

Ahmadinejad: The issues which are of interest to us are the international issues and how to manage them. I gave some recommendations to President Bush in my personal letter, and I hope that he will take note of them. I would ask him, Are rationalism, spirituality and humanitarianism and logic—are they bad things for human beings? Why more conflict? Why should we go for hostilities? Why should we develop weapons of mass destruction? Everybody can love one another.

TIME: Do you feel any connection with President Bush, since he is also a religious man, a strong Christian?

Ahmadinejad: I've heard about that. But there are many things which take place and are inconsistent with the teachings of Jesus Christ in this world.

TIME: Why do your supporters chant "Death to America"?

Ahmadinejad: When they chanted that slogan, it means they hate aggression, and they hate bullying tactics, and they hate violations of the rights of nations and discrimination. I recommended to President Bush that he can change his behavior, then everything will change.

TIME: How do you think the American people feel when they hear Iranians shouting "Death to America" and the President of Iran does not criticize this?

Ahmadinejad: The nations do not have any problems. What is the role of the American people in what is happening in the world? The people of the United States are also seeking peace, love, friendship and justice.

TIME: But if Americans shouted "Death to Iran," Iranians would feel insulted.

Ahmadinejad: If the government of Iran acted in such a way, then [the American people] have this right.

TIME: Are America and Iran fated to be in conflict?

Ahmadinejad: No, this is not fate. And this can come to an end. I have said we can run the world through logic. We are living our own lives. The U.S. government should not interfere in our affairs. They should live their own lives. They should serve the interests of the U.S. people. They should not interfere in our affairs. Then there would be no problems with that.

TIME: Are you ready to open direct negotiations with the U.S.?

DOJ_NMG_0064064

Ahmadinejad: We have given them a letter, a lengthy letter. We say the U.S. Administration should change its behavior, and then everything will be solved. It was the U.S. which broke up relations with us. We didn't take that position. And then they should make up for it.

TIME: Does Iran have the right to nuclear weapons?

Ahmadinejad: We are opposed to nuclear weapons. We think it has been developed just to kill human beings. It is not in the service of human beings. For that reason, last year in my address to the U.N. General Assembly, I suggested that a committee should be set up in order to disarm all the countries that possess nuclear weapons.

TIME: But you were attacked with weapons of mass destruction by Iraq. You say the u.s. threatens you, and you are surrounded by countries that have nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad: Today nuclear weapons are a blunt instrument. We don't have any problems with Pakistan or India. Actually they are friends of Iran, and throughout history they have been friends. The Zionist regime is not capable of using nuclear weapons. Problems cannot be solved through bombs. Bombs are of little use today. We need logic.

TIME: Why won't you agree to suspend enrichment of uranium as a confidence-building measure?

Ahmadinejad: Whose confidence should be built?

TIME: The world's?

Ahmadinejad: The world? The world? Who is the world? The United States? The U.S. Administration is not the entire world. Europe does not account for one-twentieth of the entire world. When I studied the provisions of the npt [Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty], nowhere did I see it written that in order to produce nuclear fuel, we need to win the support or the confidence of the United States and some European countries.

TIME: How far will Iran go in defying Western demands? Will you wait until you are attacked and your nuclear installations are destroyed?

Ahmadinejad: Do you think the u.s. administration would be so irrational?

TIME: You tell me.

Ahmadinejad: I hope that is not the case. I said that we need logic. We do not need attacks.

TIME: Are you worried about an attack?

Ahmadinejad: No.

TIME: You have been quoted as saying Israel should be wiped off the map. Was that merely rhetoric, or do you mean it?

Ahmadinejad: People in the world are free to think the way they wish. We do not insist they should change their views. Our position toward the Palestinian question is clear: we say that a nation has been displaced from its own land. Palestinian people are killed in their own lands, by those who are not original inhabitants, and they have come from far areas of the world and have occupied those homes. Our suggestion is that the 5 million Palestinian refugees come back to their homes, and then the entire people on those lands hold a referendum and choose their own system of government. This is a democratic and popular way. Do you have any other suggestions?

TIME: Do you believe the Jewish people have a right to their own state?

Ahmadinejad: We do not oppose it. In any country in which the people are ready to vote for the Jews to come to power, it is up to them. In our country, the Jews are living and they are represented in our Parliament. But Zionists are different from Jews.

TIME: Have you considered that Iranian Jews are hurt by your comments denying that 6 million Jews were killed in the Holocaust?

Ahmadinejad: As to the Holocaust, I just raised a few questions. And I didn't receive any answers to my questions. I said that during World War II, around 60 million were killed. All were human beings and had their own dignities. Why only 6 million? And if it had happened, then it is a historical event. Then why do they not allow independent research?

TIME: But massive research has been done.

Ahmadinejad: They put in prison those who try to do research. About historical events everybody should be free to conduct research. Let's assume that it has taken place. Where did it take place? So what is the fault of the Palestinian people? These questions are quite clear. We are waiting for answers.

Bush, Ahmadinejad To Wage War Of Words At U.N. (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, September 18, 2006

President Bush and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad deliver dueling speeches at the United Nations this week in what could become a dramatic showdown over Iran's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0064065

Bush has pledged to use his U.N. talk to send Iran a clear warning that it must heed a U.N. Security Council resolution calling on it to suspend its program to make nuclear fuel. Iran says its program is for peaceful purposes, while Bush says Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons.

"Part of my objective in New York is to remind people that stalling shouldn't be allowed," Bush said Friday. "We are firmly committed in our desire to send a common signal to the Iranian regime."

The two leaders are scheduled to speak hours apart Tuesday at the annual meeting of heads of state of the General Assembly.

Ahmadinejad challenged Bush to a debate last month. The White House rejected it as a publicity stunt and diversion from dealing with the nuclear issue. Their speeches may be the closest the two come to a debate.

Iran has emerged as a leading target in Bush's war on terrorism because of its nuclear program and support for militant groups, including Hezbollah in Lebanon.

The United States wants the U.N. Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran because it refused to meet an Aug. 31 council deadline to halt uranium enrichment.

About 70 world leaders will address the General Assembly this week, but the focus will be on Bush and Ahmadinejad.

Bush said his U.N. speech will serve as a warning to Iran that "if they try to drag their feet or, you know, get us to look the other way, that we won't do that."

What Ahmadinejad might say is harder to predict. In the past year he has risen from a little-known Iranian hard-liner to one of Bush's chief antagonists.

Last year, in his debut on the diplomatic scene, Ahmadinejad stunned the General Assembly with a speech assailing the United States and calling for the return of the Twelfth Imam, a revered Shiite Muslim figure whose coming is akin to Judgment Day.

He later told an Iranian cleric that he felt an "aura" of holiness surrounding him during the speech and claimed that the audience sat rapt for half an hour "as if a hand held them there (and) made them sit."

It's also possible Ahmadinejad could use his address this week to make a conciliatory gesture. Last week in Senegal, he said Iran is "ready for new conditions" on the nuclear issue. He did not give details.

The Iranian president is scheduled to arrive in New York City today following a visit with Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, another Bush antagonist.

Ahmadinejad is subordinate to Iran's supreme religious leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, but his stature and notoriety have grown in the past year. He has denied that the Holocaust happened, threatened Israel and asserted Iran's right to pursue its nuclear program.

Malcolm Hoenlein, vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, said thousands will attend a rally across from the U.N. on Wednesday to "reject his hatred and his threats to the United States and Israel."

"He's far more powerful than we anticipated when he was elected," said Karim Sadjadpour, an Iran expert at the International Crisis Group, a Brussels-based organization. "Everyone assumed he would focus on the domestic economy and defer to his elders on foreign policy."

Events in the region have strengthened Iranian hard-liners in the past year. A pro-Iranian Shiite government came to power in Iraq; an Iranian-backed Palestinian faction, Hamas, won parliamentary elections; and Iran's Lebanese proxy, Hezbollah, withstood a month of Israeli attacks. The United States considers Hezbollah a terrorist group.

At home, Ahmadinejad has bolstered his position by appointing fellow veterans of the hard-line Revolutionary Guard as provincial governors and Cabinet ministers. The regime has become increasingly repressive, arresting professors and closing newspapers.

Last week, the government shut a moderate newspaper, Shargh, after it published a cartoon portraying a donkey facing a knight on a chessboard. The donkey had a halo of light around it, an apparent reference to Ahmadinejad's remark about the "aura" he felt around him at the U.N.

Bush To UN: An Agenda For Freedom (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, September 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.

When President Bush speaks to the United Nations General Assembly here this week, he will studiously avoid Iran's President Mahmoud Amadinejad.

And Mr. Bush probably won't take up the controversial leader's challenge to the American president to face him in a "civilizational debate."

DOJ_NMG_0064066

But Bush does plan to lay out his vision for the world, including an elaboration of his "freedom agenda" and the role of democracy in building global security, when he addresses the 192-country assembly Tuesday.

In that sense, the global airing and weighing of two distinct visions is already on. The president "will stress the United States' commitment to a broad international agenda that recognizes the connection between freedom, democracy, prosperity, counterterrorism, and security," according to the White House.

Focusing on the Middle East as "the main battle ground" in the struggle for freedom, according to a senior administration official, Bush will outline two tasks the international community must take on in the region: "to help people who don't have freedom achieve this," the official says, "and to help people with weak but democratically elected governments strengthen their institutions."

From his corner, Mr. Ahmadinejad - who has been busy lambasting the West and primarily the US and Britain as the major sources of the world's ills, while arguing for the rise of new world powers - will also no doubt offer his own perspectives during his stay in New York.

One question is whether the US, as the sole superpower and in particular as the leader of the widely unpopular war in Iraq, can even get a fair hearing in the world today.

"The fact is this debate has already started, and there is no way either side can think people out there - and I mean all around the world - aren't listening," says Michael Doyle, a former senior United Nations official now at Columbia University in New York. "Without it being face to face, [Bush] should take on some of the challenges that Ahmadinejad has posed to America and the West, like human rights as part of the global agenda, or the tension between sovereign rights and multilateral principles."

The US has not done enough to take the case for free and democratic societies to the world under the Bush administration, Mr. Doyle says, although he does see some greater effort in the president's second term.

The White House appears to agree that the US is already in this ideological debate, if not with Ahmadinejad himself, then with what it sees as the antidemocratic and extremist forces holding the region back.

"The president will lay out ... the bright democratic future we see" for the Middle East "in contradistinction to some who have an almost backward-looking vision for the region," says the senior administration official, who spoke on condition he would remain unnamed.

But will other world leaders be receptive to his message? A survey released by the German Marshall Fund earlier this month showed US esteem falling. It asked Europeans if the US should exert strong leadership in the world. Five years ago, 64 percent of those surveyed said, 'Yes." Today, that figure is 37 percent. At the same time, Bush will stride into the UN General Assembly hall a weakened and challenged president at home.

The current controversy in the US over the conduct of the war on terror, and treatment of detainees accused of terrorism, is a case in point. Bush wants to convince the world of the need to combat terrorism, but a growing list of prominent personalities in and out of government say his credibility on these issues is undermined if America is seen to be violating its own principles and riding roughshod on the world for its own security. And that could mean long-lasting consequences, they add, such as key countries' flagging willingness to cooperate with the US.

Bush's former secretary of state, Colin Powell, encapsulated that concern in a letter addressed to Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, in which he says the US could pay a high cost if an administration proposal to redefine the application of certain principles of the Geneva Conventions is adopted.

In the letter, which was the talk of Washington over the weekend, Mr. Powell says, "The world is beginning to doubt the moral basis of our fight against terrorism," adding that it would also endanger US troops captured by our enemies. Aides say Mr. McCain says the proposal violates "our [American] values."

That controversy erupted amid other signs that the US position in the world is politically weakened - in particular by the war in Iraq. "Iraq has become the shorthand summary of American foreign policy, and until that changes, it will be hard for the president or anyone to resonate much with the world," says James McCormick, a professor of US foreign policy at Ohio State University in Ames.

At a press conference here last week, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan said the leaders he visited during a recent tour of the Middle East were torn over whether the US should stay in Iraq or plan to leave. But as for the consequences of the US invasion, Mr. Annan said he encountered no similar ambivalence in the region. "Most of the leaders felt that the invasion of Iraq and its aftermath have been a real disaster for them," Annan said. "They believe it has destabilized the region."

Ohio's Mr. McCormick says that "a broader agenda," clearly parting ways with the administration's trademark unilateralist approach to foreign policy, could begin to open international ports to US initiatives - and Bush's vision.

And administration officials say that is just what will happen. During Bush's visit to the UN, he will spotlight certain countries - Malaysia, for example, as a successful melding of Islam and democracy, and El Salvador, as once torn by death squads and an insurgency but now a functioning democracy that's contributing to global peacekeeping efforts.

Bush will also host a meeting of leaders from democratic states and civil society organizations involved in building institutions in weak democracies.

Europeans Trying To Grease Wheels For U.S. Talks With Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

NEW YORK, Sept. 17 -- European efforts to get Iran and the United States around the same negotiating table are at an advanced yet sensitive stage, with a small number of remaining differences to be tackled this week when world leaders gather at the United Nations, according to several American, Iranian and European officials involved.

President Bush plans to make Iran a centerpiece of his speech Tuesday before the U.N. General Assembly, explaining to the annual meeting of presidents and prime ministers why he regards the Tehran government as a grave threat yet is willing to support negotiations to ease those concerns.

For four years, Bush has sought, without success, to roll back an Iranian nuclear energy program that perhaps could be diverted for bombmaking. While many of his allies share suspicions of a secret Iranian effort, they have also been wary of supporting a U.S. president who has invaded two countries in the past five years and who has said that "all options are on the table" for Iran.

At last year's U.N. gathering, Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spent several days trying to persuade key allies to move the Iran issue into the U.N. Security Council, where the United States has more leverage to press for sanctions. They were unsuccessful then, but six months later, after additional diplomacy and poor cooperation from Iran, the issue was put on the council's agenda. Now, the president and his top diplomat will meet with allies again -- this time to discuss prospects for talks as well as options if those do not materialize.

"We want this to happen, we want negotiations," a senior administration official said Sunday on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue. "But we're not there yet."

Rice dined here Sunday evening with Javier Solana, the senior European Union official who has been trying to broker talks between Tehran and the Bush administration. Solana will meet with Iran's nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, later in the week.

Officials who have been briefed on Solana's efforts said he is waiting for Larijani to deliver a firm commitment from his government to halt its uranium enrichment program. Larijani has suggested a temporary suspension, but it is unclear whether he can get Iran's various political factions to agree to that approach. If a deal is reached, U.S. diplomats will join group talks with European powers, Russia, China and Iran to discuss Tehran's energy needs and the future of its nuclear program.

Several administration officials expressed skepticism, however, that Larijani would be able to secure that commitment. They said the administration has not made preparations for talks, such as formalizing a negotiating team or outlining guiding principles for discussion. If Iran fails to put its nuclear program on ice, even temporarily, the administration will continue to lobby allies to impose economic sanctions.

"I have made it clear to the Iranian regime that we will sit down with the Iranians once they verifiably suspend their enrichment program," Bush said at a news conference Thursday. But, he said, "they need to understand we're firm in our commitment and that if they try to drag their feet or, you know, get us to look the other way, then we won't do that."

Iranian officials are seeking assurances of their own.

Through Solana and other mediators, they have said it would be hard for them to sit down with a U.S. administration that is seen as threatening the Iranian leadership. Two Bush administration officials and several European negotiators said the security issue has been a major sticking point for Iran but that efforts to resolve it are serious.

"Sitting down with Washington at the same table," said one European diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity, "is the best guarantee. Both sides sitting down together is extraordinary in itself."

Officials noted that Bush refrained last week from characterizing Iran as a "grave threat," as he did last month. But he ruled out the possibility of a meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmedinejad. The Iranian leader is scheduled to address the United Nations on Tuesday, hours after Bush.

Tuesday evening, Rice will dine with the foreign ministers of France, Britain, Germany, Russia, China and Italy to discuss Iran.

France, Britain and Germany have committed to push for sanctions against Iran if it does not halt its uranium enrichment program, but the Europeans are also eager to find a route to negotiations and have been holding low-level talks with the Iranians for months.

In an effort to avoid a standoff over whether the United States or Iran will make the next move toward talks, diplomats said it is possible that European foreign ministers will meet with Larijani during the week in New York, effectively kicking off negotiations, followed by an Iranian suspension of its nuclear program and then U.S. participation.

DOJ_NMG_0064068

Other E.U. members have strongly supported talks, rather than punitive measures, noting that Iran's technical progress on its nuclear program has been marginal, while its position as a major oil exporter gives Tehran significant leverage to batter their economies.

Russia, China, Japan, India and Italy -- influential countries with billions of dollars of investments in Iran's oil and gas industry -- have been particularly reluctant to back sanctions.

But all parties, including Russia and China -- two of Iran's closest economic partners -- have publicly said that Tehran must suspend its nuclear program for talks to begin.

Iran quit negotiations with the Europeans a year ago and restarted a uranium program that it insists is designed to produce only nuclear energy. In an effort to coax Iran back to the negotiating table, Rice announced in May that the United States will participate in resumed talks if Iran again suspends uranium enrichment.

Iran's nuclear program began in 1987 in secret and is under investigation by U.N. nuclear inspectors with the International Atomic Energy Agency. Inspectors have not found proof of a weapons program but have said they are unable -- mostly because of a lack of Iranian cooperation -- to confirm that the program is exclusively peaceful.

Iran this year produced trace amounts of low-enriched uranium, suitable only for an energy program, and has said it has no intention of producing highly enriched uranium. U.S. intelligence estimates report that Iran is as much as a decade away from being able to produce the amount and quality of highly enriched uranium that could be used for a nuclear weapon.

US Urges Allies To Increase Pressure On Iran (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Chris Giles And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

The US is seeking to increase economic pressure on Iran, even as its partners in the European Union talk to the Islamic Republic about beginning formal negotiations on Tehran's nuclear programme.

Hank Paulson, the new US Treasury secretary, is personally lobbying finance ministers and central bank governors to ensure their national financial systems are not used by Iranian entities involved in proliferation or terrorism finance.

But his efforts have irritated some European officials, who have objected to what they see as Washington's moves to impose sanctions on Iran through the back door.

The EU has joined with the US in threatening sanctions against Tehran unless it scales down its nuclear programme. But the bloc is also conducting a diplomatic push to open negotiations as an alternative to sanctions – which, in any case, face serious obstacles at the UN.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and World Bank in Singapore, Mr Paulson said Iran abused the global financial system to "procure technology that is going to aid in the production of weapons of mass destruction" and is "actively invol-ved in financing terrorists".

He added that the US had evidence that "blue chip banks" as well as other financial institutions were being used by an Iranian network of "more than 30 front companies".

The US has dispatched Treasury officials around the world to share declassified intelligence with foreign regulators on Iran's alleged abuse of the global financial system and to warn banks against becoming inadvertently involved.

The US Treasury secretary said the campaign was "nothing more than an educational briefing".

But EU officials refused to add any specific reference to Iran in a group of seven leading economies communiqué on Saturday, indicating instead that the US should name the front companies so that action could be taken.

Iran denies having or making weapons of mass des-truction. In addition, the EU also does not classify Hizbollah, the Islamist group allied to Tehran, as a terrorist organisation.

Joaquín Almunia, the Europan economic and monetary affairs commissioner, said: "As far as I know the Iran war was not on the G7 communiqué."

Any moves towards imposing UN sanctions on Iran are complicated by resistance from Russia and China, which have economic ties to Tehran and reiterated their reservations at the weekend.

Against such a backdrop, the US has sought to bring together a "coalition of concerned countries" to impose financial restrictions on Iran. Since the key players in such a coalition would be the EU and Japan, the natural forum is the G7.

But at present, the EU is in talks with Tehran over a possible deal on the nuclear file, in which Iran would suspend uranium enrichment at the same time as formal negotiations began.

Javier Solana, EU foreign policy chief, is due to meet Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear security official, this week in New York. If that goes well, a foreign ministers meeting could be held to begin formal negotiations. This would involve Iran, the EU, Russia and China – but not the US.

Chirac Urges World To Keep Iran Talking (DLYTEL)

By From Correspondents In Paris

Daily Telegraph, September 18, 2006

FRENCH President Jacques Chirac has urged world powers not to refer Iran to the UN Security Council over its nuclear program, at the same time calling on Tehran to give up uranium enrichment.

"First we have to find an agenda for negotiation, then engage the negotiation and during that negotiation I propose that on the one hand the six refrain from referring the issue to the Security Council and that Iran renounce during the negotiation the enrichment of uranium," he said.

The six nations running talks with Tehran are the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany.

It was the first time a European leader has clearly stated that the suspension of uranium enrichment is not a "precondition" for opening talks on the nuclear dossier.

Mr Chirac indicated that the suspension should come during rather than before negotiations.

"We can find solutions via dialogue," said Mr Chirac, who heads later to New York for the UN's General Assembly.

Iran's nuclear program will be at the centre of discussions on the sidelines of the assembly, with the aim of obtaining an end to uranium enrichment or failing that a consensus on possible sanctions.

Mr Chirac said that he was "never a supporter of sanctions" and had "never noticed that sanctions are effective".

However he added that he "did not mean that we must not have sanctions - which if it comes to it must be moderate and well-adapted".

The US is preparing a list of possible sanctions - such as travel bans and economic measures - to take if Iran refuses to suspend enrichment of uranium.

However Beijing and Moscow are reluctant to follow the sanctions path.

Asked about the attitude of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Mr Chirac said he "condemned in the clearest possible way the Iranian President's systematically anti-Israeli remarks".

On a possible meeting with Mr Ahmadinejad, Mr Chirac said that "nothing is planned" and "the conditions are not in place for a personal dialogue, given the Iranian President's comments concerning a country in the region".

World powers suspect Iran of trying to develop a nuclear weapon, though Tehran insists its program is for purely civilian use.

President Relenting On Value Of U.N. (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

President Bush, who once said the United Nations was teetering on the brink of irrelevancy and demanded it show some backbone, has increasingly turned to the organization for international problem-solving, even as most Americans think the body has outlived its usefulness.

On issues from North Korea to Iran to Sudan, the president, who arrives in New York today to attend the U.N. General Assembly's annual meeting, has deferred to the United Nations to drive action. Critics say Mr. Bush has been forced to become more multilateral after bucking the world body by invading Iraq, but administration officials assert that the United Nations remains a useful tool to spur foreign leaders to step in on major issues.

"This business about 'Our relationship is so bad' and 'We can't get anything done,' when you look at it, we actually have a fairly smart record of achievement," one senior administration official told The Washington Times last week. "We've gotten resolutions on some pretty serious issues where nobody thought we could get them."

But it remains the enforcement of those resolutions that so frustrated Mr. Bush in 2002, when the U.S. led a coalition of nations to oust Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein. Four years ago, he asked, "Will the United Nations serve the purpose of its founding, or will it be irrelevant?"

Mr. Bush continues to have doubts about the organization. On Friday, he said, "I think a lot of Americans are frustrated with the United Nations, to be frank with you." He cited inaction over Sudan, where genocide has left an estimated half-million people dead.

"The problem is that the United Nations hasn't acted. And so I can understand why those who are concerned about Darfur are frustrated. I am."

DOJ_NMG_0064070

He is not alone. A poll released last week shows nearly three-quarters of Americans think the United Nations is no longer effective and would support cutting U.S. contributions to it. In fact, 57 percent of those surveyed by the Hudson Institute said they agreed that "if the U.N. cannot be reformed and made more effective, it should be scrapped."

The United States will spend more than $1 billion this year on international organizations, much of it through the United Nations. Some lawmakers on Capitol Hill have sought to tie continued U.S. contributions to the implementation of reform at the world body, but the White House has fought most measures.

Still, since his assessment that the United Nations was becoming irrelevant, the president has sought to employ the body when faced with criticism that he is intent on running roughshod over world consensus. Internationally, this approach has been seen as hypocritical, as when U.N. Deputy Secretary-General Mark Malloch Brown said in June that the Bush administration is engaged in "stealth diplomacy" by working with the organization on a number of issues, but blasting it publicly.

The White House official last week sought to downplay the president's earlier criticism, saying he was merely warning the United Nations over a simple concept.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said the United Nations continues to be the model of inaction, failing to follow through on its resolutions. For example, he cited North Korea's test-firing of missiles on July 4 as proof that the body is all talk.

"The entire 'civilized world' declared in midsummer that it would be 'unacceptable' for North Korea to fire missiles," he said. "They deliberately fired seven missiles on our national holiday as a way of showing how much total contempt they had for us."

The organization has proven itself ineffectual time and again, said Mr. Gingrich, citing the corrupt Iraqi oil-for-food program, continued kleptocracy, and the decision to put the world's worst offenders on its Human Rights Council.

"I think we should be actively trying to create alternative institutions that matter," he said. "I think we should take virtually nothing to the Security Council."

Annan, Bush On 2 Sides Of Policy Divide (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, September 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush and United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan say they get along fine on a personal level. It's the issues, from the Iraq war to nuclear programs in Iran and North Korea, that divide them.

These foreign policy challenges are on the agenda this week as Bush makes his annual trek to New York City to address the U.N. General Assembly. Bush's three-day trip, starting today, includes meetings with at least nine world leaders.

He plans to discuss efforts to promote democracy in Iraq, the greater Middle East and beyond. “The civilized world must stand with moderate, reformist-minded people and help them realize their dreams,” Bush said at a news conference Friday.

Bush's remarks underscored lingering U.S.-U.N. tensions. The president said the U.N. has been slow to address growing violence in the Darfur region of the Sudan and again questioned the institution's stewardship of its finances.

“I think a lot of Americans are frustrated with the United Nations, to be frank with you,” Bush said.

Annan, at a news conference of his own last week, cited the biggest conflict of them all: Iraq. Asked about a recent visit to the Middle East, Annan said, “Most of the leaders I spoke to felt that the invasion of Iraq and its aftermath has been a real disaster for them.” Annan added, “In a way, the U.S. has found itself in the position where it cannot stay and it cannot leave.”

The secretary-general said his overall relations with the Bush administration “are very good,” including with the president himself. For his part, Bush said of Annan: “I like him. And we've got a good relationship, personal relationship.”

Bush's relationship with the U.N. as an institution, however, has been “back-and-forth,” foreign-policy analyst Stephen Schlesinger says. Through Bush's presidency, his annual speeches first commanded support for the invasion of Afghanistan in 2001 but then failed to persuade the world community to back him for the invasion of Iraq in the years following. In his second term, he has tried to move toward conciliation.

Since disagreeing on Iraq, Schlesinger said, both sides have tried to work together on Iran, Sudan, North Korean nuclear weapons, and other items likely to surface this week. “It's simply impossible to obtain your objectives without allies,” said Schlesinger, author of Act of Creation: The Founding of the United Nations.

Still, he noted that Bush's decision to name John Bolton, a fierce U.N. critic, as ambassador had riled anti-U.S. feelings at the world body.

Charles Kupchan, an international relations specialist at Georgetown University, said Bush has tried to turn around his relationship with the U.N. in recent years, but he still faces challenges. One is the approach to terrorism, which Bush and aides cast as a struggle between liberal democracy and “Islamo-fascism.”

“The rest of the world just doesn't see it that way,” he said.

DOJ_NMG_0064071

While acknowledging the opposition of some allies to the Iraq war, Bush also stresses that there are global coalitions on a variety of other fronts: helping the new democracy in Afghanistan, stopping the spread of nuclear weapons materials, and sharing financial information to help track terrorist groups.

Bush said there is general agreement within the U.N. to stop the violence in Darfur and to deny Iran the ability to make a nuclear weapon. But members are divided on whether to send a U.N. military force to Darfur, or slap economic sanctions on Iran if it continues to refuse suspension of a uranium enrichment program.

Bush is scheduled to address the General Assembly on Tuesday. The nine one-on-one meetings include Annan, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. The president will also host a roundtable on democracy with other world leaders.

Bush said Friday he's looking forward to the trip. “It's always an interesting experience for a West Texas fellow to speak to the United Nations,” he said.

Hezbollah Chief Plans 'Victory Rally' (AP)

AP, September 18, 2006

Hezbollah's leader called Sunday for a massive rally in Beirut's bombed out southern suburbs to mark the militant group's "victory" over Israel during the monthlong fighting this summer.

Sheik Hassan Nasrallah said the rally, to be held Friday evening, would show Hezbollah's "absolute commitment to our right to recover our land and prisoners and defend our nation, its dignity, freedom, sovereignty and real and full independence in the face of (Israeli) occupation."

"I call on all of you to participate in this victory rally," he said in a brief, televised speech broadcast on Hezbollah's Al-Manar TV station.

Nasrallah went into hiding on July 12, the start of the 34-day war, and has not been seen publicly since. He did not say whether he would take part personally in the rally.

He has hinted in interviews that he would appear at some point, possibly at a rally, but did not say when for security reasons.

Friday's event would mark only the second large-scale Hezbollah rally in its stronghold, the Lebanese capital's southern suburbs, since fighting ended more than a month ago.

Such rallies and parades during which Nasrallah gave fiery speeches to hundreds of thousands of supporters were common before hostilities erupted.

The fighting, triggered by Hezbollah's kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid, has given way to a political struggle between the Western-backed government and Hezbollah as Lebanese troops try to establish control over the south of the country, the Islamic militant group's stronghold.

Nasrallah said the rally would "celebrate the divine and historic victory over the Zionists — the enemies of Lebanon and the nation" and "honor and thank all those who supported the resistance" during the Israeli offensive.

Israel Forms Committee To Investigate Lebanon War (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, Sept. 17 — The Israeli government established a committee on Sunday to investigate the political and military leadership’s handling of the recent war in Lebanon, which has come under intense public criticism in the month since the fighting ended.

In Israel, which expects swift and decisive military victories, many citizens say that the military campaign in Lebanon was poorly planned and executed, and that leaders should be held accountable. Israel could not halt the rocket fire into northern Israel by the Lebanese group Hezbollah, and it has not achieved the return of two soldiers Hezbollah captured in the cross-border raid on July 12 that ignited the monthlong conflict.

The committee “will examine the political leadership and the security echelon regarding all aspects of the campaign in Lebanon,” Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet at the beginning of its weekly session.

The cabinet voted 20 to 2 for the committee, which will be led by a retired judge, Eliyahu Winograd.

However, dozens of protesters outside the prime minister’s office demanded that the investigation be carried out by a state commission. Such a commission would have greater power and be seen as more independent because it would be appointed by a Supreme Court judge instead of by the government it was investigating.

Mr. Olmert defended the cabinet decision, saying the committee would have the powers of a state commission, allowing it to subpoena witnesses and order police searches.

Many Israelis, including a large number of disgruntled reserve soldiers, have been demanding an inquiry since the fighting ended Aug. 14. Mr. Olmert has faced some of the harshest criticism, and his popularity has plummeted.

Critics have also called for the resignations of Defense Minister Amir Peretz and the military's chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz. Last week, Maj. Gen. Udi Adam, who commanded the Israeli forces in northern Israel and southern Lebanon, submitted his resignation, the first senior figure to quit because of the war.

With an international peacekeeping force deploying in southern Lebanon, Israel has withdrawn from most of the positions it held when the fighting ended, though it still has troops in a number of places across the border.

On Sunday, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, left on a trip that will take him to the United Nations this week for the opening of the General Assembly. His absence puts on hold talks about a national unity government for the Palestinians, which had been marked by increasing friction.

Mr. Abbas wanted an agreement locked up before he left so he could appeal to Western leaders to restore the financial assistance that was cut after the militant group Hamas came to power in the spring.

Mr. Abbas's Fatah movement and Hamas say they remain committed to the unity government, but they have traded sharp words in recent days.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, a former information minister who is part of Mr. Abbas's delegation, said the internal Palestinian talks were in a state of crisis. He said Hamas needed to accept previous agreements between the Palestinians and the Israelis, or a new government would not win international acceptance.

"We want clarifications from Hamas," Mr. Abed Rabbo said in a telephone interview from Jordan, where Mr. Abbas was Sunday. "Hamas is affecting the credibility of the president and undermining his efforts to approach the international community."

Hamas said that its position had not changed, and that it still refused to recognize Israel. Western countries have demanded the Palestinian Authority government recognize Israel as one condition for restoring aid.

"We don't recognize Israel," Sami Abu Zuhri, a Hamas spokesman, said at a news conference on Sunday in Gaza City. "If such a position is a problem, then we consider that an honor. We want to break the siege by the West, but the price should not be abandoning the Palestinian interests."

Hamas officials say they believe talks with Mr. Abbas and Fatah will resume when the president returns.

Israeli Government Panel To Probe War (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Cabinet on Sunday approved a committee to investigate the government's handling of the recent war in Lebanon but rejected protesters' calls for an independent inquiry.

Amid broad dissatisfaction in Israel over the outcome of the conflict with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon, the question of whether to conduct an investigation, and of what kind, had become a political battle.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert favored a government inquiry; others, including Defense Minister Amir Peretz, advocated an independent commission that was seen as more likely to conduct a rigorous investigation.

Peretz, leader of the left-leaning Labor Party, in the end joined Olmert in a 20-to-2 Cabinet vote to approve a five-member panel named by the prime minister. Peretz said he was satisfied that the panel would have sufficient authority.

The inquiry will be headed by a retired judge, Eliyahu Winograd, and will examine the performance of Israeli political leaders and the military during the 34-day conflict. Israelis were left bitter over a range of issues, including the wisdom of a costly last-minute ground offensive and the military's inability to crush Hezbollah forces before a United Nations cease-fire took effect Aug. 14.

Olmert rejected demands for an independent commission, which by law would enjoy wide authority in deciding the scope of its inquiry, summoning officials for questioning and issuing recommendations. Such panels have looked into political controversies, and their findings have led to the firing of top public officials.

Olmert said such an investigation would take too long. Critics charged that he sought a whitewash.

"I sincerely hope that the committee will conclude its work as soon as possible and assist the state of Israel in better preparing for future challenges," Olmert said at the start of the weekly Cabinet session.

He said the panel would be granted authority equal to that of an independent commission.

Protesters have called for the resignations of Olmert, Peretz and Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, the army chief of staff. On Sunday, demonstrators carried placards and mocked the trio outside the prime minister's office.

Reserve soldiers who served in Lebanon and other critics have said the campaign was plagued by changing battle plans, poor preparation and shortages of combat gear, food and drinking water. Peretz has acknowledged failures. The inquiry's outcome could quell public anger toward Israel's leaders or fuel it.

DOJ_NMG_0064073

Israel has slowly withdrawn its troops from south Lebanon, after an incursion triggered July 12 when Hezbollah militants captured two Israeli soldiers, who are still unaccounted for. Officials said they would pull out the rest of their forces once the international force and Lebanese army were in place, as called for under the cease-fire.

"When they're ready to come in, we'll be ready to leave," Mark Regev, spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, said Sunday.

Public support for Olmert and Peretz soared at the outset of the war but tumbled as it went on. Weakened politically, Olmert has shelved his central plan: drawing permanent national borders, with or without negotiations with Palestinian leaders, in a way that would require tens of thousands of Jewish settlers to withdraw from the West Bank.

In recent days, Olmert has said he was willing to meet with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, who has repeatedly called for new talks.

Abbas was en route Sunday to a U.N. General Assembly session to seek backing for new peace moves and for his Fatah group's plans to form a unity government with the ruling Hamas movement. The two parties said last week they would join hands in hopes of breaking an international aid embargo against Hamas that has dried up the Palestinian treasury.

Palestinian officials said Abbas planned to meet with President Bush on the sidelines of the session amid signs of discord in efforts by Fatah and Hamas to forge a government.

Hamas leaders Sunday denied reports by Fatah officials that Abbas had suspended coalition talks because Hamas refused to meet the West's conditions for resuming aid: recognizing Israel, pledging an end to the use of violence and accepting agreements between Israel and the Palestinians.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said negotiations over the proposed government would resume after Abbas returned.

Abbas wants Palestinian militants, including Hamas fighters, to release Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit before Fatah joins in a unity government. Shalit was captured June 25 in southern Israel and taken to the Gaza Strip, which led to the ongoing Israeli military incursion into the seaside territory.

Reports in several Arabic newspapers have said agreement was near on a prisoner swap with Israel. Palestinian officials did not comment, though unnamed Israeli officials were quoted in local media as saying that no deal was imminent.

Islamists' Rise Imperils Mideast's Order (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

CAIRO, Sept. 17 — President Bashar al-Assad has allowed Hamas safe haven in Syria. He has provided support to Hezbollah and castigated Arab leaders as "half men" for failing to press for a quick end to the war in Lebanon.

But even Syria has been unable to avoid being pulled into the struggle taking place in the Middle East between the traditional centers of power, like Damascus and Cairo, and opposition forces, particularly radical Islamists, that increasingly challenge them and try to force them to adopt more anti-Western, pro-Islamist policies.

The foiled terrorist attacks last week were directed against the United States Embassy in Damascus, but the very presence of armed Islamist terror groups within Syria — a country governed by Alawites, a minority sect of Islam — was troubling to the authorities there. And it followed a similarly foiled attack against a government building three months earlier.

"The fact that the Syrian regime is perceived as anti the United States does not save Syria from becoming a target of the jihadists," said Adnan Abu-Odeh, a former political adviser to King Hussein of Jordan, "because the jihadists in principle are against these regimes for ideological reasons."

The signs of the dynamic are piling up. In Egypt, the authorities said recently that they broke up a terrorist cell, detaining about 100 people suspected of adopting Al Qaeda's ideology. In Jordan, 15 Islamists who are members of Parliament recently threatened to resign. On Friday, four terrorists were killed as they tried to attack an oil plant in Yemen.

From Cairo, to Rabat, Morocco, to Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, the order that emerged after World War II — long accustomed to encouraging domestic anger against Israel — has seen its influence and grip on power challenged in the wave of instability washing across the Middle East. That has roughly coincided with the rise of the insurgency in Iraq.

This region has long been defined by conflict, and leaders are unafraid to use force to crush opposition. But the current level of instability has unnerved them. They are not about to be toppled, not as long as they retain firm control over their security operations. But they find themselves fighting to maintain stability and credibility, political analysts said.

"The ruling regimes cannot disregard or dismiss the influence of Islamist movements in their countries," said Gamal Abdel-Gawwad, who runs the International Relations unit at the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo.

The empowerment of the Islamists has been propelled by events large and small — the occupation of Iraq, Israel's war with Hezbollah, the United States' support for Israel in that war, Danish cartoons lampooning the Prophet Muhammad, and most recently comments about Islam made by Pope Benedict XVI.

The pope issued an apology on Sunday, but the angry initial response served to highlight a dynamic years in the making that many political analysts say helped to lay the groundwork for the current rise of support for Islamic groups and radicalism.

Struggling to strip credibility from Islamic groups, Middle Eastern governments long tried to take the lead in defending what are perceived as Islamic values, while simultaneously trying to crush organizations that defined themselves as Islamic, like the Muslim Brotherhood. That, analysts said, created societies that are more religious — and more distrustful of their nonreligious governments.

"Progressive people like us, we were closed down," said the feminist Egyptian author Nawal al-Sadawi in an interview last fall. "My books were censored. Men and women who were secular and progressive were silenced, and they gave space more and more to religious people. They were competing. They were saying, 'We know God more than you,' and this is a very dangerous game."

The pressures on Arab governments — those close to the West and those opposing it — are increasingly clear. In July and August, the Egyptian government arrested about 100 people it said had formed a Qaeda-inspired cell, mostly in the northern city of Alexandria, said Mamdouh Ismail, an Islamist and lawyer who said he was working with many of those now in custody. He said the suspects had not been charged, and he insisted they were not guilty.

But he added that events like the attempted attack on the embassy in Damascus were unsurprising. "The people embrace their Arab-Muslim identity and feel an injustice is done upon them in more than one place — Iraq, Palestine, Darfur, Afghanistan, Lebanon," he said. "And that's why there are these kinds of reactions. There has to be a reaction. And there are exaggerations in the reactions because there is an excess of weakness on the part of the regimes."

In Jordan, the government recently sentenced two members of Parliament to prison for attending a mourning ceremony for Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq who was killed by an American bomb. The 15 members of the Islamic Action Front, the political arm of the Muslim Brotherhood in Jordan, all threatened to resign — which could have caused a political crisis for King Abdullah II.

The members backed down from their threat, in part to preserve the organization's "ability to influence society," said Rohile Gharaibeh, the deputy secretary General of the Islamic Action Front in Jordan.

The attacks in Damascus were also evidence that Syria has been unable to neutralize the growing radicalism within its own borders. Muhammad Habbash, a member of the Syrian Parliament who is director of the reformist Islamic Studies Center in Damascus, said that part of the reason Syria had taken such a tough line toward Washington was to help head off the influence of radical currents in Syria.

"So Syria's objecting position is not only to challenge but to avoid problems inside," he said. But it has not worked. "It still happened," he said of the recent attacks.

The Arab League, which is the institutional face of the status quo, representing 22 Arab states, has decided to try to re-establish stability by trying to renew the peace process between Israelis and Palestinians.

"There is increased instability in the region, you see it all around you," said a senior Arab League diplomat, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "The core issue is the Palestinian issue in our opinion. Frustration is building upon frustration, from what's happening in Palestine, Iraq, and what happened in Lebanon."

Wahhabi Colonialism (WSJ)

By Melik Kaylan

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Pope Benedict XVI recently cited a Byzantine-era critique of Islam, and the usual hubbub of outrage ensued. Various self-appointed and official Islamic spokesmen (they're always men), including the head of Turkey's religious affairs directorate (why does Turkey have one?), responded sharply in the name of their faith. One might argue that a confident, evolved religion welcomes all kinds of open debate. Or one might intone gravely that the West continues to mishandle its relations with the umma -- the sphere of active Muslim believers -- with the implied assumption that there is such a unified entity of tens of millions, and that they all feel outrage in the same way at the same time. Islamist polemicists, in particular, cherish the archaic umma concept, evoking, as it does, a premodern utopia of monolithic harmony.

Many in the West buy the notion, with its familiar en bloc echoes of the proletariat. But should the rest of us believe them? Do we insult Muslims by buying into it, too, or insult them the more by considering it antiquated and bogus?

Mishandling and misinterpreting Muslim sentiments appears to be a habit we acquired in the post-Soviet age. Until then the West couldn't go wrong. We didn't need to know too much about radical Islam because we knew this much: Marxism was a shared enemy because it imposed atheism on subject populations, and primitive Islamic fervor worked in our favor. During the Cold War years, the West did indeed encourage the spread of a unitary and evangelical form of the religion wherever possible, as a counter to secular values. We have belatedly realized that to the doctrinaire Islamist ideologues, the Wahhabists, the Sayyid Qutbs, the Muslim Brotherhoods and now their bin Ladenite inheritors, modernism, too, was a kind of atheism.

Arabian fundamentalists concluded that if post-medieval progress in the world made their values unworkable, then it was the world's fault, and the world should be stopped in its tracks. This is a bit like the Flat Earth society resolving to retro-authenticate its views by nuking the earth flat. The Islamists found in Afghanistan that this could be done, after a fashion: Reduce the environment to premodern conditions, and, miraculously, the ideology applies precisely -- as it did wherever nature, not tamed by progress, had to be tamed by repressive social discipline. In some places, such as parts of Africa and Pakistan's tribal areas, a weak central state offered ready conditions for that ideology. In other places, like Chechnya, Palestine and now Iraq, chaos needed encouragement with car- and-suicide bombings. There's nothing new or particularly Islamic to this prescription. Remember Mao Zedong's revolutionary slogan: "Chaos under the heavens and all is right with the world."

An apparently impossible predicament, then, confronts Western policy makers today: whether to uphold corrupt and often hostile tyrannies, as in Egypt and Uzbekistan -- or to topple them and open the door to religious extremists applying their iron dialectic. A terrible inevitability is born, so it seems. In fact, a way through exists, but the West must quickly shed ignorance of matters Islamic.

As many Muslim apologists contend, though often for disingenuous purposes, the Islamic world is indeed not monolithic. It remains highly fissiparous and regional, inmixed with a myriad of localized customs, superstitions and hagiologies. The indigenous Islam of Central Asia, for example, combining Sufi mysticism, shamanism and dance, gave rise to the spiritualist école of Gurdjieff, et al., that swept through Europe early last century. Until recently, a branch of it held sway in Chechnya, where men danced the ecstatic zikhr circle dance on holy days -- until, that is, al Qaeda crept in just 10 years ago.

When fundamentalists confront such diversity, they do so with dogmatic force, huge resources and a fully schematized set of ideas. They bully local Islam into puritan uniformity. In Bosnia and Kosovo, whenever Saudi and Gulf agents offered funds to rebuild war-damaged communities, they insisted first on flattening cemeteries, destroying tombstones and whitewashing mosque décor, on the principle that pure iconophobic Islam abhorred the worship of idols. (This, despite the ubiquity of giant-sized idolatrous portraits, in their own countries, of Gulf and Saudi emirs on public walls -- not to mention currency notes.)

One can imagine the initial distress followed by resistance from local communities against such arrogant sacrilege from outside -- a resistance that, alas, fades with pressure and neglect. In the Balkans, inhabitants had to be restrained, weeping, from forcefully defending their family graves. This is where the opportunity lies for the West to break the extreme Islamists' strategy for indoctrination and for sowing jihad upon chaos. Both in Western mosques and in the Islamic world, the reintroduction of regional forms of belief and practice should be fostered. * * *

In such Central Asian countries as Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan and Turkmenistan, where sub-al Qaeda groups now clandestinely offer the only full-fledged religious instruction available to the populace, national leaders should be encouraged instead to revive their own indigenous practices (long dormant under Soviet rule), to arm their citizens with a regional pride in their organic Muslim traditions, even to export them to nearby Afghanistan -- where such practices endured until the Soviet invasion. In Turkey, the vast heritage of poetic mysticism accumulated in the Seljuk and Ottoman dynasties, visible now only in the Rumi-Dervish order, should be revitalized and exported to neighbors (assuming the religious affairs directorate agrees, of course). In Central Asia, Indonesia, the Philippine Islands and elsewhere, Wahhabists should no longer expect to meet with no counterargument when, as a prelude to conversion, they accuse the locals of ignorance and godlessness. They should be confronted with a literate, individuated and self-confident Islam, deeply rooted in local history and all the more resistant to their internationalist, one-size-fits-all template.

In such conditions, local Muslims will also defend the progress and development they have achieved nationally, thereby short-circuiting the messianic return-to-rubble logic of jihadists. To the argument that such initiatives imposed from above or initiated in the West will be dismissed as imperialist or collusionist, there's a simple answer. The spread of fundamentalist Islam was itself fostered by the West via the Arabian peninsula for political reasons. It has become the ultimate, invasively colonial force and aims to subjugate the entire umma to its tenets.

Hamas' Rejection Of Israel Halts Talks (WT/AP)

By Sarah El Deeb

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Coalition talks between Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the militant group Hamas have stalled over U.S. demands that a national unity government recognize Israel, Palestinian officials said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0064076

The suspension of negotiations underscores the difficulty that Mr. Abbas is having in trying to get Hamas to soften its anti-Israel ideology, a move that would pave the way to ending international sanctions that are crippling the Palestinian economy.

Israeli officials, meanwhile, said they were making progress in talks to win the release of an Israeli soldier captured three months ago by Hamas-linked militants in the Gaza Strip. That attack sparked an Israeli offensive in Gaza that further worsened the plight of Palestinians.

Mr. Abbas will use a meeting this week with President Bush on the sidelines of the U.N. General Assembly session in New York to try to win U.S. support for a coalition that doesn't fully meet international demands for a changed stance on Israel, Palestinian officials said.

They said he would warn that failure to work out a unity government could lead to a Palestinian civil war.

Still, some Palestinian officials wondered whether Mr. Abbas and Hamas can bridge their differences.

"What's the point of forming a government if this government is saying that it won't recognize agreements signed with Israel?" asked Palestinian lawmaker Saeb Erekat, an Abbas confidant. "The whole point is to break the deadlock in the peace process and bring an end to the siege."

The so-called Quartet of Middle East peacemakers -- the U.S., European Union, Russia and United Nations -- insist that Hamas must renounce violence, recognize Israel and accept past peace agreements before aid can resume.

Hamas has long sought Israel's destruction, with its followers killing hundreds of Israelis in suicide bombings. But the group caved in to months of economic sanctions and announced last week that it would form a coalition government with Mr. Abbas' more moderate Fatah Party.

The Hamas Cabinet resigned Wednesday, and Mr. Abbas said the Palestinian Authority's 165,000 civil servants would be paid in the coming days. The employees have not been paid their full salaries since Hamas took control of the government in March.

But the current platform for the planned unity government falls short of the requirements set by the West to restore the flow of money, and Hamas leaders said they would not compromise any further.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas said yesterday that the group would not recognize past peace deals despite the international pressure.

A Real Test For The Palestinians (NYT)

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

After six months of crippling sanctions, Hamas's leaders are trying to figure out the very minimum they need to say — and the even less they plan to do — to end their isolation and salvage their government. Skepticism is more than warranted. But Hamas's admission of weakness could provide at least a chance to quell the violence and resuscitate peace talks. The Bush administration should not squander the opportunity.

The radical Islamist Hamas — which came to power after last January's legislative elections — has been negotiating to form a national unity government with the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, a moderate, and his Fatah Party. Hamas still refuses to say the words necessary to unlock international aid: that it will renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist. Aides to Mr. Abbas warned yesterday that Hamas will have to make some rhetorical concessions — no matter how grudging — before a unity government can hope to win international acceptance.

Words are important. But worrying about who said what should not divert attention from what should be the real test of any Palestinian government: whether it will commit to a genuine cease-fire and use its security forces to halt, rather than abet, rocket and terrorist attacks against Israel.

The cutoff of financing has taken a harsh toll on the Palestinian people, especially in Gaza. Even then, Hamas began to buckle only after government employees, unpaid for months, went on strike. The Europeans are eager to resume aid, but all that leverage will be lost if they settle for words rather than deeds. The Bush administration is right to warn against that. Unfortunately, that is all that it has been doing.

One can spend endless hours puzzling over why President Bush has made no effort to broker a peace between Israel and the Palestinians. After pushing so hard to isolate Hamas, he now needs to capitalize on its weakness.

Working with the Europeans and moderate Arab states — all desperate to see Washington engage — the administration should take the lead in trying to negotiate a cease-fire and a prisoner exchange. Washington should also send a clear message to Syria that there can be real rewards if it restrains its clients, Hamas and Hezbollah, while the Europeans should warn of real punishments if it refuses.

If progress is to be made, Israel will need to turn over tax revenues and stop expanding settlements. And if a cease-fire can be put in place, Washington should push for a quick resumption of peace talks.

DOJ_NMG_0064077

Skepticism is a basic requirement for dealing in the Middle East. But that cannot be an excuse for nearly six years of White House inaction. It's time that Mr. Bush and his secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, try the hard work of diplomacy.

An Endless Vacuum In The Middle East (WP)

By Jackson Diehl

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

President Bush once asked former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon why he had proposed his bold plan to evacuate Israeli settlers and soldiers unilaterally from the Gaza Strip. "To fill the vacuum," Sharon frankly replied. Before Sharon uncorked the idea in the fall of 2003, the Israeli-Palestinian "peace process" was stalemated, and there was mounting international pressure for progress. Proposals from outsiders and would-be brokers were proliferating; Sharon feared one of them would eventually gain traction and be imposed on him. So, with the flair that won him many a battlefield victory, he outflanked the incipient discussion.

Three years later, in the aftermath of a war that was one of the unforeseen consequences of Sharon's strategy, a similar vacuum looms before his successors. Once again there seems no clear way forward toward an Israeli-Palestinian peace. The unilateral West Bank pullout championed by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert earlier this year is, at least for now, dead. But a settlement seems more urgent than ever, and lots of people have ideas: Jacques Chirac, Kofi Annan, the Arab League.

Most of them are bad: grandiose proposals for international conferences or non-starters that would require Israel to accept the "return" of millions of Palestinians to its own territory as a condition for Arab recognition of what would no longer be a Jewish state. Nonetheless, the U.N. Security Council may debate the various schemes at the end of this week.

Both Olmert's government and the Bush administration know that this would be the ideal moment to put a new, game-changing plan on the table. But as a visit to Washington last week by Olmert's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, made clear, they haven't got one. Livni spent hours in conversation with Bush, Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other senior officials, with the goal of coordinating positions before the expected onslaught of diplomacy at the United Nations. The bottom line, one official said, is that "there will be no major diplomatic initiative."

Why the paralysis? There are some important substantive reasons, including the simple fact that the end of Israeli unilateralism means an Arab partner is needed -- and the Palestinian Authority is not ready for a serious peace process. Since Israel withdrew from Gaza a year ago, neither President Mahmoud Abbas nor the rival Hamas movement has been able to gain control over an increasingly anarchic territory.

There are also powerful political problems here and in Israel. With his presidential capital rapidly waning, Bush is focused on finding solutions for Iraq. Trying to solve the Middle East's most intractable conflict on top of that is a stretch. Olmert's government is reeling from the war in Lebanon, besieged by critics who say he failed to deliver on promises to cripple Hezbollah or that he squandered the lives of the scores of Israelis who were killed. For the next few months, at least, he will be focused simply on surviving in office.

Bush and Livni consequently found themselves watching with a mixture of apprehension and dismay last week as the usually passive Palestinians launched a Sharonesque gambit. Abbas announced that he had struck a deal with Hamas and other factions on a "unity government" that he would discuss with Bush at a meeting this week at the United Nations. Hamas leaders, meanwhile, floated an even bolder backup plan: dissolving the Palestinian Authority, which could force Israel to resume its occupation.

The Palestinian leadership knows that the still-evolving unity pact isn't likely to impress either Olmert or Bush, since it almost certainly won't commit Hamas or the new government to formal recognition of Israel or an unqualified renunciation of violence. But if it goes forward it will be a fresh initiative -- and it could break the current international embargo on the Palestinian Authority, by persuading European governments to renew subsidies that cover half of the authority's payroll. Western governments and Israel would be reduced to arguing with each other, rather than pressing for a Palestinian government that could make peace.

The U.S.-Israeli strategy to counter this maneuver amounts to a series of small tactical steps. Once an Israeli soldier still held captive in Gaza is released, Olmert will meet with Abbas and release hundreds or thousands of Palestinian prisoners. An Israeli chokehold over movement in and out of Gaza will be eased. If all goes well, Olmert might even discuss transferring security responsibility in several West Bank towns from the Israeli army to Palestinian security forces controlled by Abbas.

All these would be useful steps forward. They wouldn't, however, fill the vacuum.

US Moves Stall To Press Sudan On Darfur (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0064078

Moves in Congress to put financial pressure on Sudan to stop the killings in Darfur have been stymied by a combination of big business interests and the Bush administration, according to supporters of legislation blocked in the Senate that would have endorsed decisions by US states to divest from companies involved in Sudan.

Tens of billions of dollars in equity are at stake, mostly of non-US companies and including two listed Chinese energy giants involved in Sudan's rapidly growing oil industry which fuels the military with arms and other supplies.

While giving rhetorical backing to anti-genocide protests staged around the world on Sunday, Democrats and Republicans admitted that a new watered down draft of the Darfur Peace and Accountability Act was further evidence of US unwillingness as well as inability to take decisive action.

The draft put forward last week after long delays by Senator Richard Lugar, head of the foreign relations committee, took out controversial language known as "section 11" in the House equivalent that passed in April. This would have given a green light to a growing, celebrity-backed Sudan divestment campaign that has successfully targeted states, universities, pension and investment funds, persuading them to dump stock.

In June New Jersey became the first state to divest fully public funds from foreign companies linked to Sudan, selling $2.16bn of stock. Maine, Oregon, Illinois and Connecticut have also passed divestment legislation, as have many public and private universities with billions of dollars in endowments.

"Section 11 was critical," said Jason Miller, national policy director of the Sudan Divestment Task Force which is co-ordinating the campaign. His group pushes for divestment targeted not at all companies in Sudan but those deemed to be directly helping the government, through the oil industry which accounts for over half of state revenues and some telecommunications companies that have directly assisted the military.

On the other side, the National Foreign Trade Council (NFTC), a US business lobby group representing major industries, is fighting the campaign and has sued the state of Illinois.

Bill Reinsch, president of the NFTC, lobbied Congress. He told the FT that the principle was simple – "the president of the United States runs foreign policy; the mayor of Berkeley does not".

The NFTC also complains that lists of target companies are drawn up by unaccountable private interest groups. He said some of the US companies listed had been exempt from existing US sanctions to do business with Sudan – usually in the south where rebel groups recently signed a peace accord with Khartoum. Others had nothing to do with Sudan, he said.

It is not clear whether Mr Lugar's draft will get through the committee, though there is a sense that so much time has been wasted that something is better than nothing. The sudden arrival of the draft caught many by surprise and it is still being studied. No one contacted by the FT could explain why support for a "no fly zone" over Darfur had apparently been dropped as well.

The State Department declined to make an official comment on the issue.

One administration official questioned whether the legislation would make any difference. He said there was little the US could do on its own, its military was stuck and exhausted in Iraq, China was refusing to co-operate and Nato was tied up in Afghanistan.

To that list, analysts said, should be added US reluctance to make Darfur a priority in its difficult relationship with China, Sudan's oil wealth, and a still close intelligence relationship between Washington and Khartoum in the war on terror.

Companies affected by the divestment campaign include: PetroChina, Sinopec, ABB, Alstom, Siemens, Schlumberger, Tatneft of Russia, Italy's Finmeccanica, Weir Group of the UK, and Shell.

As Peace Mission Nears End, War In Sudan Intensifies (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

EL FASHER, Sudan, Sept. 17 -- As the African Union prepares to abandon its troubled peace mission to Darfur, the region is descending ever more steeply into war.

Fresh Sudanese government troops with machine guns slung over their shoulders patrol the streets of El Fasher, the capital of North Darfur state. Helicopter gunships based here rumble off into the countryside almost every day, loaded with rockets. And Darfur's fractured and frustrated rebel forces increasingly are fighting back against government forces.

The intensity of the combat in Darfur, the western Sudanese region the size of Texas, has forced a new flood of civilians to flee their burned and bombed-out villages for sprawling camps on the outskirts of this and other cities. The estimated 2 million people already in such camps are settling in for the long haul, losing hope that they will ever return home.

Hawab Abdallah Osman, 50, said her village about 45 miles northwest of here is now empty. Asked when she planned to return, she said, "Never."

"There is bombing there," she said. "I don't think peace will come."

DOJ_NMG_0064079

Hundreds of thousands of people have already died in three years of war, which began when rebels attacked government installations in Darfur. The government responded by sending in army troops and arming a militia, called the Janjaweed, that has attacked rebels and civilians.

The African Union, which launched an ambitious but poorly funded peace monitoring mission in 2004, is scheduled to leave Sept. 30, when its mandate expires.

A proposed United Nations force of about 20,000 -- over three times the size of the African Union's -- has been blocked by President Omar Hassan al-Bashir, who says it is part of an effort by Western nations to "re-colonize" Sudan.

"We don't want the United Nations back to Sudan no matter the conditions," he said Saturday in Havana, where he was attending an international summit of developing countries.

A cease-fire agreement for Darfur was reached in May but has collapsed in the four months since it was signed in the Nigerian capital of Abuja. The government has repeatedly violated terms prohibiting military flights over Darfur and new troop deployments.

The government also has failed to restrain the Janjaweed, which continues to rape, kill and pillage. Increasingly, the militiamen are doing so while wearing crisp green uniforms, distributed by the government.

Civilians here say militiamen gallop their horses and camels into the camps for displaced people, sometimes within site of African Union troop positions. Rarely have the troops responded with force. In some cases, Darfur civilians, still smarting from deaths of friends and family members, have demonstrated angrily in front of African Union encampments.

"This African Union, if there is fighting, they are running away," said Halima Idriss, 55, gesturing furiously as her orange head scarf flapped in the hot wind of a camp outside of El Fasher.

The African Union's Peace and Security Council plans to review its decision to depart at a meeting in New York on Monday. But with its current mandate and resources, African Union officers express despair about their ability to keep peace when both the government and rebel forces are determined to return to war. Field commanders from the only rebel group that signed May's peace deal say they, too, are likely to resume fighting soon unless the United Nations sends its peacekeepers to Darfur.

Speaking on condition of anonymity, the African Union officers muttered angrily about their failure to enforce calm while expressing greater fears. They used the words "genocide" and "Rwanda" to describe what they expect will follow their departure.

Outside analysts also say that the African Union, while ineffective at peacekeeping, is serving as vital eyes and ears for the outside world at a time when the Sudanese government is making it more difficult for aid groups and journalists to operate here. With the African Union gone, they say, the last buffer will be lost against a bloodier assault in Darfur.

"All predictions are that without witnesses, the slaughter will begin," said Eric Reeves, a Smith College professor who has closely monitored the Darfur conflict, speaking from Northampton, Mass. "As long as the A.U. stays in, they are powerless but they are witnesses."

The African Union pullout would come shortly before the end of the rainy season, when flooded dirt roads typically dry out, allowing full-scale military maneuvering to resume after many weeks of limited mobility for both sides.

John Prendergast, an Africa analyst for the International Crisis Group, said the United States and the United Nations have allowed the Sudanese government to outmaneuver them diplomatically. He acknowledged that the United Nations would have trouble deploying troops over the objections of the government but said tougher actions would persuade officials to allow the peacekeepers.

"If we start acting, they will change their behavior," said Prendergast, speaking from New York, where he was preparing for a Darfur rally in Central Park. "It's very sad that the U.S. has not mustered the political will to head down that path."

Little news of the political maneuvering reached displaced civilians in Darfur. They passed the day much as they have for months, in some cases for years. They took long, dangerous walks into the Janjaweed-controlled countryside to gather firewood. They rode their donkeys in search of grass for the animals to eat. They sought shade from the blistering sun under makeshift shelters made with reeds and plastic tarps distributed by international aid groups.

And they waited for a peace few expect to come.

Idriss, the Darfur woman who said she had lost faith in the African Union, expressed tentative hope that U.N. peacekeepers might do better. If they don't come, she said, she knows what will happen.

"We will lose all the people of Darfur," Idriss said. "The killing is always going on."

In A Blow To Merkel's Christian Democrats, Far-Right Party Wins Seats In An East German State (NYT)

By Mark Landler

DOJ_NMG_0064080

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

FRANKFURT, Sept. 17 — A far-right party made further inroads in Germany's economically fragile east on Sunday, winning seats in a state election in Mecklenburg-West Pomerania, a lonely land of farms and fishing villages that is the home constituency of Chancellor Angela Merkel.

The National Democratic Party, which openly espouses xenophobic and neo-Nazi views, was projected to win slightly more than 7 percent of the vote, according to preliminary results. That was less than analysts here had feared, but enough to clear the threshold of 5 percent for seats in the state legislature.

Extreme-right parties will now be represented in three of Germany's six eastern states — a trend that worries officials and underlines the divide between the country's eastern and western halves. Far-right parties have negligible support in more-prosperous western Germany.

"This shows the extreme right is a stable and growing force in the east, but it is not an earthquake," said Hajo Funke, a political scientist at the Free University of Berlin. "It's not a danger for our democracy."

The result, however, is a rebuke for Mrs. Merkel and her conservative party, the Christian Democratic Union, which lost votes in Mecklenburg and fared even worse in the second of the two state legislative elections on Sunday, in Berlin. There, the popular mayor, Klaus Wowereit, led his Social Democratic Party to a comfortable victory.

Voters appeared to be punishing Mrs. Merkel's party, 10 months after it squeaked into power in an unwieldy "grand coalition" with the Social Democrats. The Social Democrats, who govern Mecklenburg-West Pomerania, lost ground there, too, and it was not clear whether they could salvage their coalition with the Party of Democratic Socialism, the former East German Communist party.

Mrs. Merkel, who began her political career in Mecklenburg 15 years ago, has tried to focus attention on the region, inviting President Bush in July for a visit. But the state has one of the highest unemployment rates in Germany, which makes it a breeding ground for extremism, analysts say.

The National Democratic Party, which the German government once tried to ban, won seats in Saxony, a similarly depressed eastern state, in 2004. Another far-right party is represented in Brandenburg, the state that surrounds Berlin.

"The grand coalition hasn't presented a forceful program to tackle Germany's problems," Mr. Funke said. "These parties take advantage of the frustration of those who have no chance of a social or economic future."

One of the few winners on Sunday was Mr. Wowereit, who was given a strong mandate as mayor of Berlin, with the choice of renewing his coalition with the Party of Democratic Socialism or forming a new one with the Greens, the largest vote-gainer since the last election, in 2001.

The victory may foretell a greater national role for Mr. Wowereit, a 52-year-old lawyer who has become a star in Berlin. His party-going style seems to suit his late-night town, and his disclosure before the last election that he is gay only added to his appeal. On Sunday, Mr. Wowereit appeared on stage with his partner, Jörn Kubicki, a neurosurgeon.

With the departure of Social Democratic leaders like Gerhard Schröder, and a lack of other rising stars, Mr. Wowereit has made his ambitions plain. "I would like to have more say that I have had in the last five years, when we had to clean up the city," he said in a recent interview with the German magazine Stern.

Whether he has done so is a matter of debate. Berlin is strangled by debt, a jobless rate of nearly 20 percent and a shrinking commercial base. Mr. Wowereit, who is known as Wowi, prefers to focus on its role as a cultural center and tourist magnet. Berlin, he said last year, is "poor but sexy" — a line that has become a tongue-in-cheek slogan for the city.

His opponent, Friedbert Pflüger, a Christian Democratic member of Parliament, tried to portray the mayor as a lightweight. But in a city that rewards flamboyance, Mr. Pflüger, an establishment politician originally from the western city of Hanover, never stood a chance.

"Up until now, he hasn't been a strong voice in politics on the national level," Uwe Andersen, a political scientist at Ruhr University, said of Mr. Wowereit. "He may think this result strengthens his position."

Sweden's Governing Party Voted Out After 12 Years (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall And Ivar Ekman

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

STOCKHOLM, Sept. 17 — Sweden swept away 12 years of center-left government on Sunday, voting to reject its longtime prime minister, Goran Persson, in favor of a conservative candidate who has pledged to revise the Swedish welfare state.

With almost all the votes counted by 11 p.m., three hours after the polls closed, the right-of-center coalition led by the leader of the Moderate Party, Fredrik Reinfeldt, had taken 48.1 percent of the vote, compared with 46.2 percent for the Social Democrats and their left-of-center allies.

The Social Democrats received just 35.2 percent, their worst showing since universal suffrage began in Sweden in 1921. Mr. Persson, 57, who has been prime minister since 1996, said he would step down as party leader in March.

One of the world's most consistently successful political parties, the Social Democrats have governed Sweden alone or in coalitions for 65 of the past 74 years. The party's defeat reflects a feeling not only that Mr. Persson has become complacent in office, but also that Sweden's celebrated social welfare model, with its high tax rate and generous benefits, has encouraged too many people to stay out of work for too long.

Speaking to jubilant party members after declaring victory, Mr. Reinfeldt, 41, went out of his way to welcome people who had voted for the first time for the Moderates, the conservatives. During the campaign, they were repackaged as the new Moderates, signaling a shift to the center.

"Tonight, people who never had thought of voting for us have given us their vote," Mr. Reinfeldt said. "We want them all to feel at home with the new Moderates."

Conceding defeat, Mr. Persson told members of his party that he took responsibility for the poor election results. Voter turnout was around 80.4 percent in a country of 9 million people and 6.9 million voters. The Social Democrats won 177,000 fewer votes than they did in the last election four years ago.

"We will work hard to be a powerful opposition," Mr. Persson said. Pressing home one of the major themes of his campaign, that Mr. Reinfeldt's party represented a seismic, rightward turn in Swedish politics, he said: "We will never accept the system shift of the right. We will fight back."

Nicholas Aylott, a political scientist at Sodertorn University, said in an interview: "There's a sense that the government has become tired, that it's been drifting, really. It hasn't been clear where the Social Democrats want to lead Sweden."

Mr. Reinfeldt successfully made unemployment a major issue in the campaign. By most measures, Sweden is thriving economically: the economy is growing this year at a projected annual rate of 4.1 percent, and the official unemployment rate is 5.7 percent.

But with its generous social services and high unemployment benefits, Mr. Reinfeldt argues, it has encouraged a vast swath of people to fall out of the labor market, a particularly acute problem with an aging population. Taking into account the number of working-age people who are not working or in school — including early retirees, people in job training and those on long-term disability — the unemployment figure is close to 21 percent, he says.

Styling the Moderates "the new labor party," Mr. Reinfeldt said that in Mr. Persson's view, "Security is living on subsidies." By contrast, he said in a recent interview, his party is "saying that security is the ability to work and to stand on your own two feet."

Mr. Reinfeldt has pledged to revitalize the economy by cutting payroll taxes for low-income workers, reducing unemployment benefits from the current high of 80 percent of a worker's last salary, raising educational standards to prepare students for work in a competitive market and encouraging employers with tax credits to hire the long-term unemployed.

"The election's big issue was the poor functioning of the labor market," Mr. Aylott said. "The fact that so many people don't have work has to be considered a major failing of the Social Democratic government, given that they've presided over such a long period of economic growth."

But in a country that likes stability, Mr. Reinfeldt has been at pains to cast his plans as a fine-tuning, rather than a full-scale overhaul, of Sweden's economic model. "The Nordic welfare model is in many aspects a good model," he said as he campaigned Sunday, "but it needs more of a choice for individuals."

But in a series of television and radio debates, Mr. Persson tried to portray his opponent as a classic conservative in disguise, saying the conservatives would tamper with the country's successful formula of high taxes, a large public sector, and generous benefits.

In the previous election four years ago, Mr. Reinfeldt's party was trounced at the polls when it ran on a traditional platform of big tax cuts and deep reductions in social security benefits. When he became party leader, Mr. Reinfeldt acknowledged that such a stance was unlikely to win any elections in a country that is essentially happy with its underlying big-government, high-tax system.

So he moved the party to the center and settled on unemployment as an issue on which the government would be particularly vulnerable.

On Sunday, there was a feeling in the air that something momentous was afoot.

"This year, you've felt vibrations that you haven't felt before," Mattias Jonsson, a 30-year-old banker who was voting for the Moderates, said in an interview outside a Stockholm polling station. "This time, there is a real alternative."

Magnus Rosander, a 44-year-old computer engineer who said he had a nervous breakdown after losing his job four years ago and had not worked since, said he had voted for the Social Democrats and was worried about what would happen under the Moderates.

DOJ_NMG_0064082

"I'm dependent on social welfare," Mr. Rosander said outside a subway station in central Stockholm. "If Fredrik Reinfeldt wins, we will get less money and he will force me to work even though my doctor says I'm not ready yet."

Some voters said that regardless of the differences between the parties, they felt simply that the Social Democrats, and Mr. Persson, had been in power too long.

Frida Henriksson, who is 26 and works in telephone sales for a large Swedish company, said she voted for Mr. Reinfeldt because "it feels like I have a lot more in common with him" than with Mr. Persson.

"It's time for a change, to see what someone else can achieve," she added.

Swedish Oust Persson As Right Wins Poll (FT)

By David Ibison

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Swedish voters ousted the ruling Social Democrats from power after 12 years on Sunday and elected the centre right Alliance for Sweden, almost complete official results indicated.

As he declared victory on Sunday night, Fredrik Reinfeldt, leader of the four-party Alliance, told jubilant supporters: "It was teamwork that helped us win."

The results showing the Alliance parties ahead by just over 1 percentage point was a stunning rebuke for prime minister Göran Persson and his party that has led Sweden for 65 of the last 74 years, overseeing the creation of its world-famous welfare state.

Mr Persson told a group of subdued supporters: "Tomorrow, I will go to the speaker [of parliament] and hand in my and our government's resignation." The prime minister, who has led the Social Democrats for 10 years, said he would also step down as party leader in March. But he added: "We have lost the election, but we are not a defeated party."

The result means Sweden is set for an historic change of direction as it moves away from being a welfare state towards encouraging more market-based activity.

The new government, while supporting many aspects of the welfare state, has pledged to lower taxes and deregulate areas of the economy in which the government continues to play a large role.

"The Social Democrats have been in power for 12 years so there is a general malaise, but there are also underlying reasons," said James Ashley, economist at Barclays Capital.

"The official unemployment rate looks better than European averages, but when you look at the true rate, taking into account government schemes for example, it is much higher, and there is a lot of dissatisfaction with that."

The official unemployment rate is 5.7 per cent, but independent economists have calculated the real rate is between 15 per cent and 17 per cent. Youth unemployment is 23 per cent, according to the European Union.

The Alliance victory comes as the economy is growing at an annualised rate of 5.5 per cent, inflation is low and house prices rising – factors that usually guarantee success for an incumbent government.

Mr Persson emphasised these points repeatedly during his campaign, urging voters to stick with the party that had created Sweden's current prosperity.

But Mr Reinfeldt has argued that record high youth unemployment masks fractures that are appearing in Sweden's social model

These include a rapidly ageing society, indicating that more people will require state support at a time when the number of taxpayers is dropping.

He argued that if nothing was done, either welfare benefits would have to be reduced or taxes would have to go up. He believes deregulation will boost employment and ultimately the government's tax income.

The Alliance victory is likely to have little immediate impact on financial markets or the currency, but it could be more marked in the longer term.

Mr Reinfeldt has pledged to sell state shareholdings in listed companies and deregulate other areas of the economy in which the state has a large influence. This could clear the way for cross-border mergers or acquisitions of listed companies.

Next Sweden Leader Aims To Tweak Welfare (AP)

By Katarina Kratovac, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Fredrik Reinfeldt, leader of the center-right coalition that won Swedish parliamentary elections on Sunday, once wrote a book criticizing the country's vaunted cradle-to-grave welfare state.

Now he will have the chance to tweak the model.

DOJ_NMG_0064083

Reinfeldt's coalition ousted the Social Democratic government in a close parliamentary election Sunday, ending 12 years of leftist rule in the Nordic nation.

The 41-year old leader of the main opposition Moderate Party is decidedly more pro-American than Prime Minister Goran Persson, who Reinfeldt defeated.

He has criticized the President Bush's administration, saying "a long list of mistakes" were committed in Iraq. But he also has said: "I have not experienced any conflict in the world where people don't stand up and call for the Americans to come there and solve it. You can't forget that."

Political opponents often point to Reinfeldt's 1993 book "The Sleeping Nation," in which he criticized the cradle-to-grave welfare state.

Realizing the welfare state is a near-sacred concept in Sweden, Reinfeldt called for fine-tuning the system with small, pro-business adjustments rather than dismantling it altogether.

"We want to show that we like the Sweden we have — but also signal a will to change things through safe steps," the father of three told The Associated Press in a pre-election interview.

Reinfeldt, who comes from an upper middle-class background, was voted into Parliament in 1991, a year after completing a university degree in economics.

He assumed leadership of the main opposition Moderate Party in 2003, a year after its poor showing in 2002 elections. In just three years, he revived the party by softening its conservative image and moving it to the political center.

The Moderates' more controversial goals — such as privatizing state-owned companies and ending Sweden's traditional neutrality to join NATO — were hardly mentioned during the campaign.

In the campaign, Persson cast suspicion on Reinfeldt's shift to the center, saying his true aim was to overturn Sweden's social model.

Reinfeldt has compared himself to Canada's Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper or British Conservative leader David Cameron.

He has said many reforms were needed in the U.N., describing his disenchantment when listening to Cuba's foreign minister give a speech to the General Assembly in 2004 which he said glorified communism while delivering a "giant attack on the USA."

"It was one of the worst things I've heard," Reinfeldt recalled. "But he got a standing ovation from the present delegates. That tells you that this U.N. system isn't perfect.

"It should not become a scratch-each-other-on-the-back society for dictatorships," he added. "That may explain why the USA sometimes chooses to act on its own."

Mexican Leftwinger Calls Himself President-elect (FT)

By Adam Thomson

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Andrés Manuel López Obrador, the leftwing candidate in Mexico's presidential election last July, proclaimed himself president-elect at the weekend and vowed to set about transforming the country's institutions to establish "a new republic".

Speaking before tens of thousands of cheering supporters, he said he would not recognise the government of Felipe Calderón, the official winner, and promised to continue his "civil resistance" movement.

"Do they really think the puppet they put in power will be able to govern?" he asked the "delegates" of his resistance movement. "Well, they are wrong."

Mr López Obrador, the 52-year-old former Mexico City mayor, insisted that the July election had been fraudulent and said that his decision to proclaim himself president was not "capricious" but rather a necessary step in combating a corrupt system set up to benefit the rich.

"They [the establishment] created a gang of white-collar delinquents to fight against us," he told a fervent crowd. He said the decision to proclaim himself president was a "take that so that they learn to respect the will of the people".

Minutes before his rousing speech on Saturday evening, the delegates – organisers claimed there were more than a million although private estimates suggested there were considerably fewer – voted on 12 points.

These included naming Mr López Obrador president-elect, authorising him to appoint a cabinet, choose a government headquarters and even collect revenue, though they did not specify how. The delegates voted overwhelmingly to name him president on November 20, the date Mexicans celebrate the 1910 revolution.

With a show of hands – many enthusiastically raised both hands when asked to vote – delegates also promised to continue Mr López Obrador's "peaceful civil resistance" movement aimed at complicating life for Mr Calderón once in power.

DOJ_NMG_0064084

One delegate speaking before Mr López Obrador said the strategy would include protesting everywhere Mr Calderón appeared in public, holding up signs behind television reporters and even boycotting products of companies that allegedly contributed to Mr Calderon's election campaign. Coca-Cola, Wal-Mart and Banamex, the bank owned by Citigroup, were some of the companies mentioned.

Speaking to the delegates, many of them drenched and shivering from a torrential rain storm earlier in the afternoon, Mr López Obrador said triumphantly: "I will not let Mexico down."

The line went down well with those in the capital's main square. But for others, Mr López Obrador already has. In Mexico City, the leftwing campaigner's principal support base, a growing number of residents – including many who voted for him in July – say enough is enough.

Many political analysts say that by adopting such tactics, Mr López Obrador has locked himself into a poorly funded resistance movement that will gradually start to lose support. Mr Calderón, who takes possession on December 1, will be hoping they are right.

López Obrador To Run 'Parallel Government' As Mexico Opposition (WSJ/AP)

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

MEXICO CITY -- Hundreds of thousands of supporters of leftist Andrés Manuel López Obrador elected him the leader Saturday of a "parallel government" opposed to President-elect Felipe Calderón's administration.

The symbolic "vote" -- a show of hands in the packed Zocalo plaza -- was the latest development in Mexico's nearly three-month electoral dispute. Mr. López Obrador claims fraud and illegal government spending were responsible for Mr. Calderón's victory by fewer than 234,000 votes in the July 2 election, and he has vowed to be the new leader's biggest opponent.

It was unclear what the "parallel government," complete with its own cabinet, would entail.

Mr. López Obrador retains a strong following despite a Federal Electoral Tribunal ruling this month that rejected most of his fraud allegations and awarded the presidency to Mr. Calderón. Supporters of Mr. López Obrador said they would travel the country to spread his message of helping the poor and opposing the elite.

Mr. López Obrador will be "sworn in" to his new post on Nov. 20. Mr. Calderón will be inaugurated Dec. 1.

Delegates at Saturday's convention also agreed to support the formation of a "Progressive Front" to replace the former coalition of leftist parties that backed Mr. López Obrador in the national election.

Mexico's 'Parallel' Gov't In Question (AP)

By Lisa J. Adams, Associated Press Writer

AP, September 18, 2006

Now that Mexican leftists have acclaimed defeated candidate Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador president of a parallel government, the question is will they settle into the role of a normal democratic opposition or try to press their agenda through more militant resistance.

Lopez Obrador, who lost the July 2 presidential election by 234,000 votes to conservative Felipe Calderon, led a massive protest for seven weeks with followers camped out in the center of Mexico City clogging the heart of the capital to demand a full vote recount.

The protest culminated in a self-styled convention of delegates who packed central Zocalo plaza Saturday night and voted by a show of hands to form a parallel government with a Cabinet and plans to swear in Lopez Obrador as president on Nov. 20.

Lopez Obrador, who championed the rights of the poor during his campaign, said Saturday the parallel government will work on proposals to rewrite Mexico's constitution to guarantee the right to food, work, health care, education and housing while overhauling "corrupt" public institutions.

Saturday's mass convention held back from vowing to pay taxes to the parallel government or break existing laws. But it pledged to wage a campaign of peaceful resistance to undermine Calderon at every turn during the single six-year term allowed by Mexico's constitution.

At least one Lopez Obrador aide, former Congressman Jose Agustin Ortiz Pinchetti, said, however, no one was "calling for an insurrection" to topple the government.

But it was still unclear how Lopez Obrador planned to implement his "parallel government" policies or what impact it would have. He has said his alternative government will be "itinerant" — traveling around the country to touch base with supporters outside of Mexico City but based somewhere in the capital.

Mexico expert George Grayson of the College of William & Mary in Virginia said he expects President-elect Calderon to promote his own platform of social programs to tackle poverty and inequality.

Grayson said the movement could be a positive influence if it "keeps the elite's feet to the fire" while funneling its ideas to the congressmen and senators of Lopez Obrador's leftist Democratic Revolution Party, now the second-strongest force in Congress.

"The problem is if they become frustrated and resort to militant resistance," Grayson said. That could again result in widespread street protests, the blockade of government offices — or even worse — disruptive attacks on the capital's infrastructure, such as its water system or electric grid.

"I just hope he maintains restraint," Grayson added.

Recent political polls have shown declining support for Lopez Obrador and some analysts say that raises questions about what his movement can achieve. Some analysts say the chances are slim that Lopez Obrador can launch a radical opposition government.

The former Mexico City mayor claims a broad conspiracy of business leaders cheated him out of an election victory. Calderon will be sworn in on Dec. 1 as President Vicente Fox's successor.

Dozens of world leaders, including President Bush and Argentine President Nestor Kirchner — have recognized the victory and promised to work with Calderon as Mexico's new chief executive.

But Lopez Obrador has refused to back down from his claim that he is the country's rightful leader.

Terrorist Access To Nuclear Site Feared (WT)

By Bojan Pancevski

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

VIENNA, Austria -- More than two tons of radioactive material stored in a rundown research facility in Serbia offer an easy target for terrorists seeking to build a "dirty bomb," according to the United Nations' nuclear watchdog.

Nuclear inspectors have branded the lightly guarded storage facility at a communist-era reactor, which closed 22 years ago, the world's most dangerous disused nuclear site -- because of the potency of the material and the risk of leakage.

The outdated facility is on a 48-acre site at the Institute of Nuclear Sciences in Vinca, 10 miles outside the capital, Belgrade, surrounded by a rusty barbed wire fence and secured only by a small number of armed guards.

Michael Durst, the special program manager at the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), said the Vinca site topped the global priority list of unsecured uranium sources because it combined the threats of nuclear proliferation and environmental disaster.

"Vinca is unique in the amount of uranium stored within its facility -- at least 2.5 tons -- and the fact that about 30 percent of it is leaking. It would be easily accessible to an organized group," he said.

"There are other sites in Bulgaria, Romania and Hungary, as well as elsewhere in the world, but the amount of nuclear material, the accessibility and the leakage makes Vinca the most dangerous. It requires immediate action."

In 1992, more than 100 pounds of highly enriched uranium fuel -- which can be used to make an atomic bomb -- was removed from Vinca by the IAEA and the American, Russian and Serbian governments. It was transported to a disposal facility near Dimitrovgrad, in Russia.

The IAEA fears that the remaining nuclear material could be packaged with conventional explosives to spread radioactive material over a large area -- a so-called dirty bomb.

Officials said much of the uranium is stored in a 75-foot-deep pool, filled with murky water, in the institute's reactor building. Other nuclear material stored at the site includes plutonium and highly radioactive spent-fuel byproducts.

This week, the IAEA will appeal to international donors for funds to pay for decommissioning the site and shipping the most dangerous material to Russia for disposal.

A joint project by the IAEA, the Vinca institute and the Serbian authorities to secure the material has stalled for lack of funds.

"The Vinca staff are highly professional and very cooperative," Mr. Durst said. "But the budgets of the institute, and of the whole country, are very limited. They are keeping the whole thing together with gum and tape."

The institute was founded in what was communist Yugoslavia in 1948 with the help of Soviet scientists. Its nuclear reactor was shut down in 1984, but there are still more than 800 workers at the site, 400 of them scientific staff.

Fumbled China Spy Probe An Intelligence Failure (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

First of three excerpts

Tai Wang Mak dialed a phone number in Guangzhou, China.

DOJ_NMG_0064086

The man who answered, Pu Pei-liang, was a researcher at the Chinese Center for Asia Pacific Studies at Zhongshan University, known to U.S. intelligence officials as CAPS.

"I'm with Red Flower of North America," said Mak, a Chinese national working as an engineer in Los Angeles for Hong Kong-based Phoenix Television.

Mak said he would arrive in China in nine days. Pu instructed him to use a calling card to phone from the airport in Guangzhou so that he could be picked up.

The call from California to China, placed Oct. 19, 2005, was intercepted by the long electronic ears of the U.S. National Security Agency.

Mak's reference to Red Flower of North America brought a breakthrough in a yearlong investigation into one of the most damaging losses of defense technology in American history.

Chinese spies used those code words to authenticate themselves when making contact with communist China's intelligence bureaus. Other often-used code words include Winter Chrysanthemum and Autumn Orchid.

U.S. intelligence knew that CAPS received funding from the People's Liberation Army and conducted operational research for the Chinese military. The phone call revealed that CAPS had one of its most valuable spies inside the U.S. defense industrial system.

Mak and Pu, investigators say, were undercover military intelligence officers with the Second Department of the People's Liberation Army, the spy service well-known to U.S. counterspies as 2 PLA.

Investigators say Tai Mak's brother, Chi Mak, headed a family spy ring in Los Angeles. After his Oct. 28 arrest by the FBI, Chi Mak, a naturalized citizen and electrical engineer with a major American defense contractor, told investigators that he had supplied sensitive Navy weapons secrets to the Chinese since 1983.

The fact that the spy ring went undetected for two decades was a major counterintelligence failure. Worse, the U.S. government would go on to bungle the case.

Picking pockets

R. James Woolsey, the former CIA director, has called the Constitution one of the best recruiting tools for intelligence services. His point is that those living under oppressive, dictatorial regimes sometimes will take incredible risks to step forward and secretly help in the battle for freedom and democracy.

In fall 2004, the CIA recruited just such a source from China, a person within the military and security establishment. One of the first questions the CIA poses, in the jargon of the intelligence business, is "Who is picking our pockets?"

The new source identified the spy ring in Los Angeles that investigators said was run by Chi Mak, an electrical engineer with the defense firm Power Paragon, a subsidiary of the Fortune 500 company known as L-3.

The source said the Chinese military was gaining sensitive technology and information on Navy warships. What's more, China was buying ostensibly commercial goods and diverting them to the military.

Under pressure to adopt a counterintelligence culture instead of a "cop" mentality, the FBI hoped to play the spy ring and see where it led.

Counterintelligence is part art, part science, a discipline aimed at identifying and exploiting or stopping foreign spies. Law enforcement is easier: You identify the bad guys and arrest them.

But the government mishandled the case. One problem was that the FBI and the CIA had conflicting goals. The CIA was afraid to lose its prized source, the Chinese recruit. The agency did not want the FBI to make arrests immediately, since swift action would alert the Chinese to a mole.

Investigators said Tai Mak, who worked for a producer of Chinese-language programming, served as a handler and courier for the spy ring. The investigation continued for about a year, until the NSA intercepted his "Red Flower" phone call in October 2005.

Days later, on Oct. 28, the FBI arrested Chi Mak, 66, and his wife, Rebecca Laiwah Chiu, 63.

Agents also arrested Tai Mak, 57, and his wife, Fuk Heung Li, 49, at Los Angeles International Airport as they prepared to travel to China.

He was carrying disks on which were hidden encrypted files containing sensitive data on Navy technology. Many documents were labeled "proprietary" and "restricted," meaning they could not be exported.

'At serious risk'

An FBI affidavit made a case for applying maximum charges against the four suspects -- conspiracy to steal U.S. military information on restricted Navy warship technology, smuggling information to China in violation of export laws and theft of government property.

"Chi Mak said that he knew that Mr. Pu was providing the information to members of the Chinese government's science and technology community," the affidavit said.

DOJ_NMG_0064087

The FBI produced the affidavit to secure arrest warrants for the Mak brothers and their wives, as well as search warrants for their homes, workplaces and vehicles. Having spent a year conducting electronic surveillance, investigators believed the searches would uncover classified data and other information that would lead to more serious espionage charges.

Judges underscored the seriousness of the charges by denying bail for the Mak brothers. One judge told Chi Mak's lawyer: "You're talking about billions of dollars of technology that puts our country at serious risk."

Chi Mak, a specialist in electrical power, received a secret-level security clearance in 1996.

The document trail led investigators to conclude that he passed information that will allow Beijing to track the Pentagon's new Virginia class-attack submarine, which uses L-3 technology. The compromised technology also will enable the Chinese to develop countermeasures against the submarine and to copy its electronic systems.

Investigators believe he gave China schematics and design information on the latest generation of Aegis weapons systems, which L-3 helped to develop. Aegis -- meaning shield -- is being upgraded to become America's most advanced and mobile anti-missile system for use on guided-missile cruisers, guided-missile destroyers, Sea Wolf-class submarines and aircraft carriers.

Chi Mak worked on four classified Navy contracts related to Aegis. Investigators believe his spy ring was the main supplier of Aegis technology to China and, one U.S. defense official says, the Chinese quickly incorporated it into their Luyang II guided-missile destroyer.

Lesser charges

By the time formal indictments were issued Nov. 15, the most serious charges against Chi Mak and the three others had been dropped. Tai Mak's wife was excluded altogether, though she was charged separately with running an illegal marriage-fraud network that helped immigrants gain entry into the United States.

The three remaining suspects were indicted on relatively minor charges of failing to register as foreign agents. The initial charges could have resulted in prison terms of up to 25 years, but the lesser charges carried maximum sentences of 10 years. Chi Mak, his wife and Tai Mak all pleaded not guilty.

So what changed? U.S. government sources say that petty squabbling between prosecutors and investigators jeopardized the case.

The more serious charges were dropped because the FBI counterintelligence team that conducted the investigation got into a dispute with the U.S. attorneys in Los Angeles who were in charge of the prosecution.

The FBI fully expected that search warrants would unearth classified data, so prosecutors balked when much of what was found was not officially classified as secret.

"Nothing I passed [to China] was classified," Chi Mak told investigators shortly after his arrest.

He was right. Investigators say the lack of classified documents revealed that the spies had done their homework.

Chinese intelligence-gathering services exploited the fact that Navy officials underclassified some of the most sensitive information about weapons systems to make it easier for private defense contractors to use the data.

"There is no question that this case has caused serious damage to U.S. national security," one investigator said.

'More subtle'

Espionage laws are so difficult to apply that prosecutors almost need a confession to be able to make their case.

The current statute, enacted in 1917, requires prosecutors to prove "intent or reason to believe that the information is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation."

This standard often forces the release of intelligence or defense information to prove national security was harmed.

David Szady, head of FBI counterintelligence until this year, said loss of sensitive-yet-unclassified information can do real harm to national security.

The technology passed to China in the Mak case was proprietary corporate trade secrets or export-controlled, but did not carry the "secret" or "top-secret" label. Chi Mak had access to Connecticut-based submarine manufacturer Electric Boat, for example, as if he were one of their own employees, Szady said.

The case "probably murdered the Navy" because of the loss of technology, he said.

Obtaining contract documents not only will allow Beijing to build its own version of one of the Navy's developmental warships, the DD(X) destroyer, but possibly to "sell it in competition to us," Szady said.

The Chinese, he said, are good at positioning agents who can obtain advanced technology in the developmental stage, before it is classified.

"The [spy] business is getting more complex, more subtle," Szady said. "It's smarter business than the old cloak-and-dagger."

U.S., Europe Seek Stronger Asia Currencies (WSJ)

By Michael M. Phillips

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

SINGAPORE -- Worried that their nations' companies are being undercut by inexpensive Asian competitors, the U.S. and its European allies are responding by pressing to push up the exchange value of Asian currencies.

In statements at top-level financial meetings during the weekend, European officials suggested they expect the yen to rise, in an apparent effort to jawbone financial markets to drive the Japanese currency up against the euro. At the same time, finance officials from the Group of Seven major industrial powers, including the U.S., renewed their long campaign to persuade China to allow the yuan to appreciate against the dollar and euro. (See related article1.)

"Greater exchange-rate flexibility is desirable in emerging economies with large current-account surpluses, especially China, for necessary adjustments to occur," the G-7 officials said in a communiqué issued at the end of their session Saturday.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson echoed that view at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund's steering committee yesterday when he called for "greater exchange-rate flexibility in Asian emerging economies."

He also called on finance ministers to clamp down on Iran's finances. He said Tehran uses front companies to finance its nuclear ambitions and to fund terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas.

The currency pressure reflects the political potency of the exchange-rate issue. European officials feel that the weakness of the dollar and certain Asian currencies, such as the yen and the yuan, has left the euro the strongest of the major currencies. That makes it harder for European companies to compete with foreign producers.

Likewise, U.S. manufacturers, unions and lawmakers argue that China's practice of keeping the yuan artificially weak against the dollar is costing American companies sales and American workers jobs. Treasury officials have for years called for a more-flexible Chinese exchange rate.

But markets are eager to understand the views of the new Treasury secretary, who travels to China tomorrow eager to stake out his own attitude toward Beijing. Mr. Paulson considers other aspects of China's economic policy to be of equal or greater concern than the yuan, but he also recognizes that he must address the currency question directly if he is to stave off protectionist moves in Congress.

The Senate is expected to vote this month on a bill imposing 27.5% tariffs on all Chinese imports to retaliate for the alleged currency advantage.

"China needs greater currency flexibility and stronger domestic consumption, as well as financial-sector reform," Mr. Paulson said after the G-7 gathering.

While Treasury officials are dubious that a stronger yuan would do much in and of itself to correct the ballooning U.S. trade deficit, they do believe that a stronger yuan could persuade other Asian governments to allow their currencies to rise, too, in theory making U.S. products more competitive around the world.

"The Asians are not so concerned about losing competitiveness against the U.S.," said Robert Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman Sachs International. "If one Asian currency goes up by too much, their fear is they'll lose competitiveness against the other Asian exporters. So they're looking over their shoulders at one another."

After keeping the yuan virtually frozen against the dollar for a decade, China revalued the currency by 2.1% in July 2005. Since then it has further strengthened by just a couple of percentage points.

China will allow market forces to play a greater role in setting the value of the yuan and will adjust the currency's daily trading band "sooner or later," the country's central-bank governor said on the sidelines of the global economic meetings.

Comments by People's Bank of China Governor Zhou Xiaochuan signal that China is willing to continue adding flexibility to its exchange rate but won't accelerate changes in its foreign-exchange policy in the face of criticism that it isn't doing enough in terms of the global economy.

Yesterday, Mr. Zhou played down the role of the yuan's exchange rate in resolving global trade imbalances. "Structural policy plays a much larger role [in adjustments], compared with the exchange rate," he said.

Responding to expectations that China would widen daily trading limits for the yuan's exchange rate, Mr. Zhou also said that China could widen the band if the currency used up the existing flexibility allowed or to accommodate large changes in exchange rates of major international currencies.

Currently, China allows the yuan to fall or rise in one day by no more than 0.3% against the U.S. dollar from its opening central parity level, which the central bank issues each morning.

Mr. Zhou declined to give a specific timetable for a widening of the daily trading band.

The European G-7 members -- France, Britain, Germany and Italy -- were part of the chorus calling on China to relax its grip on the yuan. But in other comments during the weekend's meetings, senior European officials focused on the yen, commenting in language sufficiently similar to suggest a coordinated strategy of talking up the Japanese currency.

DOJ_NMG_0064089

German Finance Minister Peer Steinbrück told reporters that Japan's currency should respond to -- presumably by appreciating -- both the end of the country's zero-interest-rate monetary policy and its solidly recovering economy, estimated by the IMF to expand 2.7% this year. Likewise, European Central Bank President Jean-Claude Trichet said the G-7 officials had "all agreed that the yen will reflect these developments."

Mr. Paulson's comments on Iran reflect the Bush administration's frustrations in seeking United Nations sanctions against Tehran. He said he has dispatched aides to Europe and the Persian Gulf in recent days, where he has instructed them to lay out the U.S. case that Iran has been using dozens of front companies to fool banks into facilitating illicit financial transactions. That follows Treasury's decision this month to ban Iran's Bank Saderat from access to the U.S. financial system, either directly or through its relationships with foreign banks.

China Competes With West In Aid To Its Neighbors (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, September 18, 2006

STUNG TRENG, Cambodia — In the dense humidity of northern Cambodia, where canoes are the common mode of transportation, a foreman from a Chinese construction company directs local laborers to haul stones to the ramp of a nearly completed bridge.

Nearby, engineers from the China Shanghai Construction Group have sunk more than a dozen concrete pylons across a tributary of the mighty Mekong River, a technical feat that will help knit together a 1,200-mile route from the southern Chinese city of Kunming through Laos to the Cambodian port of Sihanoukville on the Gulf of Thailand.

This is the new face of China's foreign aid to poor Asian countries: difficult construction in remote places that benefits the recipient, and China, too.

"It is the favor of our government to the Cambodian people," said Ge Zhen, 26, one of the more than 50 engineers and 250 other Chinese workers on the four-year project.

Flush with nearly a trillion dollars in hard currency reserves and eager for stable friends in Southeast Asia, China is making big loans for big projects to countries that used to be the sole preserve of the World Bank, the Asian Development Bank, the United States and Japan.

With the Singapore meeting of the World Bank on Sept. 19 and 20, China, one of the bank's biggest customers, is quietly shaking up the aid business in Asia, competing with the bank at its own game.

For poor countries like Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar, and somewhat better-off countries like the Philippines, China's loans are often more attractive than the complicated loans from the West.

The Chinese money usually comes unencumbered with conditions for environmental standards or community resettlement that can hold up major projects. The aid does not carry penalties for corruption that are being increasingly used by the World Bank president, Paul D. Wolfowitz. And China's offers rarely include the extra freight of expensive consultants, provisions that are common to World Bank projects.

For its part, China benefits from the added infrastructure — roads, ports and bridges — in the underdeveloped but growing region around it, to help increase trade and to move natural resources from China's periphery to its heartland.

Liqun Jin, vice president of the Asian Development Bank and a former vice minister of finance in Beijing, said in an interview at the bank's headquarters in Manila that China had carefully considered how to use its increasing wealth.

"China is attracting external capital, and as a balance China wants to help developing countries in the region by financing infrastructure projects," Mr. Jin said. "Helping your neighbors to have a good life is no sin."

He added, "China makes no bones that we want a peaceful neighborhood to develop our own economy."

The effects are likely to be enormous. Tom Crouch, country director for the Philippines at the Asian Development Bank, said, "Here comes a very large new player on the block that has the potential of changing the landscape of overseas development assistance."

Already, in the past several years, China has given aid to African countries, where it is buying oil and gas. They include some with repressive governments like Nigeria, Sudan and Angola.

Even during the cold war, China spread aid around Africa, sometimes to counterbalance assistance from rival countries, which were being helped by Taiwan. In the 1960's and 70's, for example, China aided Angola while Taiwan helped neighboring South Africa.

In Cambodia, Prime Minister Hun Sen boasts of China's offer last spring of $600 million in "no strings attached" loans, made during a visit from the Chinese prime minister, Wen Jiabao. The money will help pay for two major bridges near the capital,

DOJ_NMG_0064090

Phnom Penh, that will link to a network of roads; a hydropower plant; and a fiber-optic network that will connect Cambodia's telecommunications with that of Vietnam and Thailand.

In contrast, Mr. Hun Sen points out that the traditional lenders together pledged just $1 million more than China. And the money came laden with conditions, including World Bank anticorruption clauses.

Four World Bank programs in Cambodia worth about $70 million were recently suspended by the bank after its investigators found corruption among Cambodian officials in the procurement process.

China's generosity to Cambodia has caught Washington's attention. The United States Navy is planning a port visit to Sihanoukville early next year, a first since the Khmer Rouge seized power in 1975.

In the Philippines, China is also making a big splash, offering an extraordinary package of $2 billion in loans each year for the next three years from its Export-Import Bank.

That made the $200 million offered separately by the World Bank and the Asian Development Bank look puny, officials from those banks said, and easily outstripped a $1 billion loan under negotiation with Japan.

Officially, the World Bank says it is not concerned about competition from China's increasingly energetic aid program. "The more important impact of China on these countries' development is trade rather than aid," said Homi Kharas, the bank's chief economist for East Asia and the Pacific.

The aid, chiefly for infrastructure, was being focused by China on the integration of trade in the region, a useful result for poor countries, he said.

But Western aid donors complain that China is secretive about its aid projects, and that it declines to attend the traditional meetings presided over by the World Bank to coordinate aid activities in poor countries. They also say they doubt that China always delivers the full value of the projects that it announces.

And Western aid officials said they were taken aback when the news of the $2 billion Chinese aid package came out at a lunch meeting of more than 100 aid donors in Manila last month. The size of the Chinese loans came as a shock, in part because the Philippines serves as the headquarters of the Asian Development Bank, a lender dominated by Japan and the United States. China is also a shareholder.

The secretary general of the National Economic and Development Authority in the Philippines, Romulo Neri, compared the Chinese aid package to those from other sources, and noted the appealing absence of the expensive consultant fees common to Western projects.

After being a favorite of the Bush White House, the Philippine president, Gloria Macapagal Arroyo, fell out of favor when she pulled her country's troops out of Iraq in 2004.

The Chinese appeared to have quickly filled the economic breach for the Philippines and, according to a memorandum from Mr. Neri's office, a number of projects are expected to be completed when Mr. Wen visits Manila in December.

They include two toll roads and a water supply system for Manila, and further financing for a rail project already under way to connect northern Manila with four provinces.

In some countries, like Cambodia, China's construction projects seem clearly aimed at helping to assure China's access to natural resources.

Western diplomats and aid officials in Phnom Penh said they believed that Cambodia had recently granted China the rights to one of five offshore oil fields that could yield as much as $700 million to $1 billion a year. Chevron already has an agreement for exploratory drilling at one of the Cambodian fields.

Washington does not know yet, and would like to know, whether China plans to offer loans for an often-discussed deep-sea port at Sihanoukville that would allow China a convenient delivery point for its Middle East oil imports.

In resource-rich Myanmar, the former Burma, Beijing's only real competitor on the aid front is India. China has built dams and roads connecting the interior of the country to China's southern flank, and is currently reported to be working on a deep-water port on Myanmar's west coast.

Myanmar is in deep arrears to the World Bank, which said it had no loan program there. The United States offers no official aid, either, because of the repressive nature of the government.

In Laos, China has built a major road up the spine of the country, and has been influential as much by the prospect of what it might do, than by what it has actually accomplished.

After years of study on the impact on the environment, the World Bank broke ground on a environmentally controversial major dam, known as Nam Theun 2, in Laos last year, because it knew that China was ready to step in to build the dam, bank officials say.

Beyond its no-strings approach, China is often appreciated as a lender by poor countries because it is willing to take on complicated projects in distant areas that others are not.

The bridge that Mr. Ge, the engineer, and his colleagues have sweated over during the last four years — the temperature creeps up as high as 106 in April — is in one of the most underdeveloped corners of Southeast Asia, the area where the Khmer Rouge first took power.

Running from the bridge is a new, smooth 130-mile road built by Mr. Ge's team that connects Kratie, a village to the south of Stung Treng, to the Laotian border.

"When we came here four years ago, we would leave at breakfast time from Kratie and we would arrive here for dinner — eight hours," Mr. Ge said. "It now takes two hours."

Ghani Joins Race To Succeed Annan (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, September 18, 2006

Ashraf Ghani, the former Afghan finance minister, is expected to make a late entry into the race to succeed Kofi Annan as secretary-general of the United Nations, taking the number of formally declared candidates to seven.

Mr Ghani, 57, will declare his candidacy this afternoon in a meeting with Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, who is visiting the US.

"I hope to win, through ideas," Mr Ghani told the Financial Times in New York. "In the public debate so far, I have yet to see a clear articulation of vision, an analysis of the central issues and a programme for change."

The Kabul-born Mr Ghani returned to Afghanistan in October 2001 after an absence of 24 years, interrupting a stellar career at the World Bank as a UN special adviser.

From June 2002 to December 2004 he served as finance minister, securing pledges of $28bn from international donors. He left the government to become chancellor of Kabul University.

"The UN would be very lucky indeed to get him," said Hernando de Soto, economist and founder of the Institute for Liberty and Democracy in Lima.

Carlos Pascual, director of foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution, said he had "tremendous intellect, talent and capacity to mobilise the UN".

Other observers said Mr Ghani had a strong track record as an administrator but suffered from his reputation for impatience.

"Ashraf wants to reform the whole international aid system and has some fantastic ideas," said an acquaintance. "But given that he blows up at even his closest friends, I can't see him as the world's leading peace-maker."

In a second round of straw polls in the Security Council last week, Ban Ki-moon, South Korea's foreign minister, consolidated his lead. It also emerged that Vaira Vike-Freiberga, the Latvian president, would run.

Security Probes Hold Up Diplomats (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, September 18, 2006

Dozens of Foreign Service officers say their careers are in ruins because their security clearances were suspended based on suspicions or unsubstantiated accusations.

Several have accused the State Department's Diplomatic Security Service (DSS) in interviews of "abusing the security clearance process" by punishing "whistleblowing, dissenting viewpoints or minor acts of possible misfeasance unrelated to national security."

"All I want is a resolution, even if they decide to revoke my clearance," said Daniel Hirsch, whose request for an assignment in Iraq or Afghanistan has languished for three years.

"At least, I'll be able to take further action. Now, my hands are tied, and I'm just waiting while my career is being destroyed."

Mr. Hirsch, a Foreign Service officer for 21 years, has spent his career working in hardship posts in Africa, Central Asia and the Balkans, so it was only fitting that he would volunteer for the world's most dangerous places.

"I put my name in several times a year, but I've never heard back from anyone," he said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has repeatedly called for U.S. diplomats to serve in the two posts that the Bush administration deems most important for its war on terrorism.

But Mr. Hirsch is not eligible to serve in any overseas post while awaiting the outcome of a DSS investigation that began in 2003. He said he has been kept in the dark about its findings and possible outcome.

"DSS maintains that they do not even have to establish any facts in order to revoke a clearance, much less suspend one" said Mr. Hirsch, whose battle with DSS began when his wife sought marital counseling at their last post in Ashgabat, Turkmenistan.

DOJ_NMG_0064092

That counseling prompted suspicions of spousal abuse, which continue to be investigated, even though his wife has repeatedly denied any such abuse in writing.

Mr. Hirsch said the DSS dug up a brief episode from his past -- a trip he took with the group Volunteers for Israel when he was 23 and working for the CIA. The agency knew about it, he said, but DSS became suspicious about a picture of him in an Israeli military uniform.

DSS declined to comment for this article, saying only that it does everything according to the law and administrative regulations. A spokeswoman said there are up to 30 suspensions every year from among the up to 40,000 State Department employees and contractors who hold security clearances at any given time.

Diplomats with suspended clearance are given desk jobs in Washington that require little of their expertise and experience.

Les Hickman, who had his clearance suspended in November 2002, said the DSS has "no transparent procedure about how they do things."

"What happened to me was based on allegations, nothing factual," he said.

Mr. Hickman, who has been in the Foreign Service since 1978, was the U.S. consul in Amman, Jordan, when DSS discovered that one of his local Jordanian employees was taking money from visa applicants to expedite their paperwork.

That employee's duties included processing applications from Iraqis, who after the September 11 terrorist attacks required special screening, and Mr. Hickman had issued instructions that all Iraqi cases be referred to him.

Because only Mr. Hickman and the local employee had access to those applications, DSS suspected that the consul might be involved in the fraud scheme as well. His clearance was suspended, and he was relieved of his duties.

The investigation found that bribes had been taken only from Jordanians and not Iraqis, and it produced no evidence that Mr. Hickman had anything to do with the scheme. Mr. Hickman said he knew nothing about it, and the Jordanian employee said he had acted alone.

Then DSS accused Mr. Hickman of abusing his power by forbidding anyone else in the consulate to handle the Iraqi applications. Mr. Hickman said he did that because his junior officers did not understand the State Department's new instructions and made mistakes.

Mr. Hickman, who was last interviewed by DSS in June 2004, said he does not understand why the State Department allows cases such as his to drag on for years when critical diplomatic posts -- and consular positions in particular -- remain vacant.

In some cases, Mr. Hirsch said, clearances have been suspended based on nothing more than an accusation.

Bruce Knotts was the deputy chief of mission in Banjul, Gambia, in February 2004, when a local security guard accused him of making a sexual pass at him.

"That never happened, although I am gay," Mr. Knotts said, "but the guard's story was that he refused, and I turned around and left. Nevertheless, they gave me 24 hours to leave the embassy."

Last December, DSS recommended that his clearance be revoked. It denied his first appeal last month, and he is about to take his case to a panel of representatives from the offices of the undersecretary of state for management, the assistant secretary for administration and the director-general of the Foreign Service.

"This is my best shot," he said. "It's the first chance to talk to somebody other than DSS."

IMF Expected To OK Reform, More Forecast (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, September 18, 2006

SINGAPORE — The International Monetary Fund is expected today to approve a U.S.-backed overhaul giving four fast-growing countries a greater say in the global lender's operations and paving the way for broader changes by 2008.

“This was a reform summit to create the IMF of the future,” said Gordon Brown, Britain's chancellor of the exchequer and chairman of a key IMF oversight committee.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson endorsed the plan Sunday as “a small down payment” on broader reforms. The two-stage package is billed as the biggest makeover in IMF governance in 60 years.

But the plan is opposed by key economic powers, including Brazil and India, and will trigger intense skirmishing about the new formula the IMF eventually will adopt to complete its internal realignment.

Poor countries, in particular, fear their already weak representation could ebb further. “The current package of reforms does not adequately address the problem of under-representation of developing countries,” said Philippines Finance Secretary Margarito Teves, chairman of the G24 group of developing countries.

DOJ_NMG_0064093

Nations enjoying a greater say than their economic punch warrants, such as Belgium and the Netherlands, worry that any new approach will cost them. (The U.S., which has 17% of the IMF votes but accounts for 30% of the global economy, says it won't seek a larger say.)

The reform, the centerpiece of the fund's annual meeting this week, reflects the dramatic changes in the world economy in recent years, such as the rise of Asia and an enormous expansion in global capital flows.

First to benefit: China, Turkey, South Korea and Mexico, the countries suffering the biggest gap between their share of IMF votes and the size of their economies. The measure, expected to be approved today, will trigger only modest changes immediately. China, for example, will see its share of IMF votes rise to 3.7% from 2.98%.

The U.S. sees the overhaul as a critical step in preserving the IMF's legitimacy. Created in 1944 to promote global financial stability, the fund remains tilted toward the economic powers of an earlier day.

The mismatch between individual countries' economic heft and their voting shares has become increasingly controversial following the financial crises that began in Asia in 1997. Smaller countries that accepted IMF bailouts in the 1990s resented the harsh conditions the fund attached to its loans, especially since the borrowers had so little say in the fund's operations.

Many Asian and Latin American nations responded by accumulating enormous stockpiles of foreign reserves to avoid new fund borrowing. Now, without major reforms, IMF officials worry they could abandon the fund entirely in favor of new regional groupings.

Colombian Village's Unarmed Rebellion (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, September 18, 2006

ARENAS ALTAS, Colombia — Ana Hilda Vargas was living in a place called Hope when the gunmen came to her farm and gave her an ultimatum: Leave your house in 48 hours or be killed.

"Everything I built in my youth and all that I had — pigs, hens, mango and avocado trees, yucca, corn and bean fields — I lost that day," Vargas said, recalling the terrible morning in 1997 when she was thrown off her land in the village of Esperanza by paramilitary members.

It wouldn't be the last time she would hear that chilling warning.

Over the next six years, the widow, now 50, was forced from one village to another by army, right-wing paramilitary and left-wing guerrilla groups vying for control of this strategic, mineral-rich region of northwest Colombia. One of 3 million displaced Colombians, she became a statistic in one of the hemisphere's longest-running humanitarian crises.

Finally, Vargas decided she'd rather die than be rootless again. Three years ago, she joined the "peace community" of San Jose de Apartado, where a group of 1,200 peasant pacifists is taking a brave stand against the country's civil conflict.

The community of three villages, which includes Arenas Altas, where Vargas lives, was formed in 1997 after a Catholic archbishop named Isaias Duarte — who would be assassinated five years later — encouraged the farmers to say no to war. It is one of 10 such peace communities, or "humanitarian zones," in Colombia, according to Justice and Peace, a human rights advocacy organization in Bogota, the capital.

"They are making a strong moral point at great risk to themselves," said Lisa Haugaard of the Latin America Working Group, a human rights advocacy office in Washington. "It's a very hard and daring venture which seems to almost invite attacks from the various armed actors."

Vargas lives off the land in this Xanadu-like corner of Colombia, creased by river chasms and carpeted with cedar, cacao and banana trees, accessible only by mule. Her village of 200 people, hemmed in by the jungle, is a neatly laid-out collection of wood-paneled shacks bordered by the community soccer field. Pigs and mules roam freely.

She and other members disavow any contact or collaboration with armed groups, and agree to work as a collective on crops, livestock and community projects and to share what they produce. The group is self-sufficient except for small grants from outsiders to build community projects.

But the community's profession of neutrality has not shielded it from horrendous violence.

Of San Jose's nearly 1,400 original members, 178 have been killed since 1997 by armed groups looking to clear the zone of suspected collaborators, appropriate valuable land for themselves or claim transit routes for arms and drugs traffic in and out of nearby Pacific and Caribbean ports.

Because of the risks and hardships, there has been no inrush of new residents: Since its founding, about as many members have joined as have fled.

Community leader Renato Araiza estimates that 80% of the victims have been killed by the army and rightist paramilitaries, the rest by the leftist guerrillas here in the Uraba region of Antioquia state. One day last year, his 16-year-old sister was killed by guerrillas for refusing to collaborate.

DOJ_NMG_0064094

"Each side suspects us of helping the other one, and that's why they all want us to leave," said Araiza, who also has lost a cousin to the violence. "We are trying to change the logic of armed groups who think guns solve anything."

In a small park in San Josecito, another village in the community, rocks painted with the names of the victims and the dates of their deaths serve as a humble memorial. There are reminders elsewhere of the price the community has paid. A kiosk in La Union, three miles from here, was the scene of the execution-style killings of six community members by suspected paramilitaries six years ago.

"We've gotten it from all sides," said Alicia Guzman, whose husband was killed in 1992, leaving her with three daughters to raise alone.

The death toll would undoubtedly be higher if it were not for the presence of volunteer "accompaniers" provided by international groups such as San Francisco-based Fellowship for Reconciliation, or FOR, and Peace Brigades International, a British group. The death rate has tapered off since 2002, when FOR began placing two volunteers in the community on a full-time basis.

"The hope is that by being here, the armed groups won't commit acts that would create an international public relations problem. The political costs increase if something happens to us," said Paul Kozak, a 24-year-old Huntingdon, Pa., native and FOR volunteer here.

A deeply religious Catholic who once considered joining the priesthood, Kozak is a pacifist whose ambition is to work nonviolently to help solve conflicts. After graduating from a Jesuit college in the Midwest, he went to El Salvador to work with street gang members. Then he heard about the peace community's refusal to leave its land and volunteered as an accompanier.

The accompaniers have hardly made the community bulletproof.

In February 2005, San Jose's leader and co-founder, Luis Eduardo Guerra, his girlfriend and his 11-year-old son were hacked to death along with five others shortly after he announced that the peace community was expanding its boundaries to include another village. His wife had been killed the year before by an army grenade.

The killings prompted outrage among international human rights groups but, as with so many other violent deaths in this region, no suspects have been jailed nor charges filed.

Many community members blame the army for the deaths, but the government denies responsibility. The investigation has been hampered somewhat by the community's refusal to cooperate fully for fear of reprisals.

Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has little use for neutrality in what he has described as "total war" against subversive forces. Last year, he accused the community of being supporters of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, the country's largest leftist guerrilla group. Community leaders and international peace activists say Uribe's charge is baseless.

The U.S. Embassy was concerned enough about the killings of Guerra and the others to withhold human rights "certification" of Colombia for several months last year, delaying the delivery of $35 million of the $600 million in annual Plan Colombia aid aimed at fighting drugs and terrorism.

Appalled by the violence, the Organization of American States demanded that the Uribe government work with the peace community on protective measures. But two months after the killings of Guerra and the others, Uribe unilaterally established a national police base in the middle of San Jose de Apartado.

The community objected, saying any such base should have been located far outside town. Most of the residents fled and no longer consider the town of San Jose part of the neutral zone.

"No one has forgotten what happened in Bojaya," said Araiza, the community leader, referring to a town in neighboring Choco state where guerrillas in 2002 killed 119 peasants in a mortar attack after the paramilitary units army briefly occupied the village.

Three more members have been killed since the February 2005 slayings.

The Uraba region was a guerrilla stronghold until the late 1980s, when the right-wing paramilitary movement began as a landowner-financed reaction to counteract the leftists' widespread extortion, kidnappings and killings.

The two sides have fought a bloody war for dominance ever since, with ideology taking a back seat to competition for control of Colombia's drug and arms trade and real estate. Periodic advances and retreats by opposing sides have caused an ebb and flow of evacuations of poor Uraba farmers such as Vargas.

Colombia's paramilitaries are in the process of disarming, but Uribe's growing army is filling the vacuum.

In Arena Altas, Vargas scratches out a living as a sharecropper, renting land on which she raises pigs, rice and corn. Malaria, dengue fever and several varieties of poisonous snakes may prevail, but Vargas, a tiny, care-worn woman whose skin and expression reflect a life of hardship and tragedy, says she is happy to be in the countryside. During her years as a nomad, she spent time in the city of Medellin, where she says people are treated as "machines" and she nearly died of starvation and loneliness.

DOJ_NMG_0064095

"When you have no job, no place to stay and you don't know anybody, you are just an object of reproach in the city," Vargas said, adding that she was reduced to begging in the streets to survive. "At least in the country you can grow what you need to sustain yourself."

In a community where everyone seems to have lost a loved one to the arbitrary power of the gun, Vargas is no exception: Her husband and two brothers were killed in the conflict. She doesn't like talking about how they died.

Although the violence now seems deceptively distant much of the time, the village has not been forgotten by the warring sides. In March, a gun battle between guerrillas and the army broke out; as the two sides fired at each other from opposite ridges, bullets whizzed over the town in the small valley below. One soldier died in the volley.

Vargas believes the presence of Kozak and fellow FOR volunteer Gilberto Villasenor saved villagers from another forced evacuation order, or worse.

"If they weren't here, we would have been crushed," she said.

Just before the battle erupted, Vargas and the two volunteers approached troops who had gathered in the soccer field below the town. She knew guerrillas were in the area, and asked the soldiers to release a father and son they had detained and leave to avoid bloodshed.

Kozak, who described the half-hour shootout as "terrifying and deafening," spoke admiringly of Vargas' courage, saying that she put herself in harm's way to spare the village from violence, that her stubborn insistence on speaking up and staying put had furthered the cause of peace.

Vargas, who still hopes the war will end and she will one day return to her farm in Esperanza, said she had little left to lose.

"Living in the country," she said, "is the only way I know to exist."

Dictator And Diplomat (USNEWS)

By Eduardo Cue

U.S. News and World Report, September 18, 2006

MALABO, EQUATORIAL GUINEA-It was what Washington insiders call a grip 'n' grin. A beaming President Teodoro Obiang Nguema of Equatorial Guinea shook hands with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who welcomed him warmly to Washington as a "good friend" of the United States. If Rice had any qualms that April day, she didn't let them show. Obiang may head a corrupt and repressive regime, according to the State Department's own human-rights reports, but Equatorial Guinea is a growing oil producer-now No. 3 in sub-Saharan Africa after Nigeria and Angola-and an oil-needy America can't afford to be too picky about choosing its petro pals.

But half a world away, in this nation's dusty, ramshackle capital, Rice's diplomatic pragmatism doesn't cut it for two political dissidents who show their torture scars from their four years confined in the notorious Black Beach prison. "We are offended," one of them says. "For a Third World country to call a dictator a good friend is one thing, but for the United States to do it is something else."

Equatorial Guinea is one of those places-and there are others, to be sure-where Washington chooses not to be preachy when the competition for oil reserves is against countries such as China, unencumbered by concerns about human rights and corruption. And even Obiang's opponents seem resigned to that reality. "There will be no democracy here because the president of Equatorial Guinea does not want to democratize the country," the dissident asserts. "Equatorial Guinea's oil resources are in the hands of Obiang and his family. The people are living in a state of misery."

Nouveau riche. A former Spanish colony in West Africa, Equatorial Guinea was a forlorn, forgotten place eking out a living on coca and tobacco exports until oil was struck in the early 1990s. Today, it is quickly becoming a petrostate, its agriculture abandoned and its economy almost entirely dependent on rising revenues from oil and natural gas. Equatorial Guinea's offshore wells pump some 350,000 barrels a day, providing the government with a $3.8 billion windfall this year alone.

The country of roughly 1 million people-nearly double the official population estimate-is finally getting some respect. It has drawn attention from energy-hungry China, which is providing military training as well as locking up oil rights. In February, China National Offshore Oil Co. signed an oil production deal with Equatorial Guinea, following a strategic partnership between the two countries announced by Obiang during his visit to Beijing last October.

The United States, which closed its embassy in 1995, reopened a diplomatic mission in 2003. The Senate is expected to soon confirm career diplomat Donald C. Johnson to serve as the first resident ambassador here in over a decade. As part of the increased contacts, the Bush administration says it is pressing Obiang and his government for progress on issues such as political reform, anticorruption measures, and human-rights protections. "Human rights are violated systematically and on a daily basis," says Jesus Ela Abeme, a leader of the Convergence Party for Social Democracy, the country's only truly independent opposition force. "Torture is practiced daily. It is the only method of investigation and punishment."

Shielding The Allies (WSJ)

By Marshall Billingslea

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

Events of the past few months underscore how the missile threat is growing. Both North Korea and Iran, for example, have done flight testing of their missiles. Their programs, along with their developing nuclear capabilities, are raising worries in Europe and North America. Advanced and dangerous technology is still spreading -- and in the wrong hands, these technologies can be weapons of terror.

NATO has been working hard to develop protection against the emerging missile threat. An effective theater missile defense (TMD) requires, among many things, sophisticated radars to spot incoming missiles, a computerized network to command and control the defenses, and interceptor rockets to shoot down attacking missiles. We have been making progress in all of these areas.

For the past several years, we have been designing a command and control network that will be able to "plug and play" with the many different radars and interceptor systems possessed by the 26 allies. We are now ready to start building it. The NATO system will be the most sophisticated of its type in the world, and will be the only system which can integrate defenses, such as the well-known Patriot battery, from every NATO nation. Additionally, in terms of Patriot-type batteries, three allies (the United States, Germany, and Italy) have created the NATO Medium Extended Air Defense System Agency to build a "next generation" defense, called MEADS. This defense, like those of all NATO allies, will be able to work with the command and control network that we will construct. Finally, the Netherlands leads NATO's work to protect against the "low-end" of the threat spectrum, against mortars and short-range rocket attacks. These multinational efforts, in addition to what some NATO allies are doing on their own, are progressively making our troops safer from the threat of short- and medium-range missile attack.

Today NATO crosses a major milestone in its theater missile defense efforts. The Alliance is announcing, in London, the selection of a trans-Atlantic consortium of companies with whom we will begin working on the first of our major missile defense contracts. Specifically, we will soon start construction of an integration test bed that will be used to develop the NATO TMD command and control network. It will take a few years to build the test bed, and a few years more to complete the actual command and control system; there are significant technological challenges in building something able to integrate so many different national TMD systems. But once built, the test bed will not only help with our command and control project; it also can be used in the future for more sophisticated and challenging territorial missile defense work.

Many NATO allies already have the capability to deploy defenses to protect their troops against SCUD-type missiles. Indeed, as NATO MEADS shows, several nations are making their systems even better. But none of them have the ability to make their defenses work seamlessly with one another to give overlapping protection. That is what NATO will provide with its program. And, except for a handful of allies, few nations can protect against more sophisticated medium range missiles, such as the North Korean Nodong missile. Again, the NATO system that we are building will give a better degree of protection against this threat because it will let us merge the best capabilities that each nation has to offer, and "stretch" their effectiveness.

But we can, and should, do more. The threat is growing more and more sophisticated. As capable as our theater missile defenses are becoming, they are not able to protect against intercontinental range ballistic missiles (ICBMs), or even some kinds of medium-range systems. But those are precisely the types of missiles that some countries are pursuing, along with weapons of mass destruction. Only the North American part of the Alliance today has a limited shield against such weapons. The rest of Alliance territory is vulnerable.

In the face of these growing threats, our Alliance has several options. We can continue to limit NATO to dealing with the shorter range threats, leaving it to individual nations to provide defenses against the longer range threats. Or we can choose to address the whole range of threats together, and develop a common defense for the entire Alliance. It is clear that some nations, perceiving an urgent need for action, are taking steps of their own. While their efforts are entirely consistent with the blueprint that NATO has already developed for Europe's defense, and while we hope they succeed in their efforts, we also hope that all Alliance members will choose to move forward together. Certainly the door for this cooperation has been opened. This past spring, all of NATO's National Armament Directors unanimously affirmed that an effective shield for all of NATO was feasible.

NATO's greatest strength is the power of its unity -- unity of commitment and unity of action. That is why we favor a unified approach that leaves no nation behind, provides a NATO missile shield to all of our citizens, and gives the highest degree of certainty that any missile threat, whether from state adversaries or terrorists, will be defeated. In November, when the NATO heads of state and governments meet at a Summit in Latvia's capital, Riga, it is to be hoped that this matter will be discussed and that NATO will proceed with developing this urgently-needed defense.

Mr. Billingslea is NATO's assistant secretary general for defense investment.

DDT's New Friend (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, September 18, 2006

The World Health Organization announced Friday that it will begin actively promoting use of the pesticide DDT to combat malaria in developing nations. Do you believe in miracles?

Malaria is the number one killer of pregnant women and children in Africa and among the top killers in Asia and South America. It's long been known that DDT is the cheapest and most effective way to contain the disease, which is spread by infected mosquitoes. But United Nations health agencies and others have for decades resisted employing DDT under pressure from anti-pesticide environmentalists. After tens of millions of preventable malarial deaths in these poor countries, it's nice to see WHO finally come to its senses.

The agency's malaria chief, Arata Kochi, told reporters that "one of the best tools we have against malaria is indoor residual spraying. Of the dozen or so insecticides WHO has approved as safe for house spraying, the most effective is DDT." He also said, "We must take a position based on the science and the data."

Mr. Kochi's intellectual honesty is commendable and all too rare among public health officials in this debate. For decades, the science and empirical data about DDT's effectiveness have been distorted or suppressed. Nevertheless, and Rachel Carson's scare-mongering notwithstanding, there is no evidence that DDT use in the amounts necessary to ward off malarial mosquitoes is harmful to humans, wildlife or the environment. Period.

By contrast, there's plenty of evidence -- from the U.S. and Europe to Australia, India, Sri Lanka and Brazil -- that spraying DDT is the best intervention. According to Pierre Guillet, another WHO official at Friday's press conference, South Africa temporarily stopped using DDT in 1996 because green groups were opposed, not because it wasn't working. Malaria takes a heavy toll on a country's economy by discouraging foreign investment and incapacitating otherwise productive people, so these anti-DDT alarmists have been helping to impoverish those they don't kill. There is something other-worldly, or worse, about well-heeled greens trying to deny the world's poorest people the very tool used by rich nations to eradicate this disease.

Even if WHO's decision won't change those minds, its stamp of approval on pesticide use matters in the public health world. Other organizations, ranging from the World Bank to Aid for International Development to Doctors Without Borders, look to WHO for guidance and will now likely reassess their own guidelines. The U.S. is typically the largest donor to these international agencies, and the recent efforts of Republican Senators Sam Brownback of Kansas and Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, who have called for DDT intervention and more responsible allocation of aid dollars generally, no doubt played a role in WHO's decision.

One insecticide won't end malaria, and DDT's proponents don't claim it will. But by keeping more people alive and healthy, DDT can help create the conditions for the only lasting solution, which is economic growth and development. It's encouraging that even a U.N. health agency seems to have figured that out.

Another Green Revolution? (WP)

The Washington Post, September 18, 2006

ONE GENERATION ago, what became known as "the green revolution" doubled food production in parts of Asia and Latin America, reducing malnutrition and lifting millions out of poverty. Now the Rockefeller Foundation, whose scientists helped to lay the groundwork for that breakthrough, is teaming with the Bill & Melinda Gates Foundation to repeat the success in Africa. Last week the two charities announced an initial pledge of $150 million over five years to start down that road. The money will boost African seed-breeding programs that develop higher-yielding strains of local crops. It will fund the training of African scientists so that the seed-breeding programs can be enlarged. And it will bolster the distribution networks that bring seeds and fertilizer to farmers.

Legions of development experts have locked horns with Africa's rural poverty and then retreated hurt. The continent's physical capital is rudimentary: Irrigation systems and rural roads to get food to market are scarce. Its human capital is no better: African farmers are held back by sickness and illiteracy. Its social capital constitutes another handicap: The legal framework needed to permit the licensing of seed technologies to private distributors is often missing, and perverse regulations often make it difficult to farm for profit. Add in water scarcity and soil erosion, and you can see why previous calls for a green revolution in Africa have come to little.

Nonetheless, the two charities are right to be trying. The spectacular failure of rural development programs in Africa in the 1970s so discouraged donors that they turned their backs on agriculture, preferring to focus on macroeconomic problems or on education and health. But farming is the dominant form of work in Africa, and the continent won't break out of its poverty unless crop yields somehow rise. The Rockefeller Foundation already has a presence in East Africa, and its grants have resulted in some progress: 20 new seed varieties and a fix for the broken licensing program that had prevented the dissemination of seeds in Kenya. The partnership with the Gates Foundation will add money and ambition to these efforts.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Bush Calls For Congress To Pass Bill Clarifying Detainee Rights. President Bush challenged Congress to pass a bill spelling out the rules for interrogating terrorist suspects in an energetic press conference. Media coverage focused almost exclusively on Bush's remarks about terrorist interrogation and characterized the GOP debate over policy as a serious split on a key 2006 election issue. Bush's remarks received significant attention by prominent media outlets as it was covered in full segments by all three network TV news programs early in their broadcasts and by the major US newspapers. ABC World News (9/15, story 2, 0:50, Snow) reported, "There were fireworks at the White House today where President Bush reacted to a rebellion on Capitol Hill, a group of Republican Senators opposing his attempts to clarify part the Geneva Conventions which spell out the rights of terror suspects. President Bush said the current relations written more than 50 years ago are too vague and could effectively end an effective interrogation program."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 4, 3:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported Bush "stepped up the pressure big time, warning that time is running out. From the White House, here's Jim Axelrod." CBS (Axelrod) added that "an adamant Mr. Bush said the dispute threatens to shut down a CIA interrogation program he says has stopped terror plots in the planning." President Bush: "So Congress has got a decision to make. You want the program to go forward or not?" Axelrod: "But a chorus of critics has emerged, led by Republican senator John McCain" and former Secretary of State Colin Powell and if Bush "was trying to get everybody back in line today, he didn't. Late this afternoon, Senator McCain said there is nothing in his bill that would require the CIA interrogation program to be shut down. So, Katie, President Bush is now locked in a dispute about how to handle prisoners of war with America's best known prisoner of war, and a Republican at that."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "there is a battle going on in the United States within the Republican party over the treatment of terrorism suspects. In an often contentious news conference President Bush laid down the law as he sees it." NBC (Gregory) added, "Mr. Bush shot back at his former Secretary of State Powell who criticized the White House in a letter writing the world is begin to doubt the morale basis of our fight against terrorism." President Bush: "It is unacceptable to think that there is any kind of comparison between the behavior of the United States of America and the action of Islamic extremists who kill innocent women and children to achieve an objective."

The New York Times (9/16, Rutenberg, Stolberg, 1.21M) describes Bush as "impassioned" and "combative" and says, "It was also a debate Mr. Bush had hoped to have this week exclusively with Democrats as he and his party's leadership set out to draw unflattering distinctions between Republicans and Democrats on fighting terrorism for the fall elections." But "Bush spent Friday in a second day of heavy debate, casting some of the most respected voices on military matters in his own party as hindering the fight against terrorism. As of late Friday there seemed to be no break in the impasse, even as White House officials worked behind the scenes to build new support in the Senate for the legislation the president wants."

Casting Bush's remarks in a negative light the Washington Post (9/16, A1, Baker, 748K) reports, "An irritated Bush, raising his voice and gesturing sharply at a Rose Garden news conference, excoriated legislation passed by a Senate panel Thursday that is intended to conform U.S. detainee practices with the Geneva Conventions. Bush insisted on legislation more specifically defining what is banned so intelligence officers would not worry about being charged with war crimes." But Bush's "threat to end the interrogation program seemed to make little impression on the Republican dissidents" and "a fifth Republican senator, Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), joined the rebellion against the president." Meanwhile Democrats "seized on the president's remarks yesterday. 'Instead of picking fights with Colin Powell, John McCain and other military experts, President Bush should change course, do what the American people expect and finally give them the real security they deserve,' said Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.)."

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Gerstenzang, Levey, 918K) reports Bush "in animated and unusually forceful language, urged members of Congress to approve his plan for interrogating detainees and trying them before military commissions." His "pointed declarations underscored the gap between the White House and the rebelling Republican senators at a time when the GOP hoped to enter the fall election season with a unified position on national security. In particular, Bush's comments emphasized his differences with Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a former Vietnam prisoner of war and likely candidate for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, who has opposed Bush's interrogation policy in the past as overly harsh."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Hutcheson) in an article titled "Bush Threatens To Shut CIA Interrogation Program" says Bush was using "fear to pressure lawmakers" and "Bush cast the dispute as a choice between protecting the nation or leaving it vulnerable to another terrorist attack. His critics, including many retired military officers and former Secretary of State Colin Powell, say his approach violates American values, undermines the moral foundation of the war on terrorism and increases the risk that U.S. prisoners of war will be abused."

The AP (9/16, Hunt) in an article titled "Bush Fights GOP Revolt Over Terror Bill" reports, "Bush fought back Friday against a Republican revolt in the Senate over tough anti-terror legislation and rejected warnings that the United States had lost the high moral ground to adversaries. 'It's flawed logic,' he snapped." As part of its coverage the AP listed the military records of Sens. McCain, Graham Warner and former Secretary of State Powell.

Bloomberg (9/16, Dodge, Rowley) reports details similar in other coverage of how "Bush raised the ante" and notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters that the Supreme Court decision created 'confusion and concern' about Central Intelligence Agency interrogation techniques." Gonzales said, "We're going to capture additional high- value detainees" and "we will need to get information from them." Meanwhile, "Graham, in a statement, took issue with the president's characterization of the legislation. 'What is being billed as "clarifying" our treaty obligations will be seen as "withdrawing" from the treaty obligations,' he said."

The Washington Times (9/16, Curl, 88K) quotes Sen. Charles Schumer saying, "When conservative military men like John McCain, John Warner, Lindsey Graham and Colin Powell stand up to the president, it shows how wrong and isolated the White House is. … These military men are telling the president that in the war on terror you need to be both strong and smart, and it is about time he heeded their admonitions." And "Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid…said Mr. Bush should bow to the 'bipartisan process under way in the United States Senate.'"

The Financial Times (9/16, Daniel, Dombey) in an article titled "Bush On Defensive Over Anti-terrorism Measures" notes the EU "added to the pressure on the White House when it denounced as 'illegal' the secret CIA prison whose existence Mr Bush acknowledged last week." But "Bush appeared to create room for negotiations with Congress when he sidestepped the chance to pledge that he would veto any bill if it matched the one passed by 15 votes to 9 in the Senate armed services committee, and said his key criterion for success was one question: 'That the intelligence community must be able to tell me this bill enables this vital programme to continue.'"

Administration Seen As Using Rules To Skirt Compliance. The Washington Post (9/16, A3, Smith, 748K) in an analysis of the notes, "On the surface, Bush's proposal requires that interrogations in the previously secret CIA prison system comply with legal rules written by Congress last year. Privately, the administration has concluded that doing so would allow the CIA to keep using virtually all the interrogation methods it has employed for the past five years, the officials said." Examining the "ironies" of the debate the Post says, "The administration says its intent is to define the explicit meaning of Common Article 3 so that CIA officers know exactly what they can do. But the senior official who addressed the legal issue yesterday said the standard the administration prefers is 'context-sensitive,' a phrase that suggests an endlessly shifting application of the rules."

Questions Raised About JAG Support For Clarifying Rules. The New York Times (9/16, A1, Mazzetti, Lewis, 1.21M) in a front page story reports on the Administration's behind-the-scenes maneuvering to get approval for its proposal on terrorist interrogations from the Pentagon's top JAG officers, who are described as at odds with the Administration over terrorists' rights. Before the "crucial Senate vote on the Bush administration plan," Pentagon general counsel William Haynes summoned the JAGs "to enlist the lawyers on the administration's side by asking whether any would object to signing a letter lending their support to aspects of the White House proposal over which they had voiced little concern." They "agreed, but only after hours of negotiating over specific words, so that they would not appear to be wholly endorsing the plan." Some were left "embittered" by the meeting which "prompted loud protests from Republican senators opposed to the plan" But Air Force deputy judge advocate general Maj. Gen. Charles

Dunlap said, "I didn't have any problem signing what I signed. … How people use it and what they use it for I can't control."

CIA Concerned About Liability. The New York Times (9/16, Shane, 1.21M) reports the CIA is concerned "that officers could be vulnerable to lawsuits, or even criminal prosecution, for actions they believed at the time complied with administration policy." The White House proposal "would be retroactive to Sept. 11, 2001, while senators working with Mr. Warner say their approach avoids dealing with past events because of legal and constitutional concerns. The senators say they believe that past abuses should be reviewed case by case." Experts believe it is "highly unlikely that intelligence officers could be prosecuted in American courts for their actions in interrogating terror suspects. Similarly, they said, lawsuits filed by former prisoners would probably face insurmountable hurdles in American courts." Yet "some said future investigations by Congress or a C.I.A. inspector general were quite possible and could bring the daunting prospect of high legal fees or devastating news coverage."

Bush Rules Would Hamper Prosecutions Of US War Crimes. In its analsysis the Los Angeles Times (9/16, Zajac, Simpson, 918K) reports, "When the Muslim world was first inflamed over images of abuse from the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, President Bush took the lead in a campaign to minimize the damage by pledging that his government would speak through its actions." Yet "more than two years later, provisions in Bush's proposed legislation for detainee interrogations and terrorism tribunals could hamper potential criminal prosecutions in some of the 17 abuse investigations from Iraq and Afghanistan pending before federal prosecutors in Virginia." Experts "said Bush's proposal would retroactively weaken the U.S. law against war crimes, possibly making it more difficult to win criminal indictments in those cases." The Los Angeles Times (9/16, 918K) reports also publishes a Q&A column on the military tribunal bill.

Senators Opposed To Bush Plan Face Political Risk. McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Talev) reports that by opposing bush on terrorist interrogations "McCain could alienate conservative Republicans when he needs them most. For several years he's worked hard to gain the trust of conservative Bush allies skeptical of his maverick streak" yet "now he's breaking with his party's president on an issue that threatens to undermine Republican strategy for November's congressional elections -- following Bush's leadership on national security. That could hurt him." And "Graham could reap opposition to his re-election within his South Carolina base. Many conservative activists already were frustrated with him for blocking a conservative judicial nominee's confirmation and supporting legislation that would allow illegal immigrants to stay in the country." McClatchy notes, "If Democrats win control of the House of Representatives or the Senate in November, all three senators could suffer the sting of blame."

Rear Admiral Harris Describes "War Inside The Wire." In the Wall Street Journal's Weekend Interview (9/16, Taranto, 2.03M), Commander of JTF Guantanamo Rear Adm. Harry Harris is profiled. The Journal sympathetically quotes Harris's view that the Gitmo detainees, rather than being victims of abuse, "have kept fighting even while in captivity." The inmates "have brought more-restrictive conditions on themselves, through suicide, sabotage and other disruptive actions."

Star-Ledger Blasts Bush Stand. The Newark Star-Ledger (9/16) editorializes, "Such views [like Colin Powell's] rile the president but don't sway him. That's frightening because the dangers he sees ahead are real. He's mistaken to think dealing with them harshly is the same as dealing with them effectively."

WTimes Editorial Questions McCain. The Washington Times (9/16, 88K) editorializes, "Mr. McCain should explain why he is endangering a vital interrogation program that has saved many American lives."

Europe, US Are Deadlocked On Air Security.

The Financial Times (9/16, Burns, Bounds, Cameron) reports, "Attempts to find transatlantic agreement on counter-terror measures for the airline industry are floundering as governments and aviation experts argue about which security rules would be most effective." The UK and the US have been stricter than most Europeans "since British police foiled an alleged plot to blow up transatlantic jets with liquid explosives." The EU's "top negotiator on Friday warned that transatlantic travellers faced chaos next month unless the US dropped its demands for greater access to airline passenger data from the European Union."

Albany Terror Trial Jurors Hear FBI Surveillance Recordings. The Albany Times-Union (9/16, Lyons) reported, "The spiritual leader of an Albany mosque warned an undercover FBI informant that he needed to be careful and quiet about his support of terrorists who were purported to be planning to kill the president of Pakistan, according to government transcripts of their secretly recorded conversations." At the trial of Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain on Friday, jurors "listened to hours of tapes recorded during the sting." The Times-Union added, "Special Agent Timothy Coll, who headed the investigation, testified Friday that Hossain told him he thought the informant 'was joking'" about the proposed shoulder-launched missile deal. "Aref was also questioned following his arrest and told agents that the money transactions were a loan and that 'his role was a witness,' Coll said."

Californian Accused Of Yemeni Terrorist Links. The AP (9/16, Munoz) reports, "A California man accused of trying to supply stolen U.S. military equipment and defense secrets to Yemen was denied bail Friday after a prosecutor said he had ties to a terrorist financier who plotted to help al-Qaida and Hamas. The allegations emerged at a hearing for Amen Ahmed Ali, 56." The suspect "was arrested Sept. 7 at his cigarette shop in Bakersfield. He and two other men, all Yemeni-born U.S. citizens, were charged in the case." The Los Angeles Times/AP (9/16) runs an abbreviated version of this story.

The Bakersfield Californian (9/16, Shepard) reported, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Faller said in court that Ali's address book contained the name of Sheikh Mohammed Ali Hassan Al-Moayad," who "was convicted in 2005 of providing material support to terrorist organizations and is serving a 75-year sentence in a Colorado prison. Faller also told the court Ali may face an additional charge of espionage after evidence found in a search of his home last week indicated he may have been working as an undercover agent for the Yemen government." Bakersfield Yemenis Abdul Jobah and Nashwan Alrowhani said that "following Ali's arrest last week, the FBI searched the homes of at least 15 members of the Bakersfield Yemeni community," and Ali's lawyer "said many in the Yemeni community felt the FBI were coming down hard on them. Alrowhani said FBI agents searched his home, froze his bank account and took his passport. His account was released and his passport returned, he said."

Australia Denies Army Chief Visited Philippines In Search Of Bali Bombers. The AFP (9/16) reports, "Australia's defence ministry has denied its army chief is on a secret visit to the southern Philippines this week to be briefed on a hunt for two suspects in the 2002 Bali bombings that left 200 people dead." Australia insists that Lt. Gen. Peter Leahy is on a "scheduled exchange of visits."

Yemen Foils Attacks. The Financial Times (9/16, Saleh) reports, "Yemen said on Friday it had foiled two attempts to blow up oil facilities in different parts of the country, days after al-Qaeda urged Muslims to target western interests in the Gulf. ... Yemen has been trying to shed its image as a haven for Islamic militants since 9/11, but the escape in February of 23 al-Qaeda operatives from a high-security jail in the country raised doubts in the United States about its commitment to the war against terrorism."

The New York Times (9/16, Fattah, 1.21M) reports, "Yemeni officials said an investigation was under way to determine who was behind the attacks, which came days after one of Al Qaeda's top leaders, Ayman al-Zawahri, threatened strikes against oil facilities in the Middle East that he blamed for 'stealing Muslim oil.' By late Friday, no group had claimed responsibility." The Times adds, "The attacks occurred just days before voters are to cast ballots in a hotly contested election pitting President Ali Abdullah Saleh against four challengers. Political analysts accused the government on Friday evening of capitalizing on the incidents to help Mr. Saleh's standing."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Still Fails To Track Foreign Visitors. McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Taylor) reports, "After spending $900 million to set up a database to track foreign travelers arriving in America, the government still doesn't know how many of them stay in the country illegally because the system is incomplete and snarled by controversy. The US-VISIT system screens up to 2 million foreigners a month as they arrive at all international airports and seaports and at most border crossings. ... But 10 years after Congress first ordered the system, the Department of Homeland Security hasn't set up a way for the same visa-holders to check out when they leave the country. Instead, the agency continues to test it at 14 airports and two seaports."

Security Expert Decries ID Chip In New Passports. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/16, 748K), security expert Bruce Schneier warns passport holders, "In many countries, including the United States, passports will soon be equipped with RFID chips. And you don't want one of these chips in your passport." The chips allegedly present the risk of "surreptitious access: Your passport information might be read without your knowledge or consent by a government trying to track your movements, a criminal trying to steal your identity or someone just curious about your citizenship." Schneier urges passport holders to renew their passports immediately, so that "with your new passport you can wait another 10 years for an RFID passport, when the technology will be more mature, when we will have a better understanding of the security risks and when there will be other technologies we can use to cut the risks."

Congress Will Restructure FEMA But Leave It Within DHS. The New York Times (9/16, Lipton, 1.21M) reports, "Congressional negotiators agreed Friday on a plan to restructure the Federal Emergency Management Agency that would give it somewhat more clout and responsibility, but still not as much as it had during the Clinton administration. The compromise effectively ends the campaign by some in Congress to separate FEMA from the Department of Homeland Security and re-establish it as an independent agency reporting directly to the president." The Times goes on to report, "Under the agreement, which will be inserted into a budget bill that Congress is scheduled to vote on this month, the FEMA director would still report to the secretary of homeland security, as he has since FEMA lost its independent status in 2003. But the director, now R. David Paulison, would also be the principal adviser to the president for emergency management, a new role modeled on the relationship between the president and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who also report to the defense secretary. In a major disaster, the president could designate the FEMA director as a cabinet-level official.

The Washington Post (9/16, A2, Hsu, 748K) reports the agreement "does not clarify whether FEMA would get more money to implement the scores of changes recommended by several post-Katrina reviews. 'It is crucial that we strengthen FEMA and provide it with the resources and tools necessary to help us be better prepared for the next hurricane or disaster. This agreement will move this legislation forward,'" Sen. Susan Collins said "in announcing the deal with" Sen. Joseph Lieberman. The compromise "now moves to a House-Senate panel that this month is hammering out a must-pass $33 billion Homeland Security spending bill."

DHS USCIS Has Nearly Eliminated Immigration Processing Backlog. The Washington Times (9/16, Dinan, 88K) reports, "The immigration service has nearly achieved its goal of processing immigration applications within an average of six months and will make an October deadline for eliminating the backlog, agency Director Emilio T. Gonzalez said yesterday. 'We're on track to get where we need to be, where we want to be,' Mr. Gonzalez, the head of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS), which is part of the Homeland Security Department, told reporters yesterday." According to the Times, "The backlog elimination has been a major test for the agency that would have to administer any future guest-worker program, and members of Congress have been watching the effort's progress closely. However, the goal will be reached in part because the agency no longer counts cases that are outside its control, such as those awaiting an FBI check." The Times notes President Bush and Congress "approved a $500 million package to pay for reducing the backlog. That allowed USCIS to shift employees and hire temporary employees to help. 'We have every expectation we'll be able to make the president a very happy person,' Mr. Gonzalez said yesterday."

Exploitation Of Illegals Injured At Work Called "Rampant." McClatchy (9/16, Chandler) reports, "Thousands of illegal workers…are hurt on the job every year in America, but don't get the compensation that's promised by law in every state. Bosses often fire them, threaten them with deportation and commit an array of other misdeeds to avoid responsibility for workers' injuries. Some insurers refuse to pay their claims, citing reasons related to their illegal status. As a result, injured workers often go without medical care or go to emergency rooms for treatment - and taxpayers get stuck with the bills. … From field hands to garment workers to poultry processors to construction crews, injuries abound in industries that rely on an estimated 7 million undocumented workers, often to do dirty and dangerous jobs. Yet those who are undocumented are frequently cheated out of benefits that American workers have taken for granted for nearly a century, a McClatchy Newspapers investigation has found. Federal labor officials haven't studied whether undocumented workers are wrongfully being denied compensation. But the exploitation is rampant, according to interviews with scores of illegal workers, employers, workers' comp lawyers, health care providers and workplace experts, and a review of lawsuits and workers' comp claims."

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Plans To Ring Baghdad With Trenches.

TV coverage, other than a CBS News story about KBR contractors killed in Iraq, avoided Iraq today, with much of it being devoted to the debate over detainee treatment. Both the New York Times and Washington Post devoted front-page stories to the new security plan. The New York Times (9/16, Wong, 1.21M) reports, "The Iraqi government plans to seal off Baghdad within weeks by ringing it with a series of trenches and setting up dozens of traffic checkpoints to control movement in and out of the violent city of seven million people, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Friday. The effort is one of the most ambitious security projects this year, with cars expected to be funneled through 28 checkpoints." The Times says skeptically, "It is unclear whether Baghdad can really be sealed off, given the city's circumference of about 60 miles. With so much terrain, guerrillas might find areas that are unconstrained by the trenches and checkpoints. On the main roads, traffic could be snarled for miles, especially in the final days of Ramadan."

The Washington Post (9/16, Raghavan, 748K) devotes a front-page article to the "security ring," describing it as "a massive effort to seal off Baghdad with a ring of reinforced checkpoints, berms, trenches, barriers and fences." Building a ring would be "the most ambitious security endeavor yet" in Baghdad. The Post also lists potential problems: "Such efforts are among the methods that counterinsurgency experts recommend to gain control over population movements. Yet some analysts also say that the United States has never taken what many of them contend is an essential first step: conducting a thorough census, then issuing identity cards and requiring all people to carry them at all times. It is unclear whether the planned complex of berms, trenches and checkpoints will be effective in Baghdad, a megalopolis of 81 square miles that includes vast stretches of farmland and open terrain. Insurgents and members of private militias might still be able to avoid the checkpoints, and even if they don't, U.S. and Iraqi forces still face the problem of identifying them. The Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which begins in October, is likely to increase the flow of people in and out of Baghdad."

The AP (9/16, Santana) says that the plan "comes as more than 130 people were slain in two days -- either killed in attacks or tortured and dumped in rivers or on the city's streets." Also, US Ambassador to the UN John Bolton "told the Security Council on Thursday that the average number of weekly attacks increased 15 percent and Iraqi casualties increased by 51 percent, compared with the previous three months."

US Is Reportedly "Frustrated" With Pace Of Change In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Richter, 918K) reports, "Four months after Iraq's new government took office, U.S. officials are growing impatient with leaders in Baghdad and pushing them to move more quickly on the difficult agenda confronting them." Despite officially professed satisfaction with Prime Minister Maliki, one official said, "The rhetoric has to be matched by concrete action." In the last five days, "142 [execution-style] killings have been reported." Some unnamed officials, "frustrated by the lack of progress, have voiced a private view in recent weeks that Iraq might be better off under a traditional Middle Eastern strongman." The Times notes obstacles facing Maliki, such as the task of "trying to lead a fractious government with only the narrowest base of public support" and the "reluctance of other countries to help what they see as the weak government of a troubled land."

Overburdened Iraqi Officials Cannot Investigate Murders. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Moore, Spiegel, 918K) reports on the impossibility of investigating the surge of homicides in Iraq: "There is no shortage of potential evidence: handcuffs pulling the inert shoulders taut, blindfolds, a crowd of witnesses who saw the victim before masked assailants gunned him down in the street or stuffed him into a police car. But in Iraq, there seems to be neither interest nor time for that. There are too many bodies and too many killers with too many ties to the nation's warring political factions." Factions differ on the source of the recently increased violence, with the Times quoting leaders blaming rival sects' militias and even alleging that the US is "inventing the crisis."

US Soldier Is Missing After Blast. The AP (9/16, Santana) reports, "A U.S. soldier was missing Friday, a day after a suicide truck bombing killed two soldiers and wounded another 30 west of Baghdad, U.S. military officials said. Officials refused to "say whether they believed the soldier had been abducted or whether he may have been killed in the attack." Thursday was an "especially bloody day for U.S. forces," given the deaths of five US soldiers.

Bush Regrets Situation In Iraq Does Not Allow Troop Withdrawal. In its coverage of Bush's remarks on detainee interrogation NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 3, 2:35, Gregory, 9.87M) also noted Bush ruled "out a meeting with Iran's leader and on Iraq, said he regretted troop levels were rising and not falling as he thought they would be by now." President Bush: "It looked like it would be the case until the violence started rising in Baghdad."

Chiarelli Says US Won't Abandon Anbar Fight. The New York Times (9/16, Shanker, 1.21M) reports, "The American military in Iraq will not abandon the fight against insurgents in Sunni-dominated Anbar Province despite a shift of troops toward Baghdad...the second-ranking commander in Iraq said Friday." Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli "stressed that the American military has not forsaken Anbar Province" but described Baghdad as "our main effort." He also interpreted the Devlin report to mean "that there are economic and political conditions that have to improve out at Al Anbar." According to Chiarelli, although Iraq is not in a civil war, "the threat has shifted from terrorist and insurgent violence to battling bombings and murders driven by sectarian tensions."

The AP (9/16, Burns) reports similarly, "U.S. officials say they have not written off Iraq's troubled Anbar province -- the country's largest, and one of its most violent -- but neither are they sending more U.S. troops there to battle the insurgents." The AP adds in an implicit questioning of the troop levels for Anbar, "The Pentagon said that from May 20, when the new Iraqi government was seated, through Aug. 6 there was an average of more than 30 attacks a day in Anbar -- more than any other province in the country and slightly more than in Baghdad. Of the 147,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, about 30,000 are in Anbar."

McClatchy Newspapers (9/16, Brown) reports, "Lt. Gen. Pete Chiarelli acknowledged that a leaked classified intelligence report recommended that another division, about 10,000 to 15,000 troops, was needed to stabilize Anbar province, but he said the main effort now was to secure Baghdad." Chiarelli "expressed dismay over the leak of the report," a sentiment that went unreported in other articles.

Small Anbar Force Is Again Contrasted With Level Of Violence. The Washington Times/AP (9/16) reports that Chiarelli said, "The main effort is Baghdad, and we must ensure that we weight the main effort." Like the AP article by Burns quoted above, it notes that Anbar had more attacks daily than any other province but has 30,000 of the 147,000 US troops in Iraq.

Commanders Make "Difficult Trade-Offs." The Washington Post (9/16, Tyson, 748K) reports his remarks too, saying in its headline that Anbar is called "secondary." The bleak Post article uses the terms "sober talk" and "dire warning" to characterize Chiarelli's videoconference with reporters: "Implicit in Chiarelli's remarks on Anbar was the idea that, given limited overall troop numbers in Iraq, American commanders must make difficult trade-offs as they concentrate forces in one troubled region at a time." Characterizing the intensity of war in Anbar, the Post comments, "More than 900 U.S. troops have been killed in Anbar since the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, compared with more than 600 in Baghdad, according to the Web site iCasualties.org." Like the Times, the Post quotes Chiarelli on the need to find jobs for "angry young men" to pacify them.

Army Reserve Unit Prepares For Return To Iraq. In a late story, the Philadelphia Inquirer (9/15, Colimore, 399K) reports, "Three years ago, they were called up to serve in Iraq, in dangerous places such as Mosul and Hilla, south of Baghdad. Many of them came under sniper fire in convoys ... Now, members of the Army's Norristown-based 358th Civil Affairs Brigade are among the relatively few reservists heading back for a second tour of duty." The Inquirer

Newsweek Covers First Post-Extension Death In Stryker Brigade. Newsweek (9/15, Hastings, 3.12M) in a web-only story reports on the death of Cpl. Alexander Jordan, killed by a sniper on the "33rd day of the Battle of Baghdad." His unit had had its deployment extended by four months. Newsweek describes the grief of the soldiers and their Iraqi interpreter and says pessimistically, "The civil war, though, has likely already begun. Or so it seemed in the first neighborhood they secured." The soldiers realize "that much of the sectarian violence was originating in Sadr City, an area that has been basically off limits to Coalition forces. The soldiers even took friendly bets on when and if they would do a full-scale operation in the impoverished Shiite neighborhood. 'We're handcuffing ourselves,' said one officer."

Dorgan Probes Death Of Civilian Contractors In Iraq. CBS Evening News (9/15, story 8, 3:05, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We report almost everyday on the mounting US military death toll in Iraq, but you might not realize just how many civilians working for private contractors have died there. More than 600 to date. The question tonight, did one contractor ignore repeated warnings and send its workers into a danger zone that cost many of them their lives?" CBS (Keteyian) added, "KBR denies the charges and says, like the army, it should be immune from lawsuits. ... A top Senate Democrat finds this behavior outrageous." Sen. Byron Dorgan: "I think these are all serious issues and in some cases life or death issues and I think there needs to be and the American people would expect there to be accountability." Keteyian: "On Monday, Senator Dorgan plans to find out who is accountable when he holds a hearing on this very incident."

Iraqi Ambassador Says US Is "Stonewalling." The Detroit Free Press/AP (9/15, Karush) reports, "Iraq's ambassador to Washington on Friday accused U.S. officials of stonewalling him in his efforts to find out what happened to his cousin, who was killed by the military near Haditha. ... 'It sounds to me very much like bureaucratic stonewalling,' [Samir Sumaidaie] told The Associated Press in an interview in suburban Detroit, where he was meeting with members of the area's large Iraqi community." The AP adds that a "request for comment" was left with the DOD press office. About five sites, all in Michigan, carried versions of this AP story.

Mystery Deepens Around Missing Marine. The New York Times (9/16, Sink, 1.21M) reports that on the second day of the search for Lance Cpl. Lance Hering in Colorado, "investigators began to have their suspicions and have since said that it was all probably a hoax and that the marine might be on the run." After a five-day search ended, "[Hering's friend] confessed to detectives that it had all been a set-up to help Corporal Hering avoid returning to Iraq." A Boulder County sheriff's official cited Hering's access to $2,000 and past criminal record as "red flags."

Iraqi President Visits Aspen. The AP (9/16) reports, "Iraqi President Jalal Talabani spent Friday in this posh mountain resort [Aspen] as part of an annual conference sponsored by a New York investment company, The Associated Press has learned. ... His arrival was first reported by the Aspen Daily News and KREX-TV in Grand Junction." Talabani "was expected to travel to New York this weekend and then to Washington for a private meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice next week, Assistant Secretary Kristen Silverberg said."

NATO Chief Renews Call For More Troops In Afghanistan. The AP (9/16, Ames) reports, "NATO's top commander renewed an appeal Friday for allies to urgently provide up to 2,500 troops for the battle with Taliban insurgents in southern Afghanistan, but officials said it likely would take two weeks before governments reply." Poland's offer of 900 troops was termed "welcome," but NATO reportedly needs reinforcements urgently "to pursue the Taliban before the onset of winter enabled them to take refuge in the hills." NATO member states "have been reluctant to commit forces, as they already are stretched by other international missions and are worried about the risk of high casualties from the tough Taliban resistance."

Tensions Overshadow Gains In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (9/16, Constable, 748K) reports pessimistically, "Despite scattered gains by international troops fighting Taliban insurgents in the country's south, Afghan and foreign analysts here have voiced concern that a recent peace initiative is backfiring and that lapsed Afghan militias could be drawn into the conflict unless it is quickly quelled and replaced by aid and protection." The Post asserts, "The insurgency continues to spread beyond the south. ... But the most urgent need, military officials and diplomats said, is to contain the southern conflict, defeat the insurgents in key districts of Kandahar and Helmand, and begin providing support to civilians there." One "Western military official" said, "We can't just keep fighting endless battles without having something to offer the next day."

4 Taliban Members Killed. The AP (9/16) reports, "About 60 suspected Taliban militants attacked a police checkpoint in southern Afghanistan, starting a battle in which four militants died, police said Saturday." The AP concludes that NATO forces have "been surprised by the ferocity of Taliban resistance and have sustained more than 30 deaths. NATO has said enemy casualties run into hundreds."

Body Counts Arouse Skepticism. The AP (9/15, Pennington) reports, "NATO's estimate of Taliban killed this month has created skepticism and worry in Afghanistan, with local officials saying that either the militant force has grown bigger than imagined — or too many innocent Afghans are being killed." However, "NATO has stood by its battle assessments as solid, even conservative." Military analyst Andrew Krepinevich "said that given the circumstances in which the Taliban had massed in one place, the figures given by NATO were plausible and could well be an underestimation, because of the effort the Islamic militia makes to bury their dead quickly."

Arrests Of Opium Traders Coming "Soon." The AFP (9/16) reports, "Some of the key players behind Afghanistan's record-high opium trade are expected to be brought before court over the next year ... The arrests would be vital to a strategy to stem the increasingly sophisticated narcotics trade before links between insurgents and drug traffickers become entrenched, Thomas A. Schweich [US deputy assistant secretary of state for international narcotics] said on Friday." AFP quotes some encouraging statistics cited by Schweich but adds, "There have been doubts about the will of the authorities to round up the kingpins of the trade, as some of them are allegedly in top positions in government."

General Eikenberry Describes Afghanistan's "Catch-22." In the Wall Street Journal (9/16, White, 2.03M), Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry discusses the security problems facing the US and NATO in Afghanistan. Ultimately, the root of the problem is "a big one," namely, the 52% share of opium exports in the country's GDP. The money "support[s] an insurgency [that] has ... basically halted all of the infrastructure build-out" needed to wean farmers off the drug.

Greenberg Defends Decision To Go To War Against Iraq. In an op-ed in the Washington Times (9/16, 88K), commentator Paul Greenberg sarcastically says of war critic Sen. Jay Rockefeller, "If only the United States and its allies had not invaded Iraq, Swami Rockefeller explains, the world would be a better place today -- even if Saddam Hussein were still in power." Greenberg likens Rockefeller's claim to those who let Hitler keep rearming Germany and says, "Reasonable men may agree or disagree with the president's policy, but fair-minded Americans will recognize his sincerity. For there is no reason other than honest belief for this president to pursue a course that has imperiled his popularity and divided the country."

Journalist Describes "Winners And Losers" Of 9/11, Slams Wolfowitz. In a commentary for the Financial Times (9/16), journalist Jurek Martin names those he considers "winners and losers" of 9/11. He blasts former deputy secretary Paul Wolfowitz, saying, "As the world now knows to its cost, the neo-cons, using 9/11 as their pretext, hijacked American foreign policy and still have not lost full control of it. They did not even have to tell the truth to justify their goals. ... Wolfowitz had no compunction in blaming a cowardly press that didn't have the guts to go out and report the good news. ... This was the man who never set foot outside Baghdad's Green Zone without protection from battalions of American troops."

Congressman Shays Struggles To Explain Reversal On Iraq. In Newsweek (9/15, 3.12M), columnist Eleanor Clift writes, "An ardent supporter of the war, [Rep. Christopher Shays (R-CT)] abruptly reversed course to join critics in calling for a firm deadline-based timetable 'to wake up the Iraqis' so U.S. troops could begin to withdraw from Iraq." Trailing in the polls when he made his announcement, Shays has been accused of undergoing an "expedient" conversion. Although he denies the charge, Clift writes, "Listening to Shays defending his position and his integrity for more than an hour is dizzying. It's like being caught in a hall of mirrors. He wants to both support and condemn the Iraq war, his party and his president."

Turkey Has Its Own "Iraq Problem." In an op-ed for the Washington Post (9/16, 748K), political scientist Lenore Martin writes, "The Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), operating from havens in northern Iraq, has been attacking Turkish security forces in southeastern Anatolia and occasionally civilians elsewhere. Turkey is determined to prevent a repetition of the 1984-99 guerrilla war with the separatist PKK" and as a consequence threatens to "invade northern Iraq." Martin says the Kurds, Turks, and US all need to act: Iraqi Kurds "must be willing to deny the PKK havens in northern Iraq." Turkey "must more assertively address the cultural, political and economic demands of the Kurds in southeast Anatolia." The US "must throw its full weight behind efforts to eject the PKK from northern Iraq. Furthermore the United States needs to pressure Europe more energetically to block the transfer of funds to the PKK."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

House Committee Wants HP Chair To Testify. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, 918K) reports, "A congressional panel wants to question key figures in the scandal surrounding Hewlett-Packard Co.'s investigation of media leaks, and a shareholder lawsuit was filed in state court accusing the company's top brass of breaching their duties. The House Energy and Commerce Committee sent letters Friday requesting that HP Chairwoman Patricia C. Dunn and General Counsel Ann O. Baskins appear at a Sept. 28 hearing of its oversight and investigations subcommittee."

HP Case Seen As Example Of Increasingly Aggressive Corporate Boards. The Washington Post (9/16, D1, Masters, 748K) reports, "The once-clubby atmosphere of the public company boardroom has undergone a makeover during the past several years, as board members become more willing to flex their muscle and aggressively press management for changes. Since early 2005, directors of some of corporate America's biggest names have pushed out their chief executives. … The unfolding scandal at Hewlett-Packard Co. -- where the company's chairman, who was concerned about leaks, ordered an investigation of directors' phone records that may have been conducted illegally -- offers an extreme example of the new tensions inside some boardrooms. Legal analysts, governance experts and directors agree that the nature of boardroom politics has changed in the years since Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. collapsed and directors of both companies were held personally liable for investor losses."

Justice In Grasso Case Forced To Rule On His Own Conduct. The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Lucchetti, Davies) reports, "The legal battle over the paycheck of the New York Stock Exchange's former boss -- was he overpaid, or not? -- took an unusual twist this past week: The judge had to make a ruling on his own conduct." The Journal continues, "On Thursday, Justice Charles Ramos declined to remove himself from the case, despite an argument by lawyers for Dick Grasso, the NYSE's former chief, that the judge couldn't be fair. One reason: Twice in recent years, Justice Ramos applied for a job on the NYSE's board, which decides what to pay executives at the stock exchange. … Mr. Grasso was paid more than $100 million in 2003, his last year on the job, He's being sued by New York state's attorney general on the grounds that he didn't deserve that much money at the exchange, now owned by the publicly traded NYSE Group Inc." The Journal adds, "It's not the first time that the 64-year-old Justice Ramos, of the state Supreme Court (a trial-level court in New York), has played a big role in a controversial case. In 2002, he took the surprising step of trying to cut the $625 million in fees claimed by lawyers involved in a tobacco-related lawsuit, calling the size of the sum 'offensive.' (He was overruled, and the lawyers did get their fees.) He is also presiding in the high-profile case involving American International Group Inc.'s former chief executive, Maurice R. Greenberg. … According to attorneys who have tried cases in his courtroom, he has a reputation for volatility and wit. At times, for instance he compliments lawyers for making persuasive arguments -- moments before denying the motion. … Other times, he's less patient. During settlement discussions in a case last year between the NYSE and some disgruntled investors in the Big Board, he scolded one attorney in chambers for interrupting him. According to two people present at the time, he walked around from behind his desk, and jabbed his finger at the attorney's face, saying that if it happened again, the judge would throw him out of the courtroom."

Former Peregrine Official Pleads Not Guilty. The San Diego Union-Tribune (9/16, Bigelow) reports, "The former European vice president for Peregrine Systems pleaded not guilty to federal fraud and conspiracy charges in San Diego yesterday after he was extradited amid a political rumpus in the United Kingdom." The Union-Tribune continues, "Jeremy Reeve Crook, 53, became a cause celebre in London this summer because of growing popular opposition to changes in British extradition law that Parliament enacted in 2003. … The changes, which were prompted by the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, allow U.S. authorities to extradite British citizens and other residents without first establishing a preliminary case against them in British court." The Union-Tribune adds, "The changes made the extradition process lopsided because British authorities 'basically just turn over' anyone wanted by the U.S. Justice Department, said Douglas McNabb, a lawyer in Washington, D.C. … In contrast, British authorities seeking to extradite individuals under current U.S. extradition law have to make a case showing 'probable cause' in federal court, McNabb said." The Union-Tribune notes, "Before the end of the year, the U.S. Senate is expected to vote on changes to relax the current U.S. requirements for extradition, McNabb said. But even if those revisions are approved, McNabb said, the extradition process still will be stiffer in the United States than in the United Kingdom. … Crook became the subject of a U.S. extradition request after he was indicted in October 2004 with 10 others for their alleged roles in the massive accounting fraud at Peregrine Systems, the San Diego software developer now operated by Hewlett-Packard Co. …

Prosecutors asked Crook to return voluntarily to the United States to respond to the charges. He declined, and U.S. authorities subsequently sought an extradition order."

Former Enron Official Sentenced To Probation For Lying To Credit-Rating Agencies. The AP (9/16, Graczyk) reports, "A former assistant treasurer at the disgraced Enron Corp. was sentenced Friday to four years probation and a $10,000 fine for lying to credit-rating agencies to make the financial picture at the one-time energy giant appear healthier than it was." The AP continues, 'Timothy DeSpain, 41, pleaded guilty nearly two years ago to a single charge of conspiracy to commit securities fraud. At the same time, he agreed to cooperate with federal authorities investigating the company, which toppled into bankruptcy in December 2001, evaporating more than $60 billion in market value, almost $2.1 billion in pension plans and, initially, 5,600 jobs." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Ewing Werlein, who could have imposed up to a five-year prison term and $250,000 fine under federal sentencing guidelines, said he was impressed by DeSpain's level of cooperation with federal prosecutors looking into the Enron debacle and with letters of support from relatives and friends."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ney Pleads Guilty To Accepting Bribes From Abramoff. Rep. Bob Ney's guilty plea received only brief mentions well into last night's network news broadcasts but was examined in depth by major US newspapers Saturday morning. ABC World News (9/15, story 6, 0:25, Snow) reported, "Republican Congressman Bob Ney has admitted to taking gifts from lobbyist Jack Abramoff in exchange for his influence. After months of denying any wrong wrongdoing, Ney today agreed to plea guilty to conspiracy and making false statements."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported Ney "is accused of accepting overseas trips worth more than $170,000 in exchange for helping some of Abramoff's clients."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 7, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported Ney "became the first sitting lawmaker to plead guilty to charges stemming from his relationship to disgraced former lobbyist Abramoff. He filed court papers this morning agree to a plea bargain. … His lawyer said the congressman interested an alcoholism treatment program."

The Washington Times (9/16, Price, 88K) reports Assistant U.S. Attorney General Alice S. Fisher "said as part of the plea agreement prosecutors will recommend a 27-month sentence for crimes that could bring Ney 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine."

The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Schmitt, 918K) reports, "The Abramoff investigation, which mostly involves Republicans, has led to the conviction of several former congressional aides who were in the lobbyist's inner circle. … But aside from the political scandal created by the case, it remained uncertain whether other elected officials would join Ney in facing legal problems from it. Although Ney has long been viewed as likely to face charges, evidence of possible wrongdoing by some of his colleagues has not seemed as strong. Moreover, his own plea agreement with authorities does not require him to point fingers and cooperate in the investigation."

The Miami Herald (9/16, Weaver) reports, "Justice Department officials condemned his misconduct. … 'He illegally deceived the public and the House of Representatives about his actions,' Alice Fisher, an assistant attorney general heading the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said in Washington. 'In doing so, the congressman was acting in his own best interests, and not in the best interests of his constituents.' … Fisher said Justice's public corruption prosecutors received 'substantial assistance' from the Miami offices of U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta and the FBI."

Prosecutors Said To Be Subjecting Burns To "Particular Scrutiny." Time (9/16, Zagorin, 4.03M) reports, "A source close to the investigation told TIME that scores of US prosecutors and FBI agents continue to examine the activities of other sitting members of Congress and prominent individuals who could face prosecution, though not necessarily before the November 7 election. The source confirmed previous public reports that particular scrutiny is being paid to Sen. Conrad Burns, a Montana Republican who faces a tough campaign for reelection."

Ney Not Planning To Resign. The AP (9/16, Bridis) reports, "The chairman of Ohio's Republican Party, Bob Bennett, said Ney's apology 'rings hollow,' and he urged the lawmaker to resign 'and begin paying the price for his arrogance and greed.' Ney's attorney, William Lawler, said the congressman, who announced last month he wouldn't seek re-election, has no plans to resign." House Majority Leader John Boehner "described Ney as a skilled lawmaker and good friend. 'Clearly Bob made mistakes, and he is now feeling the full weight of those mistakes,' Boehner said. 'His actions violated the law, and he must be held accountable.'"

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Grimaldi, Schmidt, 748K) reports, "Lawler said Ney is receiving treatment for 'alcohol-dependence issues' but declined to say whether he has entered a rehabilitation facility. Lawler said treatment was the deciding factor in setting the date for next month's court appearance. Others familiar with the case said that Ney's representatives tried to put off the announcement of the plea deal until then. Ney will be eligible for a government pension because Congress has not acted on legislation that would ban pensions for convicted lawmakers."

Democrats Contend Ney Is An Example Of GOP "Culture Of Corruption." The New York Times (9/16, Shenon, 1.21M) reports Ney "admitted Friday that he had effectively put his office up for sale to corrupt Washington lobbyists and a foreign businessman in exchange for illegal gifts that included lavish overseas trips, the use of skyboxes at sports arenas in the Washington area and thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips from London casinos. In a plea agreement announced by the Justice Department, Mr. Ney, a six-term Republican who once seemed poised to rise far in the House leadership, admitted to a wide-ranging criminal conspiracy and to making false statements about the gifts." The House minority leader, Nancy Pelosi "said Mr. Ney's plea agreement was proof of 'what we have long said: the Republican culture of corruption has pervaded Congress.'" Speaker Dennis Hastert "said, 'The illegal behavior that Congressman Bob Ney has admitted doing was unacceptable.'"

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Grimaldi, Schmidt, 748K) reports, "Coming just seven weeks before the midterm congressional elections, Ney's admission of guilt was cited yesterday by Democrats as evidence that Congress is beset by a 'ring of corruption.' But Republicans were quick to note that a Democrat, Rep. William J. Jefferson of Louisiana, is the focus of a separate federal bribery investigation."

The Washington Times (9/16, Price, 88K) reports Democrats immediately jumped on the election-year conviction and linked the Republican candidate vying to fill Ney's seat to the disgraced congressman. The Ohio Democratic Party complained that State Sen. Joy Padgett, who won a special Republican primary Thursday, has 'extensive ties to' Ney and has been unwilling 'to return Ney's past campaign contributions.'" Kevin Madden, spokesman for Boehner "said Mrs. Pelosi 'is delusional to think that her party has even a shred of credibility on the issue of reform.' 'Capitol Hill Democrats have either resisted or tried to obstruct every substantive effort of reform in this Congress,' Mr. Madden said."

Ney Plea Said To Demonstrate Need For Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post (9/16, A20, 748K) reports, "On Thursday, the House of Representatives passed a fig leaf of a change in earmarking rules that will simply require lawmakers, in some cases, to attach their names to special-interest projects that they sponsor. We'll offer a more detailed analysis of this faux reform another time, but the most disturbing point is this: Apparently, that's it for lobbying reform this session. There will be no action to limit the free trips that lawmakers and staff members can take, beef up the broken system of ethics enforcement, slow the revolving door between public service and K Street riches, or improve disclosure of lobbying activities. It was striking, then, that yesterday, the day after the House's non-action action, the court documents were replete with disgusting details about the rapaciously unethical behavior of Mr. Ney and his staff."

Jefferson's Attempt To Seize Control Of Tech Firm Described. The New York Times (9/16, Drew, 1.21M) reports, "In July 2005, Vernon L. Jackson returned home to Louisville from Washington, where he had just met with Representative William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat who had been helping promote his fledgling digital-technology company." Jefferson "had made a proposal that, in Mr. Jackson's view, was tantamount to theft: in return for a quick infusion of cash, Mr. Harper said, Mr. Jefferson and his investors would take control of iGate and its promising broadband patents while easing Mr. Jackson aside and cutting off most of the company's creditors. Unbeknownst to the two men, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had been monitoring their dealings. Less than three weeks later, agents raided Mr. Jefferson's homes, in Washington and in New Orleans, and found stacks of cash stuffed in a freezer. Mr. Jackson, 54, has pleaded guilty to paying more than $400,000 in bribes for Mr. Jefferson's help; on Sept. 8, he was sentenced to seven years in prison." The Times adds, "an examination of court records and dozens of internal iGate documents, as well as interviews with a number of Mr. Jackson's associates, offers a far clearer picture of the relationship between the two men, and of how Mr. Jefferson went from helping a small company to trying to take it over for his family's benefit."

Katrina Fraud Task Force Charges 400 In First Year. The Federal Times (9/16, Curl) reports, "More than 400 people have been federally charged with Hurricane Katrina-related fraud since Attorney General Alberto Gonzales convened a task force to investigate the cases last September." The Times continues, "According to Gonzales, charges have been filed in 30 federal districts in all U.S. regions. … 'To take advantage of the devastation and recovery efforts in the Gulf Coast is both shameful and illegal,' Gonzales said in a statement. 'We must ensure that the criminals who have exploited this time of human suffering are brought to justice and that their crimes do not undermine the programs intended to rebuild the homes, businesses and communities destroyed by hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma.'" The Times adds, "The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force reported that as of last month, the Federal Emergency Management Agency had received more than 2.5 million applications for disaster assistance related to the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes. While most of these applicants had legitimate needs, the task force found that numerous people committed fraud in seeking benefits to which they were not entitled. … According to the task force, criminals often seek to exploit perceived systemic weaknesses in oversight or internal controls associated with disaster relief programs. The task force found that these people often work in groups."

Many Fraud Complaints Not Investigated. Newhouse News Service (9/16, Reilly) reports, "The Gulf Coast was still drying out last September when federal officials promised aggressive action against fraud stemming from Hurricane Katrina. A year later, complaints of disaster aid abuse are pouring in to one key watchdog entity -- the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's inspector general's office -- but only a small fraction have resulted in investigations, government figures show. … By the end of last month, the inspector general had received more than 11,000 such complaints for fiscal 2006, which ends Sept. 30, according to statistics provided by the office. Of those, 999, or about 9 percent, have been pursued, the numbers indicate." Newhouse continues, "Asked why such a low proportion of fraud allegations appear to be getting attention, spokeswoman Tamara Faulkner said via e-mail that all are reviewed, but some don't warrant further action. … Even if a complaint furnished only a little information, Faulkner said, "it would be evaluated, and a determination would be made on a case-by-case basis" whether to pursue an investigation or refer it to the Federal Emergency Management Agency or some other branch of the homeland security department. … At the same time, she said, some complaints are closed out-of-hand, because they lack 'specificity or clarity.'" Newhouse adds, "As a rule, however, the inspector general 'has to pursue those cases that have the biggest economic impact and seem the most believable,' said Clark Kent Ervin, who headed the office in 2003 and 2004, in e-mailed answers to questions. 'One can't go after every "nickel and dime" claim because there are too many of them and too few resources.' … With 490 employees, the inspector general is a major gatekeeper for complaints of fraud, waste and abuse affecting a wide range of homeland security programs, including emergency aid. Since the homeland security department's creation in 2002, the office has won praise for its hard-hitting inquiries into subjects ranging from port security spending to the training of airport screeners."

Prosecutors Urge Judge To Imprison Ryan During His Appeals Process. The AP (9/16, Robinson) reports prosecuros are arguing former Illinois Gov. George Ryan "should not remain free while appealing his racketeering conviction and should start his prison sentence as scheduled Jan. 4. … Authorities argued in court papers that decisions made by U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer during the seven-month trial of Ryan and co-defendant Larry Warner were likely to be upheld by appeals judges." Ryan "was sentenced to 6 1/2 years in prison."

Bush '04 Campaign Will Give Donations From Convicted Coin Dealer To Charity. The AP (9/16) reports, "Donations that a former coin dealer funneled to President Bush's re-election campaign will be given to charity, barring further directions from authorities, a spokesman for the Republican National Committee said Friday. Tom Noe, 52, has admitted arranging a contribution scheme to fulfill his promise to generate $50,000 for a Bush-Cheney fundraiser. He was sentenced Tuesday to two years and three months in prison on three charges, including exceeding federal campaign contribution limits. … Authorities said Bush's campaign committee was unaware of the alleged contribution scheme and unknowingly submitted a false campaign report to the Federal Election Commission. The campaign already has donated $6,000 it received from Noe and his wife, Bernadette, to charity, said Aaron McLear of the Republican National Committee, which represents the inactive Bush campaign. 'Barring any further directions from authorities, Bush-Cheney '04 will also voluntarily donate the $45,400 that was the subject of this investigation to charity,' he said."

Chat Rooms Serve As ID Theft Marketplace For Hackers. The AP (9/16) reported, "On a weekday afternoon in a chat room, hackers are busy exchanging credit-card numbers, cash, hacked servers, information and stolen identities. … Welcome to the world of identity theft, a market that costs the U.S. economy $56.6 billion last year." FBI Cyber Division Supervisory Special Agent Thomas Grasso Jr. said, "Ten years ago it was a bunch of frustrated teenagers who had something to prove. Now, it's all about the money." The AP noted, The Secret Service, which was empowered by Congress to combat computer fraud, has 24 electronic crimes task forces across the country and 20 foreign offices working with local law enforcement on the issue. … Cathy Milhoan, an FBI spokeswoman, said the agency doesn't have 'teams of people' monitoring these rooms '24 hours.' She said it monitors the rooms only when it has a 'legal reason for being there.'"

Jackson, MS, Mayor Indicted Over Crime-Fighting Tactics. The New York Times (9/16, Dewan) reports, "The mayor of Jackson, Miss., was indicted on six felony charges Friday after months of criticism and warnings that his unorthodox crime-fighting tactics might put him on the wrong side of the law." The Times continues, "Among the counts now faced by the mayor, Frank Melton, are burglary, malicious mischief, illegally carrying a gun and causing a minor to commit a felony. The most serious of the charges against him carry sentences of up to 25 years, said the local district attorney, Faye Peterson. … The mayor's supporters called the charges politically motivated and said he would not resign." The Times adds, 'Some of the charges stem from a sheriff's investigation of the night of Aug. 26, when the home of Evans Welch, a man with a history of mental illness and petty crimes, was attacked by a sledgehammer-wielding group of young men without warning or permit. … Witnesses said Mr. Melton, who often patrols the city at night with the police and a group of teenage followers, had directed the demolition of the house, which he said was known as a place to buy illegal drugs. His two police bodyguards are also charged in connection with that event. … Dale Danks, Mr. Melton's lawyer, issued a statement acknowledging that damage had been done to 'the drug house' and that 'maybe better judgment could have been used.' … 'But,' the statement said, 'the charges that have been made against Mayor Melton are an extreme and excessive reaction.'"

Federal Judge Blocks Threatened Strike At Northwest Airlines. The New York Times (9/16, Bailey, 1.21M) reports, "A federal judge yesterday blocked a threatened strike by flight attendants at Northwest Airlines in a ruling that could strengthen the hand of struggling airlines that seek to reduce labor costs. The flight attendants said they would appeal. A prolonged labor disturbance could have forced Northwest into liquidation. Yesterday's decision, which affirms a temporary ruling last month, forces the airline's roughly 9,000 flight attendants to keep working at reduced wages and benefits, which the company says will save it $195 million a year."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Euclid, OH, Proposes New Voting Districts. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (9/16, Atassi) reports that the city of Euclid, OH, "might redraw ward boundaries while also contesting a federal lawsuit that accuses the city's existing election system of keeping black candidates out of office." The Plain Dealer continues, "Council President Ed Gudenas has drafted legislation that would give City Council the authority to propose new districts to ease a 'statistical imbalance in population' in time for the 2007 election. The legislation is listed on the agenda for Monday's council meeting." The Plain Dealer adds, "Hilary Taylor, the attorney representing the city in the Department of Justice lawsuit, said City Council might lack the authority to adopt a redistricting plan without voter approval. … Mayor Bill Cervenik said Friday his administration has been kept in the dark by council regarding redistricting. … 'Not including the administration in discussion about this is very detrimental to what we're trying to do,' Cervenik said. 'But at least this measure shows that council is willing to look at adjusting borders.' … The city has struggled to compromise with the Justice Department ever since a three-year investigation concluded that too many at-large council seats and districts that cover a large geographic area have diluted minority voting strength. … The city has never elected a black official, though more than 30 percent of its residents are black." The Plain Dealer notes, "In June, Justice Department officials proposed that the city break four wards into eight smaller districts - each with a City Council member - and eliminate all at-large seats except for council president. … Currently, five of the nine council members, including the council president, are elected citywide. … Instead of accepting the proposal, Taylor recommended city officials demand evidence collected during the investigation before agreeing to redraw districts. Less than a month later, the Justice Department filed suit against the city."

DOJ Asked To Rule On Monkey's Access To Missouri Restaurants. The Springfield (MO) News-Leader (9/16, Hocklander) reports, "A Springfield (MO) woman filed a complaint with the federal government Friday after the Springfield-Greene County Health Department declined to reverse a decision barring her from taking her monkey into businesses that serve or handle food. … 'I didn't feel I had any choice,' said Debby Rose, holding her monkey during and after a meeting with Director of Health Kevin Gipson and Assistant Director of Health Ron Boyer." The News-Leader continues, "Rose said her monkey, Richard, is a service animal that helps her cope with a debilitating anxiety disorder, which includes a racing heart, high blood pressure and panic attacks in certain situations -- particularly public activities. Richard helps relieve that and, according to the Americans With Disabilities Act, she said, he should be allowed into public food places. … Gipson maintained the health department's position that, according to its interpretation of ADA law, the monkey is a therapy animal or a pet -- not a service animal — and therefore not allowed in food establishments. According to health department research, 'a service animal by definition has to perform a physical function for that person,' Gipson said." The News-Leader adds, "Gipson said he would reverse the decision if the federal government says Rose's monkey is a service animal. He encouraged Rose to file a complaint. … Shelby Butler said the ADA's definition for service animals has expanded. Butler, who attended the meeting to advocate for Rose, is an access specialist from Southwest Center for Independent Living, a not-for-profit organization that's federally mandated to assist people with disabilities. She also helped Rose file the complaint. … Butler said it could take several months to hear back from the Justice Department's civil rights division. They filed under Title II because it covers state and local governments, she said. A government decision might be based on the information gathered, Butler said, or it could go to federal court for a judge to decide."

Missouri FBI Agents Field Tough Questions From Muslim-Americans. The Columbia (MO) Daily Tribune (9/16, Heavin) reported, "A group of local Muslims aimed loaded questions at an FBI agent last night and fired point blank. Does the FBI seek out Muslims as criminals? Is the government inventing new rules on a daily basis to entrap Muslim-Americans? What does the FBI think about Muslims in general? Thorny questions, all of which were directed at FBI Supervisory Special Agent Richard Thornton as he addressed members of the Islamic Center of Central Missouri in Columbia. Thornton and Agent Stewart McLaren visited the group in an effort to rebuild bridges between law enforcement and Muslims, bridges that might have crumbled when the FBI shut down the Islamic American Relief Agency in Columbia two years ago." The Daily Tribune added, "Thornton would not specifically answer one of the most direct questions of the evening: Does he believe Muslims are the peace-loving people they say they are? 'That's a loaded question,' he said. 'I don't think I can take 700 people from any demographic and generalize.' … But Thornton did assure the group that the FBI isn't 'out to get' Muslims."

Hutchison Opposes House Bill On Texas Airports. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (9/16, Wethe) reports, "The latest attack on the Wright Amendment compromise, which stripped antitrust immunity from the proposed legislation this week, is a potential deal breaker, said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas. … 'We won't pass the bill in the form it came out of the Judiciary Committee,' Hutchison told reporters Friday after a lunchtime speech in Dallas. … 'We're not going to open up a can of worms. We'd have to bring the bill down. We couldn't pass it,' she said." The Star-Telegram continues, "On Wednesday, the House Judiciary Committee agreed to cut language that gave the bill protection from claims that it violates federal antitrust laws. … 'What we're trying to do of course with this bill is create a certainty about what the rules are going to be in this area,' Hutchison said. … 'We couldn't attract new airlines, which we want to do to add competition, if they knew that this interpretation would have to go through years of litigation to know what the rules are going to be.'" The Star-Telegram adds, "The committee's action was a victory for the owner of the former Legend Airlines terminal, which is slated for condemnation by Dallas. … The owner, Love Terminal Partners, said talk of tearing it down killed an imminent deal to sell the vacant six-gate terminal for $100 million. Love Terminal has since sued the five local parties that struck a compromise on Wright -- American Airlines, Southwest Airlines, Fort Worth, Dallas and Dallas/Fort Worth Airport."

The Dallas Business Journal (9/16) reports, "The legislation, which is based on a local compromise between the cities of Dallas and Fort Worth, American Airlines, Southwest Airlines and the D/FW Airport board, calls for lifting Wright restrictions by 2014. … In return, the city of Dallas will use eminent domain to demolish a privately owned passenger terminal at Love Field, reducing the number of gates there to 20, down from 32. That has sparked anticompetition complaints, including a lawsuit filed by the owners of the gates." The Journal continues, "Soon after the bill was introduced, an unsigned letter purportedly from the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, began circulating on Capitol Hill that raised antitrust concerns."

Dynegy Considers Power Plant Deal. The Contra Costa Times (9/16, Jurgens) reports, "Dynegy Corp., a financially troubled energy merchant affiliated with San Ramon-based Chevron Corp., plans to acquire a power plant portfolio from LS Power Group that includes about 15 percent of Northern California's electricity supply and an interest in a large Nevada coal project." The Times continues, "The proposed deal will cut Chevron's ownership interest in Dynegy from 20 percent to 12 percent but add to Chevron's stake in the coal industry, which is targeted by environmentalists concerned about rising atmospheric carbon dioxide levels that fuel global warming." The Times adds, "Dynegy will emerge from the deal with a 20,000-megawatt fleet of nonutility power plants that includes 'a new strategic position in the California market,' according to a news release. A megawatt is enough electricity for 750 houses. … 'We support this transaction as an opportunity for them to grow the company,' said Don Campbell, a Chevron spokesman." The Times notes, "Chevron, through Dynegy, would get a minority interest in 3,700 megawatts of generating capacity in Northern California, including big natural gas-fired plants in Morro Bay in San Luis Obispo County and Moss Landing in Monterey County, and a smaller oil-fueled plant in Oakland. LS Power acquired those properties in May as part of a $1.6 billion deal with Duke Energy Corp."

EU Antitrust Head Outlines Goals. The AP (9/16) reports, "EU Competition Commissioner Neelie Kroes, involved in an investigation of Microsoft Corp., said Friday that the European policy toward the software company does not differ substantially from that of the U.S." The AP continues, "Kroes spoke Friday at the Council on Foreign Relations about fostering a global competition culture. She outlined three areas of policy development: combatting cartels, punishing those who engage in unilateral antitrust behavior and encouraging private damage suits that would serve the same purpose as regulation." The AP adds, "Of Microsoft, she said, 'I'm not willing to say that there is a major difference in the way of thinking between the United States and ourselves.' … The commission is investigating Microsoft over its Vista operating system. The investigation is the latest development in a case that dates to 2004, when it hit the software company with a record 497 million euro ($613 million) fine. Microsoft was fined another 280.5 million euros ($357 million) in July." The AP notes, "Microsoft has said its Office 2007 software will not include a way to save data in the popular Portable Document Format and that it dropped plans to include the format after Adobe Systems Inc. asked it to charge customers for the feature. … On Friday, Kroes said the commission was engaged in a debate over policies that would foster private damage lawsuits over regulation. That would bring the European legal environment closer to that of the U.S."

ENVIRONMENT:

E Coli Outbreak Hits Twenty States, One Woman Dead. All three networks opened their broadcasts with reports on the fatal outbreak of E. coli traced to bags of fresh spinach and each network also included an additional segment concerning the risk to consumers from E. coli and the damage such an outbreak can do to US farmers. ABC World News (9/15, lead story, 2:55, Snow) reported, "Good evening. We begin with a major concern in homes as cross the country. As the Nation's deadly E. Coli outbreak grows health officials are trying to determine how a dangerous strain of the bacteria has spread from coast to coast. Cases have now been confirmed in at least 20 states from Oregon to New York. One person, a 77-year-old woman in Wisconsin, has died. At least 94 people have gotten sick. And tonight, there are warnings for consumers and worries that more cases could be yet to come."

CBS Evening News (9/15, lead story, 2:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "If you have any in your fridge, the FDA says get rid of it. … The FDA's unusual warning 'that consumers should not eat bagged fresh spinach at this time' had consumers cleaning out refrigerators and grocers across America scrambling to remove spinach from the stores."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, lead story, 3:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stores across the country have been clearing their shelves of it and families throwing it in the trash after the FDA warned it may be making a lot of people very sick. An urgent race to trace the origins of a deadly form of E. Coli that seems to be spreading unchecked." Dr. David Acheson, FDA Food Safety director: "It is an unpleasant kind of E. Coli. It can cause serious illness, kidney failure and death."

ABC World News (9/15, story 7, 2:25, Snow) reported, "The FDA suggestion that people stop eating bagged spinach could hit very hard here in the part of California they like to call the salad bowl of the world. 75% of fresh spinach in this country comes from California. But eight of the last 19 outbreaks of E. coli have come from vegetables grown here in the salad bowl, making 217 people sick.'

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 2, 1:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Washed and bagged produce has become a huge money maker for processors and farmers. They insist it's a more thorough cleaning than any consumer could manage in their own kitchen. Federal inspectors right now are going through fields here in the Salinas valley looking for contamination."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 2, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The FDA is saying you have to play it safe. Whether it is bagged, fresh or even frozen spinach, after August 1st, play it safe and consider it possibly contaminated and throw it out."

The New York Times (9/16, Preston, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "federal health authorities identified an organic produce company here in California as a possible source of some of the tainted spinach. … The company, Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, announced a voluntary nationwide recall of its Earthbound brands of prepackaged spinach and salad mixes as well as prepackaged spinach it processes for numerous other companies, including Dole." The FDA's Dr. David Acheson "said at a news conference that the F.D.A. did not have definitive evidence that Natural Selection Foods was to blame for the outbreak of illness. But people who have been sickened apparently ate its spinach, Dr. Acheson said."

The Washington Post (9/16, A1, Rosenwald, Mui, 748K) reports FDA officials "warned consumers not to eat packaged spinach, and last night it extended the warning to packaged salad products that contain spinach, as well as spinach at restaurant salad bars. The strain of Escherichia coli that is making people sick is particularly virulent."

BP Mistake Seen As Cause Of Fatal Texas Refinery Explosion. The Financial Times (9/16, Mcnulty) reports, "BP mistakenly told state regulators in a 2003 application for an emissions permit that it had installed the updated equipment which investigators said would have prevented last year's fatal explosion at its Texas City refinery, the Financial Times has learned. In the application, a copy of which has been seen by the FT, BP said: 'Relief valves are routed to a flare; therefore, 100 per cent control credit is applied.' A flare is a closed tank in which liquid emissions are received and the vapour burned off. But BP only applied to replace the outdated blowdown stack on the refinery's ISOM unit with a flare after the refinery exploded, killing 15 and injuring an estimated 500. … 'The fatal explosion would not have occurred if the ISOM unit had a properly sized and designed flare system,' said Daniel Horowitz of the US Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board, an independent federal agency that investigates industrial chemical accidents."

US Will Appeal Ruling On Forest Fee. The Arizona Daily Star (9/16, Davis) reports, "The federal government has given notice that it will appeal a magistrate's ruling that could lead to elimination of $5 daily user fees in popular recreation areas, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Phoenix." The Star continues, "People now pay the user fees to hike or picnic on Mount Lemmon, in Sabino and Madera canyons, and in other sites in Arizona and around the West. … U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton's notice, filed Thursday, said the government will appeal U.S. Magistrate Charles Pyle's Sept. 5 ruling dismissing two $30 tickets the Forest Service issued to Tucsonan Chris Wallace." The Star adds, "Wallace was cited twice in September 2005 on Mount Lemmon for parking her car to hike in the Marshall Gulch area and near the General Hitchcock Campground without paying the fee. … Pyle's ruling said the Forest Service lacks authority to impose such a fee for trail use. … The user fee system requires anyone who drives up Mount Lemmon to pay $5 per day or $20 for an annual pass, if they park at hiking trails or picnic areas or anywhere else within a prescribed area on the mountain. That area includes all national forest along the Mount Lemmon Highway. .. . They do not have to pay if they drive up and down the mountain without stopping, or stop at campgrounds that have separate fees charged by concessionaires. They also don't pay if they stop at private cabins, Summerhaven businesses, scenic overlooks or vista points. … The appeal will be pursued in U.S. District Court. The Justice Department has 30 days from Thursday to file a legal brief on the case."

California Judge To Rule On Emissions Suit. The Fresno Bee (9/16, Ellis) reports, "State officials on Friday asked a federal judge to throw out a lawsuit by the automobile industry challenging new state emissions standards that would be the toughest in the nation." The Bee continues, "After hearing more than two hours of arguments, U.S. District Court Judge Anthony W. Ishii said he would issue his ruling later. … If he rules against the state, the closely watched case is likely to go to trial in January — and its outcome would have national implications." The Bee adds, "Already, 10 states have adopted California's new emissions standards, and nine states in the Pacific Northwest and northeast, as well as New York City, have filed briefs on the state's behalf in the case. … The new state regulations, scheduled to take effect with the 2009 model year, would set tailpipe emission standards for greenhouse gases, which many scientists believe are contributing to global warming. .. The regulations are expected to cut exhaust emissions in cars and light trucks by 25% and in larger trucks and sport utility vehicles by 18%. The operation of vehicle engines creates greenhouse gases, such as carbon dioxide."

US Sued To Halt Sale Of Toy Jewelry Containing Lead. The AP (9/16, Chea) reports, "Environmentalists sued the federal government Thursday to stop the sale of toy jewelry made with lead, citing dangers it can pose to brain development in children." The AP continues, "The San Francisco-based Sierra Club wants the Environmental Protection Agency to find ways to stop the sale or production of toy necklaces, bracelets and rings containing lead. … 'I don't think parents realize that these pieces of jewelry have the potential to be harmful,' said Jessica Frohman, head of a Sierra Club committee on toxic substances. Children can be exposed to dangerous levels of lead if they suck on or swallow the jewelry, she said." The AP adds, "The attorneys general in California and Illinois sent letters to the EPA supporting the Sierra Club complaint. … The EPA would not comment directly on the lawsuit, which was filed in federal court in San Francisco. But spokesman Mark Merchant said the agency has a 'comprehensive set of regulations' to protect children from lead. It does not, however, have specific regulations for toy jewelry containing lead, he said. … Inexpensive toy jewelry made with lead or painted with lead paint is sold across the United States in vending machines and in stores that sell mainly to immigrant communities."

EPA CFO Proposed Closing Labs And Laying-Off Scientists Due To Budget Constraints. McClatchy (9/16, Goldstein), in an article titled, "EPA Plans To Close Labs, Drop Scientists And Reduce Oversight," reports that th EPA "intends to close labs, cut its cadre of upper-level scientists and reduce regulatory oversight, according to an internal agency document. In a memo dated June 8, a top agency official outlined 'a set of proposed disinvestments, innovations, efficiencies and consolidations' for the upcoming 2008 fiscal budget. 'The decisions we make will be critical, difficult and will have long-term consequences,' EPA Chief Financial Officer Lyons Gray wrote. He said the EPA wanted to limit duplication and find 'opportunities for consolidation and streamlining.'" Jeff Ruch, the executive director of Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, "a watchdog group that obtained the memo, said that rather than consolidating to improve the agency, the EPA was 'chopping up the furniture to meet external budget targets.'" McClatchy notes, "The EPA's budget has been dropping steadily since it reached a record $8.13 billion in fiscal 2003. The Bush administration's proposed fiscal 2007 budget was nearly $1 billion lower, but Congress hasn't yet approved a final version."

Fairfax County Releases Detailed Report On Bird Flu Preparations. The Washington Post (9/16, B1, Rein, 748K) reports, "A severe outbreak of bird flu would infect nearly a third of Fairfax County's population, killing almost 700 people and sending thousands to local hospitals, according to a new report. The 112-page primer on how the Washington area's largest local government would respond to a pandemic that many researchers think is inevitable depicts a grim scene of sick or at-risk people in widespread isolation or quarantine, at home or in hospital beds. … Fairfax, which has posted its response plan on the county Web site, is the region's first local government to issue a comprehensive report on pandemic flu preparations, said Addo-Ayensu and other emergency management officials. Although the Bush administration has released a federal plan and committed tens of millions of dollars to anticipate a crisis, the details of how to respond are left to state and local governments."

NYTimes Regards Controversies At Interior Department As Inevitable. The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M) editorializes, "We knew that bad things would happen when President Bush filled many of his important environmental posts with right-wing activists and industry lobbyists who had spent their careers criticizing the laws they were now being told to uphold and representing industries they were now being told to regulate. Just how bad became clear this week in the course of some pointed testimony from the Interior Department's inspector general, who accused top officials at his agency of fostering a culture of 'managerial irresponsibility' that tolerated conflicts of interest, cronyism and other lapses. At a House subcommittee hearing, the official, Earl Devaney, said that 'short of a crime, anything goes at the highest levels of the Department of the Interior.'

DEA Training Mexican Agents To Combat Meth. The San Antonio Express-News (9/16, Martin) reports, "Mexican law enforcement agents completed a Drug Enforcement Administration program as part of a joint U.S.-Mexico effort to combat methamphetamine production in border states, officials said Friday." The Express-News continues, "The announcement that 55 Mexican agents and prosecutors completed the DEA course in Quantico, Va., comes one day after the State Department issued a travel alert for Americans in Mexico." The Express-News adds, "Training Mexican police to dismantle methamphetamine labs and prosecute offenders is 'a big step forward in our fight against meth,' said Karen Tandy, the DEA administrator. … Tandy called the program 'a historic effort to jointly combat meth production and trafficking that is devastating both nations.'" The Express-News adds, "About 80 percent of the methamphetamine consumed in the United States is manufactured in Mexican labs by criminal organizations based in both countries, according to the DEA. … A war among drug cartels over control of narcotics trafficking and distribution routes is blamed for rising lawlessness along the U.S.-Mexico border. … That war is blamed for the death of a Monterrey policeman and the killing of a state police administrator in Tamaulipas earlier this month."

Judge Denies Bail For Washington Gun Collector. The Seattle Times (9/16, Carter) reported, "A Bellevue gun collector once questioned about the slaying of a federal prosecutor will remain in custody pending trial on a charge that he illegally possessed a machine gun. U.S. Magistrate Monica Benton ruled Friday that Albert Kwok-Leung Kwan posed a flight risk and a potential threat to the community and to federal agents who would monitor him if he was freed. At a hearing before the judge's decision, Kwan's attorneys acknowledged that he repeatedly invoked his Fifth Amendment guarantee against self-incrimination during appearances before a grand jury investigating the slaying of Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Wales in October 2001." The Times noted, "Kwan is not a suspect in the killing.

IRS Investigating Antiwar Speech Given At Church In November '04. The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Sahagun, 918K) reports, "Stepping up its probe of allegedly improper campaigning by churches, the Internal Revenue Service on Friday ordered a liberal Pasadena parish to turn over all the documents and e-mails it produced during the 2004 election year with references to political candidates. All Saints Episcopal Church and its rector, the Rev. Ed Bacon, have until Sept. 29 to present the sermons, newsletters and electronic communications. The IRS investigation was triggered by an antiwar sermon delivered by its former rector, the Rev. George F. Regas, at the church two days before the 2004 presidential election."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Senate Confirms New Peace Corps Director. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (9/16, Averill, 398K) reports, "A Minnesotan has been confirmed as the 17th director of the Peace Corps. 'I'm elated. I'm honored to be able to serve in this way,' Ron Tschetter said after the Senate confirmed him late Wednesday. He said he expected to start the job at the end of the month. … President Bush nominated Tschetter, 64, in July to manage the Peace Corps, which he has had ties with since he was a health volunteer with his wife, Nancy, in India from 1966 to 1968. He was also a chairman of the National Peace Corps Association."

Nevada Bar Opposes Proposal To Split Ninth Circuit. The Los Angeles Times/AP (9/16) reports the State Bar of Nevada "reaffirmed its opposition to a bill by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.) to split up the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, a frequent source of anti-Bush-administration rulings. … The conservative Ensign, who had eight co-sponsors for his measure, has pressed for its approval by saying the San Francisco-based court is overloaded."

Snow's Ability To Make White House Press Corps Laugh Quantified. The Washington Examiner (9/16, DuFour, Gavin) reports, "Covering the White House is not an easy beat. … But White House spokesman Tony Snow, who has been on the job four months, might very well be out to change all of that … Yeas & Nays reviewed the press briefing and press gaggle transcripts from Snow's first four months on the job and compared them to those of Snow's predecessor, Scott McClellan, during his first four months. Under Snow, there were more than 330 percent more instances of laughter — as defined by the transcriber's insertion of '(Laughter)' in the transcript — than under McClellan."

Astronauts Finish Last Spacewalk For Atlantis Mission. The New York Times (9/16, Leary, 1.21M) reports, "A pair of astronauts completed the third and final spacewalk of their mission outside the International Space Station on Friday by freeing up a new heat-dispensing radiator and upgrading communications gear. The two, Joseph R. Tanner, a former Navy pilot, and Cmdr. Heidemarie M. Stefanyshyn-Piper of the Navy, spent 6 hours 41 minutes in space completing assorted tasks to get the station ready for further expansion as building of the research outpost resumed in earnest."

The Washington Post (9/16, A02, Kaufman, 748K) reports, "NASA officials were delighted by the work done by the Atlantis team, the first construction at the space station since the 2003 Columbia disaster. 'We have to say what a wonderful job you both did today, especially you, Joe,' Mission Control said as the astronauts returned to the station. 'It was a legendary performance.' The extra credit went to Tanner because it was his seventh, and apparently last, spacewalk. He appeared reluctant to leave space at the end of the walk and spent some time looking out before entering the air lock."

WP Encourages Congress To Tackle Entitlement Spending. The Washington Post (9/16, A20, 748K) editorializes, "There's no great mystery about how to address Medicare's financial crisis. Either you contain the rate at which the program's costs rise, or you raise more money to pay for it. The federal office that runs the health program for seniors recently announced progress of each sort. Unfortunately, Congress may undo both." It is "not going to be fixed without some hard decisions. If Democrats oppose modest changes that hit only the rich, how will they find the courage to support far-reaching reforms?"

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Up On Good News About Inflation. A new report showing low inflation in August was seen as supporting Federal Reserve Ben Bernanke's view against tightening monetary policy. But while President Bush predicted the GOP will retain control of Congress because of his record on the economy, no Administration policies were cited in relation to the latest economic news. NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 9, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "on Wall Street a tame inflation report cheered investors. The Dow was up more than 33 points [to close at 11.560.77]. The Nasdaq gained almost 7 points [to close at 2,235.59]. For this weeks trading the Dow was up almost 169 points [to close at 168.66]. The Nasdaq was up almost 70 points [to close at 69.80]."

The AP (9/16, Crutsinger) reports, "The slowdown in inflation did not help workers' average weekly earnings, which dropped by 0.5 percent in August, after adjustment for inflation, when compared with July." Meanwhile Bush said

"he expected the economy's performance would persuade voters to keep Republicans in control of the House and Senate in the November congressional elections." He asserted "his tax cuts had helped the country withstand a recession, terrorist attacks and last year's hurricanes."

The New York Times (9/16, Porter, 1.21M) reports, "What a difference a few weeks make. A month ago the economy seemed to be in dire straits -- wedged in by the inflationary pressures of soaring energy prices and rising labor costs while threatened by the prospect that the weak housing market would decimate consumer spending." Yet Friday "the government reported that consumer prices rose only 0.2 percent in August, pushing annual inflation to 3.8 percent, the lowest since April. Meanwhile, retail sales rose by a respectable rate of 0.2 percent in August. And in September, consumers' confidence about the future increased sharply." A drop in gas prices was seen as the primary motivation.

Bloomberg (9/16) reports, "The numbers were 'not as favorable as some would like, but they showed the CPI numbers down, and that's good news,' Kansas City Fed President Thomas Hoenig told an audience of bankers in Copper Mountain, Colorado. 'How we balance those will be, I think, an important part of the discussion that goes forward.'"

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, Whitehouse, 2.03M) notes, "The main factor holding the core down: A seasonal adjustment that shaved one-tenth of a percentage point off the August increase in owners' equivalent rent, a proxy for the cost of housing that makes up almost a third of the index." Labor Department economist Patrick Jackman "said the adjustment was an anomaly that had little to do with the underlying trend in rents, which have played the leading role in pushing up core inflation over the last several months. 'While that had a dramatic impact on the actual number, as far as trends are concerned I certainly wouldn't make a big deal out of it,' he said."

Bloomberg (9/16, Baker) notes, "About seven stocks rose for every five that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2.19 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, the most since June 30." The Los Angeles Times (9/16, Hennessy-Fiske, 918K) in an article titled "Inflation Data Bode Well For Economy" and the Financial Times (9/16, Pimlott) report similar details.

Stock Rally Escapes Media Attention. The New York Times (9/16, Bajaj, 1.21M) in an article titled "Wall St.'s Inconspicuous Rally Continues" reports, "With little fanfare -- and with very few days of sharp upswings -- stocks have been on one of their best runs so far this year." They "have been buoyed by a significant decline in energy prices and a growing belief that the Federal Reserve will not raise interest rates again this year — an argument that won over more believers yesterday after a report on August consumer prices showed that inflation slowed."

Oil Prices Lower For Week Despite Uptick. The AP (9/16) reports, "Oil prices edged higher Friday but finished lower for the week after OPEC lowered its oil-demand forecast for the rest of the year." And experts "said there has been a definite shift in energy-market psychology, as traders focus on the relatively comfortable balance between supply and demand as opposed to hypothetical supply threats."

Ford Announces 10,000 More Layoffs, Offers Buyouts To All Hourly Workers. ABC World News (9/15, story 5, 2:50, Snow) reported, "Major economic news today, details of the sweeping plan to overhaul the legendary automaker Ford Motor Company. It is a catalog of pain. Massive job reductions, plant shutdowns, even the elimination of Ford stock dividend, yet there are questions tonight about whether Ford must do even more."

CBS Evening News (9/15, story 3, 2:05, Mason, 7.66M) reported, "And Ford's union contracts are a big part of the problem. A Ford worker earns on average nearly $65 an hour. In contrast, Toyota pays its American workers just already $45 an hour." Jean Jennings, editor in chief, Automobile Magazine: "They can't afford the contracts, can't afford the benefits, can't afford what they're paying their retirees, can't afford to do what they're doing. So there has to be another play." Mason: "These cuts ultimately won't just affect Ford workers, they'll affect other business where they live and finally, Katie, ripple through the entire economy."

NBC Nightly News (9/15, story 5, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) added, "Ford will shift its folk to us more fuel efficient cars and crossover vehicles promising in two years 70% of its lineup will be new or upgraded. While this town and its workers grapple with no Ford in their future."

Bloomberg (9/16, Koenig, Lippert) reports Ford Motor Co., "increasingly desperate to stem billion-dollar losses, accelerated job cuts and plant closings and projected that its North American auto business would remain unprofitable until at least 2009." Ford "said it will shed an additional 10,000 salaried jobs, finish cutting 30,000 North American factory jobs by 2008, four years sooner than planned, and offer buyouts to all hourly workers. Ford suspended its quarterly dividend for the first time since 1982. The shares posted their biggest drop in almost four years in their highest trading volume ever. … The 10,000 salaried job cuts come in addition to 4,000 posts eliminated before March 31. The combined totals mean Ford is slashing almost 40 percent of its salaried workforce -- from car designers to financial analysts to secretaries -- in North America."

The Financial Times (9/16, Simon, Atkins) reports Bill Ford, executive chairman, "said he was less concerned about the possibility of Toyota overtaking Ford in North America than the importance 'for this plan to be based on what I consider to be conservative assumptions'. He said his family, which owns about 4 per cent of the equity and controls 40 per cent of the votes, had no plans to take the carmaker private."

The AP (9/16, Krisher) reports, "Wall Street seemed unimpressed. Ford's shares slumped nearly 12 percent amid disappointment that the automaker didn't do more to address rising health and pension costs, falling market share and intense competition from Asian manufacturers whose models have enthralled buyers looking for gas-sipping cars and trucks."

The Wall Street Journal (9/16, McCracken, Power, White, 2.03M) reports, "Ford's financial outlook is particularly dire. It once promised to return its core North American auto business to profitability by 2008. Now it doesn't expect to do so before 2009. Ford will burn through an astonishing $8.5 billion in cash this year. It began the year with $25.1 billion and will end the year with about $20 billion, a figure augmented by $3.4 billion Ford has taken out of a fund in which employers set aside money for retiree health-care costs."

UAW Not Fighting Ford Cuts. The Washington Times (9/16, Lengell, 88K) reports, "after taking a highly aggressive approach for decades, the UAW is transforming into a less combative, more cooperative organization that may be willing to work closer with U.S. automakers than perhaps at any other time in its history, analysts say. 'I think the UAW has finally wakened up to the fact that the whole thing is likely to disappear if they don't start to cooperate a little bit,' said John Wolkonowicz, an analyst with Global Insight, an automotive research and consulting firm." Ford's plan, "hammered out with cooperation from the union, was praised by UAW officials -- even though it would reduce Ford's North American work force by almost a third. 'Once again, our members are stepping up to make hard choices under difficult circumstances,' UAW President Ron Gettelfinger said."

All Three US Automakers Suffering. The New York Times (9/16, Maynard, 1.21M) reports, "Despite insisting all this year that they had solutions to their financial struggles well in hand, both the Ford Motor Company and the Chrysler Group conceded Friday that the steps they had taken were not working and that more bad news was coming in one of the deepest auto industry crises in Detroit's history. … At the same time, the Chrysler Group, also pummeled by the decline in sales of big sport utility vehicles and pickup trucks, said it would report a loss for this summer of $1.5 billion, more than double what it had originally anticipated."

Bush Recalls Positive Impact Of Richards On Texas Politics. The Dallas Morning News (9/16, Gillman, 500K) reports, "Bush reminisced Friday about the governor he ousted a dozen years ago, calling Democrat Ann Richards a tough opponent and saying he would miss her." Bush said, "She made a positive impact on the state of Texas. One thing's for certain -- she empowered a lot of people to want to participate in the political process that might not have felt that they were welcome in the process." While Bush will be at the UN Monday, former Commerce Secretary Don Evans "will represent him at the service, at which Sen. Hillary Clinton, former housing secretary Henry Cisneros and former Dallas mayor Ron Kirk will speak."

Richards Battle With Alcoholism Recounted. The New York Times' Maura Casey (9/16) writes that former Gov. Ann Richards "will be remembered for her wit, her one-liners and especially for the keynote speech at the 1988 Democratic Convention. … But her political career eclipsed what Ms. Richards called 'one of the great, great stories' of her life: her recovery from alcoholism and her nearly 26 years of sobriety. That triumph deserves to be more than a line in her obituary. … What made Ms. Richards different was her decision to be forthright about the fact that she was a recovering alcoholic. She didn't hide it."

Bush To Travel To California To Raise Funds For Pombo And Doolittle. Rachel Gordon, on the San Francisco Chronicle's "Politics" blog (9/16) writes, "President Bush plans to travel to Stockton next month to raise money for" Rep. Richard Pombo, "a close White House ally." President Bush "also plans to attend a fundraiser for Rep. John Doolittle…during a trip similar to one taken by Vice President Dick Cheney to the Republican House districts before the June primary.

Both Pombo And Doolittle Have Been Tied To Abramoff Scandal. The AP (9/16, Werner) reports, "The Doolittle event, which his campaign hopes will raise as much as $500,000, will be Bush's first appearance on behalf of Doolittle. The congressman's friendships with former Majority Leader Tom DeLay and convicted GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff have provided fodder for Doolittle's Democratic opponent, Charlie Brown. Doolittle accepted campaign cash from Abramoff and Abramoff clients, while interceding on their behalf. His wife also performed fundraising work for Abramoff, who pleaded guilty in January in a conspiracy to corrupt public officials."

The Tracy Press (9/16, Upton) reports, "Local fundraisers by Vice President Dick Cheney, Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert and House Majority Leader John Boehner have helped Pombo raise more than $2.5 million this election cycle. The money has helped Pombo fend off an expensive, frenzied attack by primary opponent Pete McCloskey, Democratic candidate Jerry McNerney and a range of activist groups, including MoveOn.org, Defenders of Wildlife and the Sierra Club, in the race for the 11th Congressional District. Pombo has been targeted for his close ties to convicted felon and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and indicted former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay."

Pombo's Opponent Said To Have "Outside Shot" At Winning. The Stockton Record (9/16, Shaw) reports Pombo "is locked in a spirited campaign for the 11th District against Pleasanton wind energy consultant Jerry McNerney, who lost handily to Pombo in 2004. McNerney has come back stronger this time, and many political observers give him an outside shot at unseating Pombo - if there is a Democratic wave this fall." McNerney's spokesman, Rob Caughlan, "says Bush's arrival shows Pombo is concerned."

Mehlman Reportedly Expects GOP To Sustain Losses, But Maintain Control Of Congress. McClatchy (9/16, Thomma) reports "many" Republicans "believe for the first time in months that they've turned a corner and could limit feared midterm losses enough to retain control of Congress. The reasons for their guarded optimism include a new poll showing that voters again give an edge to the Republicans on national security, another showing concerns about the seeming lack of a clear Democratic alternative agenda, an impressive get-out-the-vote effort in a Rhode Island Republican primary, and relief over dropping gasoline prices." McClatchy notes Democrats "dismiss the notion of a Republican rebound." RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman "all but echoed one internal White House prediction that his party will lose only two to three Senate seats and eight to 12 House seats. That would still leave Republicans in control of Congress. Democrats need to gain 15 House seats and six Senate seats to capture both chambers. Mehlman and other Republican operatives argued that they 'won' the first full week after Labor Day, the date when more voters historically start tuning in to politics and candidates and parties ramp up their campaigns, particularly with advertising.

Columnist Predicts GOP Will Target Pelosi. Howard Fineman in a Newsweek (9/16, 3.12M) web exclusive reports, "The Republican message for this fall's election season turns Franklin Roosevelt's famous statement on its head: fear is good, or at least it's a strategy. They want the electorate to be afraid, very afraid -- of the terrorists, of course, but also of" House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi. Fineman adds, "Democratic operatives have been warning Rep. Nancy Pelosi for months that she needs to prepare for what Karl Rove and the GOP have in store: an all out, coast-to-coast assault."

Mfume Concedes, Say Cardin Has His "Full Support." The Washington Times (9/16, Ward, 88K) reports former NAACP president Kweisi Mfume "officially conceded Maryland's Democratic primary for the U.S. Senate, but it was not clear whether he planned to campaign for Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin in the general election contest against" Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele. "'Ben and I gave this race our best,' said Mr. Mfume. … 'However, there can only be one nominee from our party, and he is it. 'He is a great public servant and I have absolutely no doubt that he is going to make a terrific United States senator. He has my full support,' Mr. Mfume said. Mr. Cardin spoke with Mr. Mfume on the phone minutes before a Democratic rally in Annapolis, an Mfume spokesman said. 'This was a very positive, hard campaign,' Mr. Cardin said after the rally. 'Kweisi and I continue our friendship. ... I'm proud to have his support.' Mr. Cardin said that he expects Mr. Mfume to campaign with him."

Kean Leading Menendez Despite Three-To-One Fundraising Disadvantage. The New York Times (9/16, Chen, 1.21M) reports, "As they did with the current President Bush in 2000, Democrats say" New Jersey state Senator Thomas Kean "in his first run for statewide office, lacks the résumé for Washington. But suddenly the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, and several other election handicappers, have moved New Jersey — which last elected a Republican senator in 1972 — into the toss-up column, complicating Democrats' plans to keep a supposedly safe Senate seat." Despite Sen. Robert Menendez's "three-to-one fund-raising edge, Mr. Kean has capitalized on sky-high name recognition to pass the incumbent in several recent public opinion polls by as much as 5 percentage points. Party leaders are increasingly focused on the race: Karl Rove, the White House political guru, is scheduled to sponsor a fund-raising lunch for Mr. Kean on Monday at 21 Club in Manhattan, and Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican whip, is sponsoring a breakfast on his behalf on Wednesday in Washington."

Kean Has Distanced Himself From Bush. Newsweek (9/16, Gerlach, 3.12M) reports, "Kean's camp has been trying to paint Menendez as the product of a broken New Jersey political system, rocked by scandal over the last decade. At the same time, Kean is trying to cut an independent path for himself—away from the GOP. He's been sharply critical of mistakes in Iraq and several of the president's positions. Menendez, however, says Kean is simply pandering in an election year and points to the fact that Laura Bush, former president George H.W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney have all stumped for Kean."

Challenger In MD4 Files Suit Over Voting Irregularities. The Washington Post (9/16, B1, Wiggins, Rich, Harris, 748K) reports, "Congressional candidate Donna Edwards announced plans yesterday to file a lawsuit over apparent voting irregularities in Tuesday's primary election in Prince George's County. … 'The integrity of the election is at stake,' said Edwards, who ran against Rep. Albert R. Wynn in the 4th District Democratic primary and is waiting for the race to be decided when provisional ballots are counted next week in Montgomery and Prince George's counties. Jonathan S. Shurberg, a lawyer working with Edwards, said they will ask a judge to take possession of voting machine memory cards in two, possibly three, precincts in Chillum. The request will be made either in Prince George's Circuit Court in Upper Marlboro or U.S. District Court in Greenbelt over the next several days. Edwards said her legal complaint will focus on the security of voting machines that contained voting cards and were not delivered to the county Board of Elections until late Wednesday."

Democrats Choose Replacement Candidate In OH3. The AP (9/16, Hannah) reports, "A former assistant federal prosecutor easily won a Democratic special primary Friday to face U.S. Rep. Mike Turner in November. Richard Chema had 73 percent, or 5,758 votes, compared with former Waynesville Mayor Charles Sanders who had 27 percent, or 2,105 votes, in Ohio's 3rd District, according to unofficial results. The special primary was required to replace Stephanie Studebaker, who dropped out of the race Aug. 15 when she and her husband were charged with domestic violence after police answered calls about a fight at their home."

Google Founders' For-Profit Philanthropy Noted. The New York Times John Tierney (9/16) writes, "Compassionate conservatism has been an expensive bust in Washington. But an intriguing alternative is emerging around the country: compassionate capitalism. … Google's young founders are already taking on poverty, disease and global warming, and they're not just dispensing cash. They've set up their philanthropy as a for-profit organization."

Cuts In Higher Education Subsidies Said To Endanger US Economic Dominance. The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M), in an editorial, writes, "By subsidizing public universities to keep tuition low, and providing federal tuition aid to poor and working-class students, this country vaulted tens of millions of people into the middle class while building the best-educated work force in the world. Those farsighted policies, however, are a thing of the past. Cuts in college aid and soaring tuition at state colleges have made it difficult for young people to educate themselves at a time when a college degree has become the basic price of admission to both the middle class and the global economy."

Battle Brews Over Iran As Feared Replay Of Iraq. McClatchy Newspapers (9/15, Strobel, Walcott) reports that "a high-stakes struggle is brewing within the Bush administration and in Congress over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program and involvement in terrorism." Unnamed officials "say Bush political appointees and hard-liners on Capitol Hill have tried recently to portray Iran's nuclear program as more advanced than it is and to exaggerate Tehran's role in Hezbollah's attack on Israel in mid-July." They add that the offices of Vice President Cheney and Secretary Rumsfeld may be receiving "questionable information" from Iranian exiles. Some express unease because "Rumsfeld's office earlier this year set up a new Iranian directorate, reported to be under the leadership of neoconservatives who played a role in planning the Iraq war." Abram Shulsky is cited as the head of that new directorate. However, "'There's no question that people [analysts] are less afraid to speak up after what happened in Iraq,' said one intelligence official. 'There's less of an inclination to let Cheney and Rumsfeld run free.'"

EU Negotiator "Upbeat" On Iran Nuclear Deal. The New York Times (9/16, Bilesky, 1.21M) reports, "The European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, offered Friday his most upbeat assessment to date on the nuclear impasse, insisting that talks to persuade Iran to suspend uranium enrichment were progressing," and a senior Bush administration official said "Mr. Solana would meet with Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, in New York on Sunday." While "European Union officials said they were still examining an offer by Iran last weekend temporarily to suspend its nuclear enrichment program in return for the beginning of negotiations over a package of economic and political incentives offered by the West," it "is softening its previous position that Iran must suspend enrichment before any negotiations can begin." Additionally, "Mr. Solana played down the threat of sanctions, saying that Washington was still willing to give diplomacy a chance," and "the United States acknowledged Thursday that it faced resistance from crucial allies over its attempt to press for sanctions." However, President Bush "said Friday he was worried Iran was trying to drag out the process with the United States and its European allies," and Solana "cautioned that the window for negotiations would not stay open indefinitely."

The Financial Times (9/16, Dombey) adds that Solana "raised expectations of a deal over Iran's nuclear programme when he said that talks were proceeding better than ever," However, "EU diplomats say they can only agree a deal if they are sure that Mr Larijani's initiative is fully backed by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei." The EU "is now watering down its insistence that Iran act first.," and "are trying to nail down exactly what Iran means when it refers to suspending uranium enrichment and to win reassurances that Washington would also sign up to a possible deal."

The AP (9/16, Ames) notes that Solana did not confirm "that Larijani had suggested his country was ready to consider an enrichment freeze for up to two months."

Bush To Take "Hard Line" On Iran At UN. The AFP (9/16, Knox) reports, "US President George W. Bush said he would push his hard line on Iran next week at the United Nations," and "warned US partners not to take pressure off Tehran." Also, "Asked whether he would consider meeting with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on the UN sidelines, Bush replied sternly: 'No, I'm not going to meet with him.'"

State Department Report On Religious Freedom Criticizes Iran, Says Vietnam Made Progress. The AP (9/16, Schweid) reports that the State Department "said in its annual report to Congress on religious freedom around the world" that "A 'threatening atmosphere' in Iran is causing a deterioration in already restricted religious freedom for nearly all minorities." Iran, Burma, China, Eritrea, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Vietnam "were cited for particularly severe violations of religious freedom." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "We hope this report will serve as a source of encouragement for those whose plight is documented in this report." Still, John V. Hanford III, U.S. ambassador at large for international religious freedom, "credited Vietnam with making 'enormous progress' on religious freedom, and said in Saudi Arabia 'we see things moving in the right direction.'" However, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom "said it was 'simply shocked' by what it called an unwarranted softening of the State Department's assessment of Saudi Arabia."

The AFP (9/16, Milikin) leads, "The United States assailed Iran for its worsening treatment of religious minorities." Secretary Rice "said the government's goal was broader than targeting a handful of repressive regimes. 'Religious freedom is deeply rooted in our principles and our history as a nation,' she said. 'And it is now integral to our efforts to combat terrorism and the ideology of hatred that fuels it.'" Also, "Hanford strongly indicated that Vietnam could be dropped from the black list." The Washington Times (9/16, Sands, 88K) also covers this story.

Bush Urges Intervention In Sudan. The Washington Post/AP (9/16, A12) reports, "President Bush suggested Friday that it may be time to override the objections of the Sudanese government in order to send international peacekeepers into Darfur," saying. "There's genocide taking place in Sudan. … Now is the time for the U.N. to act." He said that besides waiting for Sudan's initiation, "there are other alternatives, like passing a U.N. resolution saying we're coming in with a U.N. force in order to save lives." The AP (9/16, Knox) notes Bush said, "I'm frustrated with the United Nations in regards to Darfur."

The AP (9/16, Loven) adds that a "Security Council resolution passed in August, aimed at strengthening the peacekeeping force, would hand it over to a better-funded, larger and more well-equipped U.N. mission," and :nations including the United States have worked — without success — to acquire" the consent of the Sudanese government for it. However Assistant State Department Secretary Kristen Silverberg "said the United States insisted that last month's resolution permit deployment of new peacekeepers over Sudanese objection." Also, during the United Nations General Assembly session that begins next week, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will gather diplomats from several countries to discuss Darfur."

Blair Echoes Bush's Comments. Additionally, the AFP (9/16) notes, "British Prime Minister Tony Blair criticised the Sudanese government over the 'completely unacceptable' situation in Darfur and accused it of breaking ceasefire agreements signed with rebels." He also "insisted that the crisis was 'at the top' of his agenda." Blair said. "I have already talked to (Chinese) Premier Wen and President George Bush about Darfur in the last few days." These "comments echo those by Bush Friday that he was 'frustrated' with the UN."

Annan Urges World To Help With Darfur. Secretary-general of the United Nations, Kofi Annan, writes in an op-ed in the Los Angeles Times (9/16, 918K), "The glimmer of hope that many of us felt when the Darfur peace agreement was signed four months ago -- albeit by only two of the warring parties -- is being extinguished by renewed fighting among the factions," and now "the Sudanese government has sent thousands of troops to Darfur and renewed its bombing. I strongly condemn this escalation." The government of Sudan refuses to let the UN deploy a peacekeeping force. Annan says he has attempted to convince them to do so, but "my voice is not enough. Whoever, in Africa or beyond, is in a position to influence the government of Sudan must do so without delay." If Sudan fails its "sacred responsibility" of to protecting its population "from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity," it "will face opprobrium and disgrace throughout the world."

She noted "Israel's efforts to keep the military campaign limited made it more difficult to achieve its objectives," adding that "if Israel is attacked again, 'we are not looking again to find these terrorists among the civilian population.'" Instead, "We are going to face a state which does not implement its responsibility or maybe does not exercise its sovereignty." The AP (9/16, Schweid) adds that Livni said, "Enforcing the arms embargo is crucial."

The New York Times (9/16, Smith, 1.21M) reports, "Israel wants the expanded United Nations peacekeeping force, already deploying along Lebanon's southern border with Israel, to monitor the Syrian border as well as to keep weapons out. But Syria says it would consider that a 'hostile act' and the Lebanese in this region warn that any foreign presence would face stiff resistance." While "Lebanon has put more than 8,000 soldiers along the border to monitor traffic,…few people here believe the Lebanese Army is capable of stopping the arms flow." Meanwhile, "Local residents say it would be a simple matter requiring only the barest collusion of either side for a tractor or truck to haul weapons from one side to the other."

An effigy of Pope Benedict XVI burned turn by Muslims in India. Pakistan's parliament condemned the Pope's remarks. Lebanon's top cleric demanded a personal apology." The Post adds, "[T]he reaction was quick, and though it was largely peaceful, it evoked the storm of violent protests that erupted in most Muslim countries after a Danish newspaper published a series of cartoons a year ago that lampooned Muhammad. In some ways, the denunciations seemed even more pronounced, given the pope's stature and authority over the world's 1.1 billion Roman Catholics."

The New York Times (9/16, 1.21M) editorializes, "Muslim leaders the world over have demanded apologies and threatened to recall their ambassadors from the Vatican, warning that the pope's words dangerously reinforce a false and biased view of Islam. For many Muslims, holy war — jihad — is a spiritual struggle, and not a call to violence. And they denounce its perversion by extremists, who use jihad to justify murder and terrorism. The Vatican issued a statement saying that Benedict meant no offense and in fact desired dialogue. But this is not the first time the pope has fomented discord between Christians and Muslims."
